ERNEST JUDSON CLARK

Elected President of the National Association at the Twenty fourth Annual Convention

Ernest Judson Clark is State Agent for the John Hancock Mutual for Maryland and the District of Columbia. He was born at Newtonville, Ohio, June 27, 1872, and received his education at Lebanon University. Mr. Clark has been an indefatigable worker for the National Association and was its Secretary for several years.

Later he was elected Chairman of the Executive Committee and has been a member of the Executive Council for several years.

Baltimore, Md., September 22, 1913.

Greetings to the Members of
The National Association of Life Underwriters

The Atlantic City Convention was not only the largest in point of attendance, but in the development of its program was doubtless characterized by more constructive thought than any Convention in the history of the National Association. Last year's gains in new Associations and membership were also unprecedented. The constantly widening influence, however, of the Life Underwriters' movement throughout the United States and Canada has now opened to us greater opportunities for real service in advancing the "best interest of the cause of true life insurance."

A new era has been ushered in—one of Education and Conservation; Education involving a higher and more scientific training of agents, and systematic instruction in the fundamental principles and necessities of life insurance for the benefit of the insuring public; Conservation in its relationship to the laws of health, the enormous waste from lapsation and surrender of insurance, the unnecessary borrowing on policies, and the reduction of burdensome and unjust taxation by the several States and Federal Government, now costing the policyholders in this country many millions of dollars per annum.

In this campaign your new officers ask the enlistment and co-operation of each member of every local Association.

Sincerely yours,

ERNEST JUDSON CLARK,
President.

TWENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONVENTION PRESAGES AN ERA OF EXPANSION.

RECORD BREAKING GATHERING INDORSES THE PLANS OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND CONSERVATION AND PLEDGES SUPPORT TO STEM THE TIDE OF UNJUST TAXATION.

Largest Meeting of Life Insurance Men in the History of the Profession Takes Action on These Important Questions and Provides For Non-Resident Membership For Local Association. Strong Staff of Officers Elected.

To chronicle the proceedings of the Twenty-fourth Annual Convention of the National Association, which was held at Atlantic City, September 15, 16, 17 and 18, the frequent use of superlatives is emphatically necessary. So far as records show it was the largest assemblage of life insurance men in the history of the profession. From start to finish every session was virile with vim, energy and interest truly unprecedented. All previous records in every respect were utterly eclipsed and enthusiasm never ran higher; the formal addresses were masterful productions, holding the tense and undivided attention of the audience; the discussions wonderfully illuminating and instructive.

With two new channels susceptible of practical accomplishment; one the Education and Conservation Movement and the other hinging on unjust taxation, the program was characterized by a breadth and comprehensiveness of purpose which undoubtedly presages a new era of association activity.

Meeting of Executive Committee.

The delegates and guests began arriving on Monday, the 15th, and continued to drop in one by one and by groups with every succeeding train. The Marlborough-Blenheim, headquarters for the Executive Committee, was naturally well patronized, and this was the center of much of the convention's activity. The meetings of the Executive Committee and the Executive Council were held on Monday at the Marlborough-Blenheim, and the various subjects to be taken up in the official reports of the officers during the convention sessions were threshed out at that time.

All sessions of the convention were held in the Ball Room on the Steel Pier, and at 10:30 Tuesday morning National President Neil D. Sills called the meeting to order.

The invocation was delivered by Rev. Charles Martin Niles, D.D., rector of the Church of the Ascension, Atlantic City. President John R. Fox, of the Philadelphia association, commented upon the fact that this was the first visit to Atlantic City of many of those assembled, and just to show that there was plenty of room for everybody, he said that the Boardwalk was seventy-five feet wide and nearly eight miles long. Several of the delegates who had selected hotels some distance from the Steel Pier were well ready to believe this statement.

President Edward W. Allen, of the New York association, in behalf of his organization welcome the visitors to the convention, which had been arranged by both the Philadelphia and New York associations as joint hosts. He touched on the subject of rebating and part-time men, and said that everyone must keep pegging away at this same old problem in order to eliminate this reprehensible practice.

The address of the Hon. George M. La Mont, Commissioner of Banking and Insurance of New Jersey, was well received, as the Commissioner had a pleasing humor which put his audience at its ease. He said he was glad to see the life insurance men for once sitting still for a time and giving other people a chance to do the talking, and referred to the days of life insurance before the Armstrong investigation changed the then-existing conditions.

The reading of the minutes of the previous meeting was dispensed with, as they had already been printed.

The address of President Sills was replete with interesting information as to the progress of the association during his administration. He reported visiting eighty-four associations during the year and traveling 32,000 miles in doing so. Mr. Sills gave the National Association 174 days of the year and occupied much of this time by calling upon the different insurance men in their offices, thereby securing first-hand information of conditions in the various local associations.

He stated that early in the year he had written to some live insurance man in every city of 75,000 or more where there was no association, and in most cases secured replies showing considerable interest. The letters which he received in this way gave him particularly keen insight into conditions existing in various places where associations might be organized. As a result of the interest arising from this campaign new associations were organized in the following places:

New Associations.

Tacoma, Wash.; Fargo, N. D.; Sioux Falls, S. D.; Capital District, at Albany, N. Y.; Duluth, Minn.; Fort Dodge, Ia.; Huntington, W. Va.; Wichita, Kan.; Texas, at Dallas; Roanoke, Va.; Lynchburg, Va.

The Texas association started with a membership of 133 and the new one at Albany with 120 members.

Associations were reorganized at Albuquerque, N. M.; Providence, R. I., and St. Paul, Minn. Three associations previously organized joined the National body, viz.: Akron, Ohio; Mobile, Ala., and Springfield, Mo. President Sills reported a net gain of 16 associations during the year, making a total of 84, and a membership of 3,616. This was a net gain of 921 members for the year, or 34 per cent. Different associations reported, however, 4,139 members, which was 523 more than were paid up. He recommended that the fiscal year of local associations should hereafter end in either January or February, with the idea that dues would be more readily paid in time for the National Association.

The work of Warren M. Horner and other members of the Committee on Education and Conservation during the past year was highly commended. President Sills stated that he believed that the time had arrived when use should be made of the great educational institutions and of the papers and magazines, with the idea of eliminating an almost universal ignorance of the great principles of life insurance.

Speaking of the work of local associations, it was pointed out how much responsibility lies at the door of a capable secretary. It is mainly through good work of local officers that the interest and attendance of the various local associations is kept up. He stated that the result of the good year was not due to any one person, but to the enthusiastic co-operation of all.

Vice-President Herbert R. Lewis, of Rochester, read his address, in which he told how much it had meant to him to be an officer of the association. He made particular reference to the value of convention clubs.

Vice-President S. E. Barber, of Topeka, Kan., and Vice-President John A. Tory, of Toronto, were unable to be present.

The report of Secretary Bolling Sibley summarized the work accomplished during the year. He was very complimentary in his references to President Sills, and referred to the attention which the Executive Council gives to promoting the welfare of the organization.

He reported various trips made during the year, including the inaugural meeting at Pittsburgh and the mid-year meeting of the Executive Committee in New York City.

Mr. Sibley called the attention of the convention to the good accomplished for the cause at the First Annual Northwest Life Insurance Congress held at Seattle in June, which was fostered by former National President Hubert H. Ward and W. D. Mead, of the Puget Sound association.

Non-Receipt of News.

The secretary also referred to complaints which had been received regarding the non-receipt of LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS, stating, in part, as follows:

"Occasionally Mr. Ensign, corresponding secretary, receives complaints from members of local associations who claim that they are not receiving the News. All of these complaints are investigated, and in the majority of cases the fault lies with the secretary of the local association, and the complainant is, in most cases, a new member of a local association. Secretaries should bear in mind the rulings of the Executive Council with regard to the subscriptions to the News for members joining their respective associations during the year. The Executive Council has ruled that, in the absence of any constitutional requirement necessitating the payment of annual dues to the National Association on any other basis than that as outlined in the first sentence of Section I, Article VII, of the Constitution, the only thing that can be done in fairness to all concerned is for the secretary of the local association to subscribe to the News direct out of the funds of his association. This should be done on a pro rata basis; that is, if the member has joined nine months, or thereabouts, in advance of the fiscal year, June 1, remit to the News 75 cents; six months, 50 cents; three months, or over, 25 cents; less than three months, the News will be forwarded to the new members whose names are reported to Mr. Ensign."

Treasury in Good Condition.

Treasurer Eli D. Weeks, more familiarly known as "Uncle Eli," read his report, which exhibited a most excellent financial condition for the association. After concluding the report, he stated that he had been elected eighteen times to the office of treasurer and that he wished to retire from office, as he felt that the duties of his office should be entrusted to younger hands.

A resolution was accordingly made that a committee of two be appointed to draft appropriate resolutions on his faithful services, and it was so ordered.

Millard W. Mack, chairman of the Executive Committee, read the report of his committee and took up in a most comprehensive manner the various activities of the executive body during the year intervening since the last convention. He said that all associations had responded to calls for dues better than ever before, but still there were some delinquents. One of the most important recommendations made in this report, which was afterward adopted by the convention, was that of penalizing Executive Committeemen who absent themselves from two consecutive meetings of such committee. It was subsequently voted to amend the Constitution providing for substitutes to be appointed to fill places automatically so vacated on the committee.

Announcement was made that George W. Johnston, of New York, had won the Calef Loving Cup for the third time, on the subject of "Creative Soliciting, Rather Than Competitive." The winner of the second prize, the Ben Williams Vase, was R. O. Miles, general agent of the Connecticut Mutual at San Francisco, Cal.

As to the financial standing of LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS, Mr. Mack had this to say:

Life Association News.

The report of the Publication Committee is indeed very satisfactory. The News, for its fiscal year ending August 31, 1913, has turned over as a dividend to the National Association the sum of $1,500. This is $500 in excess of the dividend declared last year, and the balance in the bank at the close of the fiscal year is $312.85 more than the balance in the bank after last year's dividend was remitted to the National Treasurer. In other words, the $1,500 dividend declared by the News this year is $207 more than the entire working capital of the National Association ten years ago. In 1904 the annual dues paid into the treasury of the National Association were but $1,293.

The cost of publishing the News is by no means decreasing. The cost of paper, composition and press work is constantly on an increasing scale. Notwithstanding this, the News shows the above results, and to its credit should be mentioned that in the year ending August 31, 1913, it published forty-four more pages of text and advertising matter than it did in the preceding year.

Incorporated in the Executive Committee report was the resolution approving the work of the Committee on Education and Conservation, of which Warren M. Horner, of Minneapolis, is chairman. The resolution was to the effect that the results so far accomplished by the committee indicated a widespread interest in the subject, and as a result it was recommended that the work of the committee be continued and that it proceed with the raising of funds for the prosecution of the work.

The report of the Committee on Law and Legislation was also included in the report of the Executive Committee, but was read by Chairman Dolph after Mr. Mack had concluded. This report went into the legislative situation in a most practical way, showing the vital points, and especially the danger of adverse laws which confront the companies and the business. He pointed out the necessity for education upon the subject of life insurance along the lines laid down by the Committee on Education and Conservation.

Resolution on Income Tax Bill.

Mr. Dolph then presented a resolution, which was adopted, and proved to be one of the features of the first day's session. It called upon the Conference Committee of the Senate and House to strike from the Income section of the Tariff Bill then and now before Congress that section which taxes the refunds to policyholders. This resolution, which was telegraphed to President Woodrow Wilson and to the members of the Conference Committee of the House and Senate, follows:

Resolved:—The National Association of Life Underwriters, representing 100,000 agents in all sections of the country, and the millions of the policyholders they have insured, respectfully request Congress to insert in the Income Tax Bill a clause expressly exempting from taxation the refunds or so-called dividends to policyholders. Any contrary provision is not only unjust, but it is inconsistent with the intent of the proposed law to force Companies to collect this tax from their 25,000,000 policyholders carrying an average insurance of $650, but a small fraction of whom have incomes of $3,000; the earnings or refunds of members of kindred institutions such as fraternal and assessment life insurance companies, mutual fire insurance companies, savings banks and building and loan associations, are expressly exempted. Therefore, to tax the refunds or so-called dividends returned to life insurance policyholders is an indefensible discrimination.

JOHN F. ROCHE, Vice-President

We have no interest in the tax imposed upon stockholders, but in behalf of our millions of clients who look to us to protect their interests, and with whom we are in daily contact, we emphatically protest against such discrimination. It should not be a function of Congress to discourage thrift or increase the burdens of provident nor tax funds expressly intended for widows and orphans, whose care would otherwise fall upon the State.

America is the only country in the world, civilized or uncivilized, imposing an income tax upon life insurance in times of peace. We urge Congress while not yet too late to correct an act of injustice and wrong unprecedented in Income Tax laws of any country and any time.

NEIL D. SILLS, President.

BOLLING SILBEY, Secretary.

A committee with Edward A. Woods, of Pittsburgh, as chairman, and Mr. Dolph as the second member was then appointed to draw up a resolution setting forth the ideas of the life underwriters present as to the tax situation.

Northwest Insurance Congress.

W. D. Mead, of the Puget Sound association, was then called to the platform to give an account of the Northwest Insurance Congress recently held at Seattle. He advocated the holding of similar gatherings in other sections of the country.

At the close of the morning session Frank D. Buser, of the Philadelphia association, chairman of the General Convention Committee announced the social features for which arrangements had been made.

It was 2:40 p. m. before the delegates returned from luncheon for the first feature of the afternoon session, which was the address of Norval A. Hawkins, manager of sales for the Ford Motor Company at Detroit. Because of the illness of the author, this address was read by H. Wibirt Spence, president of the Detroit association. Before beginning to read the address, Mr. Spence asked those present to devote a moment to silent prayer for the recovery of Mr. Hawkins. This proved a touching tribute to a man who has made his name in the world of advertising, and whose address on "Putting Life Into Life Insurance" was a veritable masterpiece.

Address of Norval A. Hawkins.

* If Mr. Hawkins had been a practical life insurance man he could not have made a more telling talk on the proper publicity of life insurance. The address, too lengthy and far too excellent to permit of a summary, is given in full elsewhere in this number.

Mr. Spence was frequently interrupted by applause, and was compelled to silently acknowledge an outburst of vocal enthusiasm and hand-clapping at the conclusion of the paper.

On motion of Darby A. Day, a telegram of thanks was sent to Mr. Hawkins at the Detroit Hospital, with the hope that his recovery would be a speedy one.

Chairman Sills then recognized Edward A. Woods, who read the following resolution, which was referred to the Executive Committee:

American life insurance is not an institution for making profits, but for distributing losses. Through this agency, 25,000,000 Americans voluntarily provide for their families and their old age, something that Germany, England and other countries are compelling at government expense. The billions of insurance is the striking answer of the American nation to the world's charge of extravagance and lack of thrift. Yet, the United States is the distributing machinery to levy, collect and have handed over to the governments of the various States and nation enormous funds in the guise of taxes.

Originally for the sole purpose of covering cost of supervision, the States alone are now collecting, exclusive of taxes on real estate and the new Federal income tax, $12,000,000 annually; six times that collected in 1890. In 1860 the States took 70 cents from each $100 paid by policyholders; now they take $2.00. Piling injustice on injustice, the Federal Government, under the present and previous administrations, has added to the exactions of 48 States, contrary to the vigorous protest of all insurance men. These taxes are levied regardless of sound principles of taxation. The laws vary and conflict in different States. Regular life insurance is singled out while fraternal and assessment are exempted.

The amounts thus taken from policyholders would provide half a billion additional insurance for women and children; or increase the refunds of policyholders over 15%; or pay all executive salaries of all companies several times over; or reduce expenses about 8%. Recent State legislation has reflected the popular demand by restricting expense, and therefore reduced cost to the policyholders. Yet this movement is defeated just in so far as taxes are maintained and increased.

Such taxes, peculiar to this country, are, as John Stuart Mill well said, "a discouragement of prudence and forethought." The Committee on Insurance Law of the American Bar Association has well said: "It is just as dishonest for a State to lay unkind hands on trust funds as for an individual to do it;" and: "It is a monstrous injustice for a State government to maintain itself by legislative raids upon trust funds and the climax of cowardice to commit extortion in the name of the police power."

The Life Underwriters, representing all companies, all sections, all political opinions, coming personally and closely in contact with policyholder and lawmaker, have the opportunity and the obligation of safeguarding their clients' interests in these matters.

THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED:

1st. That Life Underwriters everywhere be urged to acquaint themselves with the inequity and inequity of this governmental burden, and upon all proper occasions, particularly when expenses or refunds are criticised, to denounce this wrong taxation policy of States and government and aid company officials in every way in opposing it.

2nd. That the 100,000 Life Underwriters assume, as their special duty, the awaking of public sentiment not only against any increase of this already iniquitous burden but for its decrease.

3rd. That a Committee on Taxation be created by the National Association to resist every increase, and secure every possible decrease, of taxation.

4th. That we recommend that every local Association maintain a similar Committee.

5th. That we recommend that every Underwriters' Association devote one meeting each year to vigorous discussion of life insurance taxation, that all agents throughout the field may be in position to intelligently oppose this growing exaction.

6th. That the "Life Association News" be requested to constantly aid this campaign.

duced by Warren M. Horner, chairman of the Education and Conservation Committee of the National Association. Mr. Horner delivered a report which gave unmistakable evidence that the committee had given exhaustive study as to the best means to effect the desired result in spreading broadcast a popular knowledge of life insurance. Throughout the address there was a ringing tone of optimism, and the facts which he brought out in his usual forceful manner produced a profound impression on the audience. The full text of Mr. Horner's address is given on another page of this number.

During the discussion which followed it became strikingly evident that there was no abatement of interest in the project and that, instead of an abandonment of the original plans, the committee were more confident of ultimate success than ever.

Spurious Advertising.

Edward A. Woods was the first speaker, and brought out several strong points in the following manner:

"Too much money is spent in spurious advertising. That is, advertising in spurts. Companies advertise a half or a full page once a year, or perhaps for a few months and then stop, and then complain that the advertising did not pay. This sort of advertising is an absolute waste of money. Others publish certain statements or long columns of figures that no one but an actuary could understand, or a list of the officers, which only bring to the mind of the prospect or the policyholder the number of salaries that are to be paid before he will get his dividends. It is to be very much regretted that life insurance companies will not unite on at least one thing. I have never known them to unite on any other, and that is with a view of correcting this misdirected economy. Put human interest in advertising, and put it on a basis of common interest as to the value of insurance as furnished by all good companies. I would suggest that a certain amount be contributed to this end, and the business returns would more than justify the expenditure in this direction. But do not have it as it was in old times. I remember an advertisement of how much better one company was than another. Advertising, as everybody knows, is merely fertilizing the soil, but you cannot simply fertilize the ground and expect the crops to grow without planting the seed, and yet that is the way some advertising is carried on."

Conservation.

It was the opinion of Louis L. Hopkins, of New York, who was the next speaker, that there was opportunity for much good work in the conservation of insurance in force, conservation of health and conservation of public good-will.

"We contend," said Mr. Hopkins, "that if it is worth while for the companies to spend so much money to induce men to insure their lives, it is surely worth some expenditure to keep the insurance in force. If the companies exercise so much care in getting unimpaired lives on their books, it is worth while to spend some money and thought in keeping them unimpaired and reducing mortality. And if it is good business to spend large sums in printer's ink to interest men in insurance, it is worth while to maintain their interest after they are insured. We submit that this non-partisan education and conservation movement will help the companies in solving these problems at a minimum expense, better than could be done by any partisan or company campaign."

Jules Girardin, of Chicago, voiced his sentiments in no uncertain terms.

"This plan of education and conservation," said he, "is bound to succeed. It cannot fail if we persist. Nothing progresses quite as slowly as progress. Some of us can remember when the necessity was foreseen for incontestable and non-forfeitable policies, for thirty-day grace clauses, for loans on policies, and for many other liberal features, how we were met with opposition, supported by all the logic of mathematics and accumulated statistics, and sworn to by all the gods of mythology and Paganism that such things could not be safely done. The present-day life insurance policy contracts speak eloquently of the absurdity of these fears and justify the persistence that finally secured these absolutely equitable privileges, and time will win victory for the enterprise in which we are now engaged.

"I am so firm a believer in the efficacy of public education that I am willing, if the proposition is adopted by field-men generally, to contribute to the campaign all of the required percentage of the annual paid-for business at my agency, leaving nothing to be borne by my company, and besides give the companies, if necessary, absolute control of the committee appointed to carry out the work, because of my firm conviction that public enlightenment will be a most successful achievement for the good of life insurance and its patrons."

Ward Gives His Opinion.

Hubert H. Ward, who is not only a conspicuous success as a life insurance man, but who may justly claim to be an advertising expert, said in part:

"Advertising in life insurance is the only antiquated thing now attached to the companies. Most of the money is thrown away because the advertising is unscientific. If the medical departments were run in the same unscientific way the mortality of the companies would be excessive. If the actuarial departments were as unscientific as is life insurance advertising the companies would soon be bankrupt. If the investment departments were as unscientific the companies would soon be in the hands of receivers. Arithmetic is the first of the sciences and the mother of safety. Two and two make four, but never five. Arithmetic in the actuarial department takes care of hundreds of millions. Arithmetic applied to present advertising methods shows that we are wasting money on the impossible. Arithmetic applied to scientific advertising methods will open our eyes and show us the way to a successful interview and the getting of business that will stick. The seed of institutional advertising has been planted. The harvest will come. If the ground in which this seed has been planted is cultivated the harvest will be prolific. If neglected the harvest still will come, for the seed is there, but that harvest will be one of weeds—not wheat. Shall we let the weeds and the wheat grow side by side or shall we cultivate the wheat by an effort at elimination of the weeds?"

Educating the Women.

Charles Jerome Edwards believed that splendid progress had been made by the committee, and Charles W. Scovel drove home several telling arguments. Frederick S. Jones, of Philadelphia, thought that all plans of the committee should include the idea of educating the women of America as to what life insurance really meant to them.

Ernest J. Clark was of the opinion that the taxation question offered a large opportunity for popular education. Secretary Bolling Sibley contributed some good points, and the symposium was closed by Darby A. Day, who made a plea for educating the agent before making an attempt to educate the public.

Just before the adjournment of the session the Nominating Committee was appointed, with instructions to report at the Thursday afternoon session.

The Wednesday morning session started off auspiciously with an increased attendance. President Sills called the convention to order shortly after 10 o'clock and stated that Hon. A. J. Montague, member of the United States Congress and a former Governor of Virginia, had been unavoidably detained at Washington. Mr. Sills then introduced Charles W. Scovel to fill the vacancy, dubbing the latter gentleman the "War Governor" of the association. In explanation of the title of honor, Mr. Sills explained that Mr. Scovel had been president of the National Association during the Armstrong upheaval.

Mr. Scovel's remarks were so much appreciated that several members on the floor expressed the opinion at the end of his speech that they were glad that the former chief executive of Virginia had found it impossible to be present.

Mr. Scovel selected as his subject "The New Family Service of Life Insurance." He confined his remarks exclusively to the service which life insurance does to the family, and its protection for dependent ones left behind, leaving out of consideration the entire group of service rendered by life insurance to the community and the State, and to the individual by way of savings and old age provision. No mention was made of life insurance in its relation to business firms and corporations.

The New Family Service.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Scovel in concluding, "when we look the plain facts in the face we see that the leaving of any sum of money falls most pitifully short of fulfilling the purpose of real, lasting family protection. Life insurance has not been really doing the thing we sold it to do! This was not the fault of life insurance. Its proceeds were just as good protection as any other money the dead man could leave. Nobody knew any better way excepting only the Trust Company way, open only to men of larger means as a rule.

"The fact is the world has long needed a whole new line of financial service—needed it without knowing it, just as it for centuries needed the printing press, steam, electricity, without knowing it.

"That new service is here. Life insurance has evolved it. It begins like the old service at that time of greatest need, the time of death—but it doesn't stop there! It doesn't leave the distraught widow to her own devices or to a chance adviser. It not only supplies the money, but applies it also. And it applies it just as the husband and father did himself, in a regular monthly sum to meet the current monthly expenses.

"This monthly sum can be made much larger than a safe rate of interest on the principal, if otherwise invested, would amount to. And yet, it will continue coming to the very end of the widow's life, however long; and though she die early, it will keep coming for twenty years in all, long enough to bring up the youngest child to maturity. Or, this monthly sum can be made just to equal a safe interest rate on the principal, and on this basis continue through the mother's life, and then throughout the children's lives, and then to their unborn children until twenty-one years of age, and at that distant time to have the whole untouched principal finally paid to these grandchildren. And of these two fundamental plans there are sundry varieties and combinations to fit all kinds of protective purposes in all future contingencies."

Life Income Contracts.

The next feature on the program was the five-minute discussions on "The Advantage and Security of Life Income Contracts." Former National President Hubert H. Ward presided as chairman.

The first speaker was F. A. Griswold, of Hartford, Conn., who gave a number of concrete examples and stated that life income insurance did for the poor man what the trust companies were doing in managing the estates of the wealthy.

James M. Dickey, of the Erie association, followed and quoted several experiences which had come to his attention where life income insurance had been needed, and others where it had been applied successfully.

Jules Girardin, of the Chicago association, introduced his remarks by a story which provoked a volley of laughter, which lasted fully two minutes, but becoming serious, Mr. Girardin said that he considered it criminal to sell life insurance under certain conditions without placing it on the monthly income basis.

John L. Shuff, of Cincinnati, was the next speaker, and he believed that it was dangerous to leave a widow with a large sum of money, and advised distributing this principal over a period of twenty years or more, as it is possible to do in a life income policy.

Henry H. Kohn, president of the recently organized Capital District association, at Albany, and consequently a new figure at conventions, made a decided hit with his audience in a brief and forceful talk. He said:

Views of Henry H. Kohn.

"Mr. Ward stepped in front of my chair and asked me to say a few words.

"I am reminded of the fact that one of our writers has said that a widow is a shining mark for mining sharks, and there is a great deal of truth in that. There are mining sharks that don't sell mines. In France you very seldom hear a man say that another man is worth $100,000 or 100,000 francs. They figure wealth of income. He is worth $10,000 or 10,000 francs a year, and that is just the situation here. It is not the principal. It's the income, definite, secure, permanent, countable income that counts with a man and with a widow. Some years ago I had occasion to be in Manchester, N. H., where an agent made a settlement of a death of $1,000. He went to the house to get the release of the policy and deliver the draft. In the afternoon when he came back from his lunch and I met him at his office, he told me that he had occasion to go into a certain dry goods store there and saw there a woman with her pocketbook crammed full of bills, making miscellaneous purchases from the proceeds of the policy on the life of her husband. Poor, deluded woman: a reflection on the life insurance business, that would make such a condition possible, and I don't think the insurance company had a very high place in the mind of that woman or her children or her connections, and whenever a settlement is made by any of you men or by any agency throughout the United States, make it less easy for the mining shark to attach himself to that widow when the proceeds are paid in a lump sum. Nothing results but bitterness and income life insurance is the only thing that will permanently prevent it."

A Good Suggestion.

J. J. Jackson, of the Cleveland association, and a former vice-president of the National Association, believed that salesmanship was a matter of service. In his own case he makes it a practice to draw wills for people, and in the past few years he has drafted over 500 such documents. The next step was to introduce the subject of life insurance, and he found that having done a man this favor, and also having gained information as to the possible size of the policy he would accept, he could present his case effectively.

Percy V. Baldwin, a member of the Boston association, as well as a member of the Executive Council of the National body, gave a brief talk in which he stated that the only policy in life insurance which is without value is the one that does not exist. He claimed that the average woman does not know how to invest her money, especially when she is dependent upon the proceeds of a life insurance policy.

Graham C. Wells, of Pittsburgh, called attention to the fact that a man could double the income for his estate by taking out a life income policy. "I believe," said he, "if you will explain to a man the necessary details and the costs of court in the process of the settlement of an estate he will see the value of a monthly income policy without costs or fees."

L. H. Brown, of Columbus, said he found an idea which was useful to him in soliciting by seeing his own children playing around his desk. He thought it would be a nice idea to leave his children a certain fixed sum, perhaps at Christmas, and in repeating the incident to a friend he was immediately able to sell him a life income policy.

BURSTING THE BONDS.

For twenty-four years the National Association, through its affiliated local bodies, has been conservatively, but none the less effectively, building a powerful working organization. During this time much energy has been directed toward establishing a high standard of ethics of field procedure; indeed, the association's activities have been devoted almost exclusively to this purpose and in the extension of the propaganda with the intention of securing new members who would pledge themselves to the "square deal."

To-day the National Association presents a solid front with 3,500 life insurance men in the ranks. During the past twenty-four years it has been responsible for practically every reform accomplished in field methods, and quite naturally such reforms have not been limited in influence to its own members. It has secured a general adoption of and adherence to the Anti-Rebate law; under its influence the twisting of policies and the twisting of agents has been generally abolished; it has created constructive salesmanship where unfair competition once flourished; it brought about the modification of Section 97. These are but a few of the many reforms for which the National Association justly claims credit.

All agents of all companies, no less than all companies have enjoyed and waxed more or less prosperous under the improved conditions. As the interests of the agents and the policyholders were interlocking, the public, to a large extent, began to look favorably upon Life Insurance and its representatives. But, notwithstanding all this, strong as may have been the desire, urgent as may have been the call, the National Association in times past did not have the capital nor the numerical strength to actively participate in matters affecting the relation of Life Insurance, as an institution, to the people at large.

It must be apparent, however, to those who attended the recent gathering at Atlantic City that the Twenty-Fourth Annual Convention marks the beginning of an era of expansion, wherein the unswerving principles of business relationship with the policyholder, already firmly established, will be adhered to with greater tenacity than ever; wherein an opportunity will be given for the life insurance men of this country to work out a practical solution as to the apathy of the general public as to what Life Insurance really is; wherein the amplification of scope and comprehensiveness of two great problems will permit the National Association to burst its bonds and endeavor to perform on a magnificent scale its altruistic duty to mankind.

The National Association has given its unqualified indorsement to two problems of the first magnitude: one the Education and Conservation movement, while the other takes into consideration the enormous burden of taxation imposed upon the business and through a resolution adopted seeks to stem the tide of this monstrous injustice.

As this resolution states, the amounts taken from policyholders through various taxes imposed would provide half a billion additional insurance for women and children, or increase the refunds of policyholders over 15 per cent.; or pay all executive salaries of all companies several times over.

The Insurance Field makes a startling comparison in a recent number by stating in substance that, at the present rate of taxation, the insurance companies will lose in the next fifty years as much insurance as they have accumulated and now keep in force after seventy years of labor.

Edmund Burke said, "Time is required to produce that union of minds which alone can produce all the good we aim at. Our patience will achieve more than our force." We quote this as introductory and in reference to the report of the Committee on Education and Conservation as delivered by its chairman, Warren M. Horner. It is not surprising that this committee was unable to accomplish with the companies all that it contemplated doing. A consummation of the plan as originally proposed with regard to donations from the various companies, in less than a year's time, would have been nothing less than miraculous. That some companies agreed to contribute is not only a source of satisfaction, but it shows that a good beginning has been made and indicates that the tide has turned in a favorable direction. More than this should not be expected at the present time, but ultimate success is certain.

Said Edward A. Woods at the convention: "It is to be very much regretted that the companies will not unite on one thing, at least. I have never known them to unite on any other." Whatever is said or done, the Education and Conservation matter offers unlimited possibilities and without doubt some practical plan permitting of immediate action will be evolved and promulgated at the inaugural meeting in Pittsburgh next month.

While the question of Education and Conservation and the Taxation problem have been regarded as two distinct channels of association activity, it would seem that the ultimate solution of both run in parallel courses. The EDUCATION of the public and the lawmakers means a reduction and possible elimination of oppressive taxation; reduction or elimination of unjust taxation spells CONSERVATION in its truest sense.

Then there is another point which will hinge to a greater or less degree upon education. It is evident that the same educational methods which it is proposed to employ with the people must be used with company officials, should the Committee on Education and Conservation decide to still consider the companies in connection with the project. As Lowell said, "Things in possession have a very firm grip. One of the strongest cements of society is the conviction of mankind that the state of things into which they are born is a part of the order of the universe, as natural, let us say, as that the sun should go round the earth."

SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT.

If the service lies in insuring the lives of protectors and bread-winners, we must also encourage and teach them to hold to the insurance they already carry. And on this point I submit the following figures from the reports of the New York Insurance Department for the years 1911 and 1912:

No. Pol's in force Dec. 31, 1911..... 7,001,913
 Ins. in force Dec. 31, 1911.....$12,803,317.544 of which there was terminated in 1912:

	No. of Policies.	Amount of Insurance.
By surrender	147,731	$276,616,499
By lapse	211,609	366,276,434
	359,340	$642,892,933
	5.13%	5.02%

Eliminating surrenders, we have 211,609 lapsed policies, which are bad enough, nearly 3 per cent waste. If we add the tremendous lapse ratio of companies not reporting to New York, the figures would be simply astounding.

This compilation does not include decreased policies amounting to $42,000,000.

Consider for a moment the meaning of 359,000 lapsed policies—possibly 359,000 widows or groups of orphans deprived of protection, aggregating $642,892,933—much of which perhaps was discontinued because of ignorance of the principles of life insurance or policy contracts. What a sacrifice of the well-being of helpless women and innocent children upon the altars of ignorance and misunderstanding!

JULES GIRARDIN.

Benefit, made a few brief remarks on the great possibilities of this form of contract. Mr. Drew agreed with the previous speakers that it was a most beneficial and adaptable form of insurance contract. He urged the delegates present to encourage it in every possible way.

Meyer Harrison, of the Denver association, claimed that the life income policy was the very best solution of the social problem. According to Mr. Harrison, the principles of this form of contract should be taught in the schools, and in this way information would be carried to the parents of the children.

J. Edward Meyers, of the Minneapolis association, discussed the influence which the passage of the Workmen's Compensation Laws had had in drawing attention to the sacredness of life. He believed that because of calling attention to the human factor the life insurance business was receiving more consideration than ever. Mr. Meyers believed that it was well to go after the small purchaser of life insurance. "You are busy," said he, "writing the man of means who can afford $10,000 or $20,000, but what about the poor devil who has to have $2,000? How are you going to help him?"

Chairman Ward interjected some remarks at this point, based upon his own experiences. He said that he had made it a practice to suggest to his agents that they themselves should take out life income policies. In this way he believed they could talk much more effectively about the subject.

The remarks of F. H. Hyatt, of the South Carolina association, had to do with the present-day hostile insurance legislation.

Address of Henry Abels.

One of the features of this session which was not on the program was an address from Henry Abels, secretary of the Franklin Life, who was recently elected president of the American Life Convention. Mr. Abels pointed out how the interests of the companies and their agents were interlocked and how these interests were affected by the same conditions. He thought that there should be a closer affiliation between the company organizations and the agents' organizations, and made the suggestion that the influence of life insurance for good would be greatly advanced if co-operative measures could be arranged for regularly by the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners, the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, the National Association of Life Underwriters and the American Life Convention.

Prize Essays.

The presentation of the prize essay trophies was, as usual, one of the interesting events of the meeting. H. M. Willet, of Atlanta, made the presentation speech for the Calef Cup and presented the trophy to the winner, George W. Johnston, of New York City. He also presented Mr. Johnston, on behalf of the association, the Calef Cup medal, to be held permanently by the latter gentleman. Mr. Johnston personally read his essay, and at its conclusion Chas. Jerome Edwards, on behalf of the Executive Committee, offered a resolution complimenting Mr. Johnston on winning the cup for the third time and extended congratulations to him from the National Association.

To H. Wibirt Spence, of Detroit, fell the honor of presenting the Ben Williams Vase. W. L. Hathaway, of San Francisco, received the trophy on behalf of R. O. Miles, of that city, who was unable to be present. Mr. Hathaway said that it was the purpose of the Pacific Coast associations, especially the four leading ones, to start a prize essay contest among themselves in order that they may be prepared next year to take both cups to the Pacific Coast, to hold them there for the meeting of the World's Insurance Congress in 1915.

The convention hall was well filled when President Sills rapped for order Thursday morning. Secretary Sibley read telegrams of regret from William J. Graham, manager of the Group Insurance Department of the Equitable; Frank E. McMullen, of Los Angeles, former president of the association, and President Jesse R. Clark, of the Union Central, of Cincinnati.

The presentation of a set of resolutions and a gold-headed cane to "Uncle" Eli B. Weeks, who retires this year after eighteen years' service as treasurer, was scheduled. Mr. Weeks was not present, but the resolutions were read, commending his faithful services, and expressed the hope for many years of future activity.

Agency Manager Winslow Russell, of the Phoenix Mutual, made one of the most striking addresses of the session. He sounded a call for efficiency under the new conditions facing the life insurance profession, and said that this might be improved by the interchange of views between various underwriters in the business. He acknowledged that no one company has discovered a panacea for all the evils that beset the business, but declared that there were some general remedies which might be followed throughout the field.

Mr. Russell, who is a past master in the art of developing agents, has been very successful by his unique methods, and his charts proved by concrete examples the benefits he obtained by the systematic working of any given field.

Efficiency Methods.

Wilson Williams, general agent of the New England Mutual at New Orleans, discussed efficiency methods as tried out by himself. He said satisfactory results were obtained largely by intelligent application of thought. He also reminded those present that an agent's standing in his own community should reflect the good character of the management. Reference was made to the use of circulars and other forms of literature, which were not used with any idea of closing a prospect, but simply to put agents in touch with those who might be interested in securing insurance.

Royal S. Goldsburly, general agent of the Northwestern Mutual, and president of the Pittsburgh Association, in his address remarked that there is wisdom in knowing what to do, and skill in knowing how to do it. He advised his field agents to be managing agents at night, in so far as it meant looking up prospects and laying out work for the day. The next morning, however, the managing agent should become an active solicitor and carry out the plans which he formulated for himself on the previous night.

General Solicitor Edward D. Duffield, of the Prudential, delivered a stirring address on the subject of "Underwriting and Citizenship." His remarks were extemporaneous, but none the less telling. He illustrated his point by numerous anecdotes which kept the gathering intensely interested. According to Mr. Duffield, both life underwriters and lawyers had much in common, in that they "earned their bread by the sweat of their jaws." It was his belief that both professions were frequently maligned by the unthinking public and that it would be a difficult matter to fill the responsible positions held by lawyers and life insurance men in the world's work if these two classes were eliminated.

Address of Edward D. Duffield.

The speaker discussed the elements which are necessary for the make-up of a successful underwriter, and said that the gospel of work was one of the most important characteristics which was necessary; that an efficient underwriter should also be a thinker and should likewise be a builder, and build up rather than tear down. Mr. Duffield contended that a successful life agent must also thoroughly believe in his occupation and be interested in something more than the mere scramble after commissions; he must believe in his company. "In my opinion," said the speaker, "it is better to encourage a partisan feeling if necessary, as partisanship is advisable when it is used to a good purpose."

He referred to the fact that we are living to-day in an age of moral awakening, but inefficiency still exists in the conduct of Government affairs. The problem was how to improve present conditions. Mr. Duffield was given a vote of thanks by the convention at the conclusion of his remarks.

Hubert H. Ward presided during the five-minute discussions of the subject of "Local Associations." This subject was sub-divided under four heads as follows:

Many valuable points were brought to light, and nearly all of the speakers easily confined their remarks to the time limitation of five minutes each. A notable exception was in the case of Herman Fellingner, who is general agent of the Pacific Mutual at Cleveland. Mr. Fellingner has a strong sense of humor and knows how to display this characteristic to its best advantage. He discussed the new anti-rebate laws in Ohio and told how the local associations throughout that State had been responsible for placing such laws upon the statute book. Mr. Fellingner became so enthusiastic over his subject that Chairman Ward was compelled several times to call his attention to the time limit assigned. Mr. Fellingner retired with well-feigned reluctance, shouting out to the delegates that he "came to make a speech, not a little talk."

Publicity for Local Associations.

W. D. Mead, representing the Puget Sound association, was the next speaker, and put particular and characteristic emphasis upon the proper handling of publicity matters by local associations. He made a brief reference to the publicity which he and several other members of the Puget Sound association had secured prior to and succeeding the First Annual Northwest Insurance Congress.

Dr. H. C. Castor's remarks had to do with the necessity of providing interesting forms of program and entertainment. He aroused considerable enthusiasm in his audience when he stated that the program for the meetings of the Chicago association had been made so interesting that even laymen were anxious to become members of that association.

Jules Girardin advocated a restriction of life insurance commissions to the members of local associations.

Eugene B. Stinde, of St. Louis, spoke on the necessity of eliminating the part-time man and the broker, while Hugh M. Willet told of association matters in the South and mentioned the slogan of the Georgia association: "The Gentleman in Life Insurance."

Elmer E. Silver, of Boston, believed in frequent gatherings to keep up interest in association work.

Bernard R. Rose discussed the individual responsibility of the agent. It was impossible for Mr. Rose to confine his remarks to five minutes, and consequently the convention was deprived of listening to one of the most able papers prepared for the gathering. The article will be found in the October number of the NEWS.

J. Edward Meyers, who was the last speaker in the discussions, protested against further reduction of agents' compensation, and stated that at present plumbers were receiving more compensation per hour than many life insurance agents. He proved this by charts that had been shown by some of the previous speakers.

The World's Insurance Congress.

The appearance of Commissioner Hathaway, of the World's Insurance Congress, at the afternoon session was a feature which bodes well for the attendance of insurance men at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco in 1915. Mr. Hathaway outlined his plans for organizing the congress on a national basis, and also expressed the hope that the organization entered into in connection with this congress would be permanent in character.

He told of the difficulties he had experienced in the past two years in trying to create enthusiasm in the World's Insurance Congress, and stated that after months of hard work the idea was being brought forward in the proper way both in this country and across the water. He also mentioned that at the recent International Congress of Insurance Organizations held in Paris it was voted not to hold any of the usual European annual meetings during 1915 in order that the insurance representatives of the European nations might have the opportunity to attend the World's Insurance Congress at San Francisco.

It was announced at this time by Chairman Horner that the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners and the American Life Convention had appointed committees to confer with Mr. Horner's Committee on Education and Conservation.

There was much enthusiasm displayed over the awards of the various trophies for the current year. The Oklahoma association won the Chas. Jerome Edwards Membership Trophy, which is awarded annually to that association which shows the greatest numerical increase in membership and the greatest percentage of increase, these points each counting half in computing the totals of the competing associations. The Oklahoma association won this trophy with 140.6 per cent; St. Louis was second with a gain of 85.8 per cent. The percentages of the other associations were: Toledo, 74.2 per cent; Savannah, 58.6 per cent; Rochester, 56.4 per cent; Detroit, 55.67 per cent; Chicago, 55.67 per cent; New England Women's, 39.89 per cent; Richmond, 39.4 per cent; Syracuse, 37.46 per cent.

Awarding the Trophies.

The Whittington Trophy was won by J. Henry Johnson, of the Oklahoma association. This trophy is awarded annually to that member of a local association who is responsible for the election of the largest number of new members to his local body. His score was 63 members, against his closest competitor, Charles A. Foehl, of Pittsburgh, who secured 27 members. Other contestants in the order of their showing were: John R. Fox, Philadelphia, 24; J. F. Oates, Chicago, 21; W. C. Bailey, Cleveland, 19; J. L. Collins, Los Angeles, 16; B. P. Rouse, Los Angeles, 16; F. B. Hawkins, Youngstown, 14; R. E. Spalding, Chicago, 14.

The Will A. Waite Trophy, awarded annually to that association having the largest percentage of attendance at regular meetings, was won by the New England Women's association with a percentage of 76.54 per cent. This was the first time that the only women's association affiliated with the National body had won any of the trophies, and the association gave evidence that it intended to keep winning this trophy and some of the others, too. The Minneapolis association was second for this prize with 73.65 per cent; Syracuse third with 47.18 per cent, and Los Angeles fourth with 42.56 per cent.

The presentation of the Edwards Trophy was made by Dr. H. C. Castor, of the Chicago association; the Whittington Trophy by George L. Dyer, president of the Life Underwriters' Association of St. Louis, and the Waite Attendance Trophy by J. M. Mackintosh, superintendent of the Prudential at Cleveland.

Mrs. Shaal Responds.

Mrs. Florence E. Shaal, of Boston, president of the New England Women's association, was called to the platform to receive the Waite Trophy, and after numerous requests from the floor made a few remarks in which she said that the women of the New England association did not intend to let the Pacific Coast delegation take back to the Coast any of the trophies if the women could prevent it. She referred to the statement of Commissioner Hathaway, who seemed to think it would be a good idea to take all the cups to the Coast next year so that they could have them in time for the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco.

At this point in the proceedings the Credentials Committee reported a total registration of 934. This is the high water mark for all previous conventions.

President Sills then renamed the old Committee on Education and Conservation, with one exception. T. C. Thompson, of Chattanooga, had sent in his resignation, and Hubert H. Ward was appointed in his stead.

The resolution entered in the convention on the previous day regarding the income section of the tariff bill of taxing the refunds to policyholders was favorably reported by the Executive Committee and adopted by the convention. Edward A. Woods, who was chairman of the special committee which drew up the resolutions, in speaking of the resolution told of the need of co-operation to prevent any further taxation. He said that the agents must co-operate with the companies, as it was frequently the case that life insurance men secure a better audience from legislators than do the officers of companies.

J. B. Morissette, president of the Life Underwriters' Association of Canada, who was automatically elected a vice-president of the National Association, was present to extend the greetings of the Canadian members. He did this effectively, speaking of the close political relations between the two countries and told how much the Canadian life insurance men appreciated being affiliated with such a live insurance body in the United States.

Contest for Next Convention.

As usual, the friendly contest for the next convention aroused considerable enthusiasm. Richmond and Cincinnati were both in the field with convincing speakers and all kinds of arguments to prove that each was accessible and desirable in every way. The Richmond delegation led off in a speech by Samuel B. Love, who told of the excellent accommodations in the Jefferson Hotel, where over one thousand could be seated in the hall. He asked for the adoption of the slogan "On to Richmond." D. G. C. Sinclair, of New York, backed up the contentions of Virginia.

A. F. Sommer, president of the Cincinnati association, presented the claims of that city on the ground of accessibility. Although acknowledging that it was more than forty-five minutes from Broadway, the speaker showed how it was centrally located from most of the important sections of the United States.

John L. Shuff, of Cincinnati, told of the remarkable progress of the Middle West States, and he did this so entertainingly that when the vote was taken it was found that Cincinnati had won the 1914 convention by a vote of 30 to 22.

The subject of excessive traveling on the part of the president was brought up by Charles W. Scovel, who ought to know from experience. He referred to the great growth of the association movement and said that it was not necessary at the present time for the president to wear himself out going from dinner to dinner around the country. With 84 local associations it was too much of a tax on any man.

President Relieved from Traveling.

He introduced a resolution which relieves the president from the traveling which has been the practise of the chief executive for many years. He said that LIFE ASSOCIATION News acts as a substitute for much of this traveling, and believed that the new president could keep in very close touch with local conditions through the medium of the News and spread his ideas through the agency of the official organ.

The members of the Nominating Committee, with its report, was the occasion for a big demonstration. J. Edward Meyers, chairman of this committee, gave the slate as selected and all of the members were unanimously elected. The following are the officers elected:

President, Ernest J. Clark, John Hancock, Baltimore.

Vice-President, Edward A. Woods, Equitable, Pittsburgh.

Vice-President, J. N. Russell, Jr., Pacific Mutual, Los Angeles.

Vice-President, J. B. Morissette, Quebec, Canada.
Secretary, Frank D. Buser, Mass. Mutual, Philadelphia.

Treasurer, Hervey S. Dale, Union Mutual, Chicago.

President Clark after being escorted to the platform stated in a few words how much he appreciated his elevation to the high office. He counted on the unusual growth of the association and said he hoped too much would not be expected of him. He maintained that the extension work would continue, and now that the constitution was changed to provide for non-resident membership, he believed that the numerical standing of the National Association would be improved.

The newly elected officers were presented to the convention following the conclusion of Mr. Clark's speech.

There was the usual crop of appreciative resolutions at the close of the session.

Frank D. Buser, of Philadelphia, as chairman of the General Convention Committee, was tendered a personal vote of thanks for his effective work.

A rising vote of thanks was given to former President Sills on his retirement, for his energetic work while in office.

At the meeting of the Executive Committee, which immediately followed the final adjournment of the convention, Hugh M. Willet, of the Penn Mutual at Atlanta, was elected chairman. President Clark made a short talk to the committee men before they left the hall.

The Banquet.

Fully 350 persons were present at the annual banquet, which was held on Thursday evening at the Hotel Rudolph. This was the final feature of the convention and proved to be a fitting climax to the social features. Although a formal banquet, the affair was marked by an absence of oppressive conventionalities. The songs, which were arranged by Jacob Weil, of Philadelphia, were an enjoyable feature, for popular tunes had been stripped of their words and new ones substituted bearing upon the subject of life insurance and embracing the names of the prominent members of the association.

Retiring President Sills presided as toastmaster with commendable dignity and seemed to thoroughly appreciate the birthday cake with forty candles which had been prepared for him. It so happened that the date of the banquet was the anniversary of his birthday.

The only speaker who disappointed the gathering was Comptroller Prendergast, of New York, who wired his regrets, stating that he could not leave the city when the body of Mayor Gaynor was to be received early the next morning.

Former Governor J. Franklin Fort, of New Jersey, was the first speaker. He welcomed the visitors to the State of New Jersey and stated that Jerseyites were not ashamed to have anyone come to their State. In speaking of the investments of life insurance funds, Mr. Fort stated that the total amount was $130,000,000,000, and that the total amount in risks in force was approximately $20,000,000,000, and that one-seventh of the value of the United States was invested in insurance. The speaker could not understand how anyone could turn a life insurance solicitor away, realizing as everybody must, that insurance is a necessity.

Fort Discusses Important Questions.

Mr. Fort discussed the Sherman Act and claimed that it was impossible for insurance companies to be a trust, and in connection with this matter he also called the attention of his audience to the fact that life insurance is the only institution in the United States that has the right to make rates. "If you get them too low the law will make you jack them up," he said, "on the other hand, the various insurance departments have the right to insist that rates should be increased if they are considered inadequate." He deplored the fact that there were 48 separate insurance departments with jurisdiction over the insurance companies, and went on record as an advocate of nationalized judicature.

Mr. Fort paid a high tribute to President Woodrow Wilson, saying that the National Executive had done more in six months than any other President in any similar period.

Jules Girardin, of Chicago, who was much impressed with Mr. Fort's remarks, shouted as the former Governor was resuming his seat, "If we want a Republican President we will know where to go."

Second Vice-President George T. Wilson, of the Equitable Life, was in particularly good form, his remarks keeping his audience in roars of laughter. He was introduced as "King George" by the toastmaster, and took a number of good natured flings at his predecessor, the ex-Governor of New

—OF PHILADELPHIA, PA.—

¶ To fit the policy to the need of the insured demands frankness on his part, and conscience and expertness on the part of the agent. It has been the endeavor of the Provident Life and Trust Company to have its agents measure up to this high standard, and to demonstrate that the best asset an agent can have in the business is the entire satisfaction of the policyholder whose application he has secured.

Jersey. Mr. Wilson said that he was strong for the National Association and, waxing patriotic, referred to Boston as the home of the National Association, also of Bunker Hill and Mrs. Florence Shaal.

Mr. Wilson was emphatic in declaring his belief in the value to the agent of local associations, claiming that the affiliated bodies of the National Association had done more than anything else to elevate the service of the life insurance business. He declared that earnestness was one of the basic laws of success and discussed the subject of efficiency, showing how efficiency would take frenzy out of business.

T. B. Macauley, managing director of the Sun Life of Canada, who followed Mr. Wilson, referred to the friendly relations existing between the United States and Canada at the present time. "I believe," said Mr. Macauley, "that the development of life insurance is distinctively Anglo-Saxon. Life insurance is philanthropy reduced to a business basis and the companies are the organs of this philanthropy."

The newly elected president, Ernest J. Clark, of Baltimore, invited all those present to go to Cincinnati next year, and stated that it was a great pleasure to be at the head of the greatest insurance organization in the world. As the hour was late his remarks were necessarily curtailed.

PLANS OF GENERAL CONVENTION COMMITTEE WORK OUT PERFECTLY.

Placards Placed in All Beach Front Hotels Directing Delegates to Steel Pier—Frank D. Buser, Chairman of the Committee, Indisposed but Does Not Neglect His Duties.

Although many of the delegates to the convention had never been to Atlantic City before, the General Convention Committee of the Philadelphia association and New York association had arranged matters so that everything worked out satisfactorily. There was no difficulty in finding the Steel Pier, as at all the beach front hotels placards had been prominently placed giving explicit directions as to its location. The social events passed off smoothly and were greatly enjoyed. Frank D. Buser, who was last year president of the Philadelphia association, was chairman of the General Convention Committee, and associated with him were the following: John R. Fox, Eugene O. Mosier, William G. Carroll, of the Philadelphia association; Edward W. Allen, Chas. Jerome Edwards, Everett M. Ensign, Louis L. Hopkins, of the New York association.

Mr. Buser was a veritable dynamo of energy and as a result of his strenuous work in putting the finishing touches on arrangements was advised by his physician to retire to his bed. With a high temperature he was compelled to confine himself to his room for a brief period, but with his loyalty to the association and keenly feeling his responsibility as chairman of the general committee he disregarded the instruction of his medical adviser and thereafter was so active that he really seemed to be in several places at one time.

Tea was served every afternoon in the west solarium of the Marlborough-Blenheim. The bracing air of America's greatest seaside resort and the attractions of the Boardwalk claimed the attention of many of the ladies present. As a consequence the afternoon teas were not particularly well attended.

Mrs. Florence E. Shaal, of Boston, was chairwoman of this committee, and the other ladies who were on the program to assist were: Mrs. Edward W. Allen, New York; Mrs. William F. Atkinson, New York; Mrs. Frank D. Buser, Philadelphia; Mrs. William G. Carroll, Philadelphia; Mrs. Everett M. Ensign, New York; Mrs. F. H. Garrigues, Philadelphia; Mrs. A. H. Hood, Philadelphia; Miss Sara F. Jones, Chicago; Mrs. C. B. Knight, Philadelphia; Mrs. G. H. Lang, Philadelphia; Mrs. H. R. Lewis, Rochester; Mrs. Eugene O. Mosier, Philadelphia; Mrs. H. PUTTING LIFE INTO LIFE INSURANCE. It Is Contended That life Insurance Has Never Been Put Before the Public in a Plain Understandable Way, Either by Its Representatives or Through Advertising.

Address of Norval A. Hawkins, Manager of Sales, Ford Motor Company, Detroit.

To-day we are learning to smile at Life and to look upon Birth and Death as incidents.

For a generation Life Insurance talked of Death.

To-day we are talking of LIFE INSURANCE.

We are striving to bring it into the life as men live it, to the uttermost.

When a man used to sell you life insurance, he thought he had to dress in a Prince Albert coat, a high hat and a white necktie; now he plays golf with you, and by the time you have him two down at the eighteenth hole he has made you curious to know more about that new contract he sold Old Tightwad.

It is a big business—calling for big thinking, big doing, because it is destined for even bigger things.

It is estimated that the life insurance policies of all forms in force in this country alone number more than 20,000,000. The total value of these policies is about $25,000,000,000—an amount greater than the combined life insurance carried by Great Britain, Australia, South America and the Continental European companies.

Of Recent Development.

Life insurance really is a development of the nineteenth century. Its great growth is almost wholly confined to the last fifty years. In 1860, on January 1, 49,000 policies were in force, insuring $141,000,000. In the fifty-two years following it has developed three times as fast as our population and twice as fast as our wealth.

The sums paid annually for premiums in all forms amount, in round figures, to approximately $700,000,000. And yet we are not by a long shot devoting all of the income we could spare to life insurance.

We spend an equal amount of our insurance premiums for tobacco, half the amount for candy, more than that amount for beer, two and one-half times as much for all alcoholic liquors, and one-seventh of that amount alone for low-priced automobiles manufactured by a concern with which I am particularly well acquainted, and which are paid-up guarantees of fullness of life and all other felicities for the owners.

It may readily be seen, therefore, that while life insurance solicitors are generally credited with being the highest grade salesmen in the world, there are big opportunities ahead. They could enormously increase their business by diverting some of the expenditures I have just referred to—even if only to a small extent—to the purchase of the policies which they themselves are selling, and must have faith in to sell successfully.

In the Beginning.

In the beginning life insurance dealt only with contracts terminating at death, hence the same "Life Insurance." It was found, however, that the plea based on the one factor of providing for a family after death of the provider was not sufficient to build up a large business. The so-called investment features were then introduced as business getters.

Life insurance is a product of an advanced civilization. To-day there is no subject of such vital importance to the people, and to the future of the State, regarding which there is so much popular ignorance.

It has never been properly put before the public in a plain, understandable way, either through its representatives or by advertising.

The larger part of life insurance advertising, when any has been done, has either been mere publicity—as, for example, "The Prudential has the strength of Gibraltar," or something of that character, a vague, colorless, technical generality about some sort of an investment policy such as "20 Year Endowment," or "Gold Bond," etc., or else a mass of statements cluttered with figures which no one but an expert accountant or an actuary could hope to understand.

It recalls that inspiring individual who wrestled with a page of Browning with no appreciable results. He asked a friend to delve into its profundities.

"What do you make out of it?" he inquired.

"Not a damn thing," his friend replied.

"Thank God! I thought I was going mad!" exclaimed the Browning student, wonderfully relieved.

Most of the companies spend too much time figuring out new policies or special schemes with some kind of fancy trimmings to make the prospect think he is not buying life insurance, when it should be spent in making simple life insurance plainer and more understandable to the masses of people who need it.

Public Is Ignorant.

Your contract production departments are well developed, scientific and efficient. Your distribution departments have done remarkable work, judged from past experience; but judged by possibilities, the distribution has realized but a small part. Several years ago you had a somewhat sudden and bewildering awakening on how little the public really knew life insurance.

The public knows little about life insurance; and you know too much about rates, features, policies, laws, regulations and policy differences, from the insurance standpoint.

From your viewpoint, life insurance is insurance.

But it isn't.

Life insurance is men, plus organized savings and the mathematics of experience translated into human life values. It should be talked as such and advertised as such, and you men in the field should let the world know that you are particularly proud of your vocation. You insurance men have a life-filling mission.

There is no nobler work in the world than teaching people to do the right thing, than educating men to provide for their widows, their orphans and others dependent upon them. It is a service to society. The life insurance salesman is an educator in the highest sense, and at best is the keenest exponent of educational salesmanship.

The great big majority of men, young, middle aged and old, have some one depending upon them who will suffer in body, mind and spirit from the loss of that man's earning capacity. From the standpoint of life insurance, a man is simply a money-making machine. He is a provider.

Life insurance is not supposed to furnish balm for the heartaches, the sorrows or the loss which comes to those who are left. It is only a means of extending his earning power to provide something to take the place of his money-acquiring capacity.

A Form of Immortality.

Therefore, life insurance becomes a form of immortality. A man may die, but if he leaves a policy he lives again as a producer for his dependents. Look at it in any way you want to, the human side of life insurance is the tremendous factor in it. Insurance is one of the greatest humanizing forces in the world, yet it has not used the forces of life.

Its benefits should be taught in the public schools. I am surprised its story does not invite us from every newspaper and publication in the land. What is the matter with the insurance men?

The great masses of the people do not yet understand life insurance, or every healthy man would have its protection. Think what it would mean, for instance, if women understood life insurance, and instead of opposing it on sentimental grounds, as they now largely do, they would become active urgers of it. You men who understand insurance have talked technicalities and special features to prospects who did not understand simple life insurance; you have talked Sanscrit to those who did not know their A B C's, and the result has been that the business is still in its infancy.

A man who contributes $1,000 to the support of an orphan's home is looked upon as a real benefactor. We all take off our hats to him. He has discovered dimly and uncertainly, it may be, the brotherhood of man. Life insurance is built on the idea that one is for all and all is for one.

Tell me why any man here who induces another to take out a $1,000 life insurance policy is not just as great a benefactor? He has taught that man the root principle of life—how to take care of his own and himself. After all, that is doing humanity a greater service than building a home for indigent widows—it is making indigent widows impossible.

When life insurance is rightly sold, it will not be a question of "Shall I take out a policy?" but "How large must it be?" The companies must properly educate the public to understand what life insurance really is—simple, unadorned life insurance. Business will materially increase, for their solicitors will be treated in a very different manner when calling on prospects.

Life insurance is a business proposition of the highest character. The insurance solicitor of the future, as the best have in the past, must be a higher grade man than salesmen in other lines of business.

At the Mercy of Solicitor.

The average man knows in taking out insurance he is entirely at the mercy of the solicitor; for that reason he likes to deal with some friend who has gone into insurance as a genteel way of cashing in on his acquaintances. Ninety out of every hundred men in this city, or in any other for that matter, don't know the real insurance value of any insurance policy they have, even though they have been paying premiums on it for twenty years.

As a rule, men buy life insurance either from a sense of duty or because they are virtually forced into it by an aggressive solicitor, without knowing nearly so much about the terms of the contract as they would demand in making any other investment requiring the same amount of money.

The late J. Pierpont Morgan was an exception. A well-known insurance official said the other day: "In the beginning of my career, when I was only a humble insurance agent, I gained access one morning to the august and formidable presence of J. Pierpont Morgan."

"No!"

"Yes," the official insisted. "Yes, it's a fact. Don't ask me how I did it, though, for that's a secret. But at 10 o'clock one morning, behold me, a young insurance agent, standing before the desk of the great J. Pierpont, with my big envelope of life and death statistics, 20-year endowments, and so forth, in my hand. I was, I have since learned, the first and only insurance agent who ever managed to meet Mr. Morgan face to face."

"Well, what happened?"

"Mr. Morgan," I began hurriedly, 'you ought to carry more life insurance. You see, sir—'

"And lucidly and cogently I laid my insurance proposition before the great financier.

"He listened in silence. Those fierce blue eyes of his bored through me like lances. When I stopped, at last, all he said was:

"How did you get in here?"

"I walked in," I answered.

"Well," said he 'walk out.'"

Right here's where the public should be educated.

Here, also, is where most of the solicitors should be educated.

Certified Solicitors.

There are altogether too many men soliciting insurance who know only a little about the companies they represent and less about the different forms and classes of policies they are selling, from the standpoint of the future customer. It might not be a bad plan to have life insurance solicitors examined, and then certified as to their qualifications and special fitness before turning them loose to lose business that good men might close.

Life insurance is life insurance.

When a man tries to make an investment out of it he is trying to make it serve his own selfish ends, which, to a large extent, defeats his original purpose. The average insurance company, as well as the average solicitor, I believe, makes a mistake in the manner they talk different kinds of policies. They do not fit men with what is needed, but take orders for what is wanted.

They try to write a $5,000 20-year endowment policy because they have sized the man up as a $5,000 man, and if they get this policy they will get a $250 premium, while, if they wrote a 20-year payment life policy for $5,000 they would get approximately a $185 premium, or if they wrote an ordinary life with a 20-year settlement they would get $125.

A Satisfied Customer.

The basis on which insurance should be considered by the customer and solicitor is from the standpoint of the premium, not from the size of the policy; and from the viewpoint of the person insured, not that of the solicitor eager for a premium. Life insurance salesmen must learn what most merchants now know—that a satisfied customer is the best of all advertisements.

The man who blindly and selfishly gathers in too many dollars to-day at the expense of his customer's best interest, and possibly his own self-respect, misses the chance to make good in a big way to-morrow. He is not building for the future.

How much money should a man with a certain income, family expenses, etc., save to put into insurance? Let's have some experience tables on that. He should be educated to feel that he ought to carry all the insurance that he can without breaking his back, but no man should ever be induced to take out more insurance than he can probably keep up.

I expect some day to see some life insurance company do for the average man what the Ford Motor Company has done for the average man—provide the thing best suited to his requirements at the least possible outlay, or at a cost that represents neither hardship nor extravagance. This, I take it, would be a yearly renewable term policy, without re-examination, procurable for the lowest possible premium, and which could be continued or terminated according to the circumstances of the policyholder. I know the average agent would not be wildly enthusiastic over this form of policy, as it would yield but modest premiums, but I think I could retire to a quiet corner with him and convince him that there are certain compensations, in the way of increased demand and widened public service, for putting out a good and desirable thing at a moderate price.

What Best Suits the Needs.

No man should be encouraged to kill himself in order that his family may live better than he could with them. That is the old die-to-win idea in insurance. It is not life insurance. So the question for the man to decide is what best suits his needs and how much of it he can afford to carry. Does he want to leave money to his family if he dies, or does he want to receive a little interest if he lives?

The whole problem works out almost exactly on this basis: That the amount of money left to the wife decreases in exactly the same ratio as the interest which comes back to the husband increases.

It is needless for me to say that I think what the average man really desires is insurance, which will give him the largest amount of money for his estate. He can then save his other money and make such investments as he may desire, and look on life with a clearer and happier prospect. What are we after here in this world anyway, from a purely commercial and monetary standpoint?

First, to live as well as we can.

Second, to create an estate that will care for us in our old age, or that we may leave to those dependent upon us. Life insurance is one of the easiest and surest ways by which a man can create an estate. There are other ways that may look sure, but they often prove anything but safe. It's better to be safe than sorry—and most common, every-day human beings feel that way.

One of the surest ways, then, for a man to create an estate of a certain number of dollars is to take out a life insurance policy for that amount. Take a man 30 years of age who for $250 a year can get a $10,000 ordinary life policy with a 20-year settlement. All he has to do to leave an estate of $10,000, absolutely, is to put up that $250 a year as long as he lives, or until the 20-year settlement period.

Creating an Estate.

Now, to create such an estate by saving the same amount of money each year, in any other way, he would have to be absolutely sure of three things:

First, that he would live 30 or more years.

Second, that without this compulsory saving feature of insurance, which compels a man to pay his premium whenever it is due, he would have to save or invest in his own way $250 every year.

Third, he would have to be sure that he would make absolutely no poor investment during this 30 years.

All of this is very obvious to you life insurance men. I want to show you how you have scientifically applied human nature to the devising of novel contracts and special feature insurance until your handbook looks like a bible (as indeed it is), a bible of brotherhood.

You train your men at home and in branches at great expense. It costs you huge sums to get business, and the cost has not been going down. It seems you have not been gaining on the public as fast as the public has been gaining on you. Your actuaries figure on classes and masses of men; in your business-getting departments you are still dealing in individuals. You have been looking in the mirror. Bring insurance home to your public. The public has not been interested half as much in these novel ideas as you have.

Must Humanize Insurance.

Your public is an ignoramus, speaking from a life insurance standpoint. You must humanize your insurance. You must put real life in its story. Cut the actuary attitude out of your public side; keep him in the policy, where he belongs. Here's a thought that comes to mind. If 100 average men 30 years of age, with families, were locked in a room and were going to draw lots for one man to be killed before the end of the year, and if they had an opportunity of taking out insurance policies before that drawing, would they do it or would they say, "Let my wife and children take the chance."

The actual facts are that Father Time compels just such a drawing as this every year. Do many prospects get that thought? Practically one man out of every hundred at 30 years of age dies within a year.

There is a drawing next year that takes one of the 99 left, and the next year takes one of the 98 remaining, and pretty soon the point is reached where two are drawn each year, and it's the lucky one who plays out his full string.

Drive this home. There is a town down in Massachusetts named for a man who wouldn't take out life insurance; it is called Marblehead. He is dead, but his descendants are still with us. So that is your work—to penetrate the marbleheads. You often meet the fellow who says he is so favorably situated that he is making 10 or 15 per cent. on his money and doesn't need any life insurance.

He can make so much more in this way on his money than your insurance company can pay him that he cannot afford to make any deposits with you. His own argument looks to me to be the strongest reason he could present for your selling him a policy. Say to him: "My money will not earn more than 5 per cent., and your money is worth no more than mine."

"It is your personality plus your money that is worth 15 per cent. Your money alone is worth only 5 per cent., so that your personality is worth the other 10 per cent. What is your family going to do when you go? What are you going to do when you have to stop?"

“Massachusetts Mutual”

FOR sixty-two years this Company, through its Home Office and its Agencies, has served the American public. Throughout this long period its guiding principles have been mutuality and fair treatment both of public and of its field representatives. It has been a progressive Company in the truest sense. Untried novelties and alluring catchpenny schemes it has never adopted. But it has always been alert to adapt its policies and practices to insurance needs that have arisen in the evolution of business and domestic life. Steadfast adherence to this course has earned, throughout the land, a reputation for trustworthiness, and consequently the prestige of no Company is more lustrous than that of the Massachusetts Mutual.

In the last few years this Company's annual gain in new business, and its gains of every kind that indicate solid growth and increasing financial strength, have been notable. Never were Massachusetts Mutual policies so easy to sell as now. And few Companies are represented by as contented and loyal a field force as that of this Company. Principles and methods of management that have brought the Company to its present position of eminence will carry it to still finer successes in the future.

Occasionally we have a general agency opportunity to be availed of by a man of ability and integrity who is both a satisfactory producer and an able agency manager. If you are interested, address

What do you think would be the result as to the increase in the sale of life insurance if the right kind of a humanized advertising and educational selling campaign was to be carried on for a few years? A man would be ashamed to admit to his neighbor that he did not carry sufficient life insurance to properly protect his family.

Life insurance is not a luxury—it is a necessity, and should be treated as such. As I have already said, man has two sides, the human, personal side, which his relatives and friends love, and the purely commercial or money-earning side. This latter side is all that life insurance now considers. He is an interest earner. He is a money-making machine.

The man who is making $10,000 a year has the same interest earning capacity as $200,000 at 5 per cent. a year, and yet he probably values his interest earning capacity sufficiently to carry only $10,000 insurance.

Your actuaries figure out how long he should live. That is insurance, but we know men do not act on actuarial tables—they only die by them.

A Man's Worth.

What is the man's worth to his family to-day? What chances are that family taking with its future when it puts aside no sinking fund to protect the money machine production when the machine becomes obsolete or is finally scrapped? Are you presenting these thoughts to your prospects? In a retail way, perhaps; but the job is not a retail job. In the Ford business we are not satisfied with single orders when we should be selling carload lots.

What you and I want is for men to act—live and act. These men who think they believe in insurance don't believe in it. They carry $5,000, $10,000 or $20,000; and if they have a position of any importance their insurance is a trifle. Why?

The majority of men who carry insurance to-day have not been sold, in the true acceptance of that word. They don't fully appreciate the policy they have. It reminds me of the old song, "We're here, because we're here."

They have the policy because they have it. Some of the real conditions surrounding insurance should, in my opinion, be put before the people in a way that will make them see it and understand it. What does a mass of figures mean to the average person? You don't know what a million dollars looks like; you have no more real conception of the manpower of the assets of a big insurance company than I have.

Stop Looking in the Mirror.

Take some of the published statements of insurance companies—the percentage of gains, comparative results secured by this company or that, certified balance sheets, etc., etc. To tell the truth, they are not thoroughly understood by 50 per cent. of those who are actively engaged in the work of selling insurance. And they are not read by anyone, except possibly by the banker who has some business dealings with the company publishing them. Stop looking in the mirror, for we want to put more real life into life insurance.

The human side of insurance is what we should keep before every man, woman and child.

As I said before, its benefits should be demonstrated to school children. Money spent for the right kind of an educational advertising campaign would benefit all insurance companies. Such a campaign would do three things:

Increase insurance.

Cut the cost of getting it, and Diminish the lapses.

Advertising and salesmanship are both parts of one great problem—distribution. The one is the missionary going about planting in men's minds—silently, subtly, alone or in the crowd—the seeds which blossom into inquiries. The solicitor, doing best what advertising has not done so well, gets the application.

It costs millions more than it should to keep men doing the advertising by word of mouth, I know; advertising of the trade-mark, balance-sheet style of copy is no new thing to insurance companies, but human life insurance advertising is entirely a new thing.

Life insurance advertising has nearly always been written by insurance men who thought in figures and not in terms of life and sentiment. The head makes business, but the heart keeps it. The day is not far distant when insurance companies will carry on a propaganda as wide as the nation, or—and this is the alternative step—the nation itself may do it.

For—put this where you won't forget it—every man knows that he wants life insurance.

That famous sermon of DeWitt Talmage on Life Insurance was a human expression of the fundamental, human side of life insurance. It electrified the men of an older day, and gave them a vision of a greater and nobler mission than they had dreamed of in their cribbed and cabined financial outlook.

Two Types of Minds.

There are two types of minds in the world, as a great Englishman pointed out: The mind which thinks of the present and the past. It is retrospective. "It interprets things of the present, and gives value to this and denies it to that entirely with relation to the past." Such are accountants, auditors, actuaries, lawyers and financiers of the smaller type.

But there is another type which has discovered the future. It foresees and plans. It is concerned with to-morrow. It is the creative, organizing, masterful type. To-day is to-morrow in embryo. It is youth against age. It is the mind unsated with success. It is the mind which says prepare for to-morrow and to-day will care for itself. It is the mind of the master-salesman, the maker of business, the creator of sentiment. It makes for progress.

Such a viewpoint is the very essence of life insurance in its attitude toward the customer. In its attitude toward itself, however, it has been held in bondage to the past. But a better day is a hand.

If a man appreciated fully, by knowing definitely, the value of what he was getting, and bought it only after carefully investigating, instead of taking it as a favor from some friend or by over-persuasion of the clever solicitor, he would take it because he knew it was what he needed and wanted. He would strive more successfully to find a way to meet the premiums and keep the policy in force though it strained his resources to do so.

The Human Touch.

Life insurance advertising needs the human touch, such power of appeal as that possessed by the genius who prepared an advertisement for a home-owner who had decided to sell out and go West. The ad expert read the proof of the "For Sale" advertisement to the advertiser. "I've changed my mind" the owner exclaimed. "That house is not for sale. I never appreciated before what an exceptional piece of property I own."

I should say that 60 per cent. of lapses represent men who have not been sold. They have not stayed sold. They were persuaded, but not convinced. Life insurance is still an expense to them.

The insurance business is growing better each year. The world is growing wiser and better every day we live. I just want to leave with you gentlemen a few additional thoughts before I close that each of us may apply to ourselves as well as to others. In every life insurance there are two risks—one is one the man; the other is on his life. A man may be physically all right and yet not be a good risk, because otherwise he is all wrong.

When a man is wrong the chances are against his living out the number of years the actuaries allot him in the insurance tables. A building may be absolutely fireproof in itself, and therefore a most excellent risk; but the tenant in this building may be engaged in manufacturing an article that is highly inflammable or explosive, and so the risk as a whole is rendered a very undesirable one. The human body is not unlike a building or a house. There is a tenant inside.

The body—that is, the house—may be all right, but the tenant occupying the house may have some careless or perhaps vicious habits which are a constant menace to the body and which render the insurance of his life a poor risk. When it comes to insuring the body—the house in which we live—almost any of the companies which you gentlemen represent will, for a proper yearly premium, take the risk and issue the policy.

No company has yet been organized to write up insurance on the tenant who lives inside this human house. Yet you do not ignore this moral hazard. The fact is, the tenant in each human body must and should carry his own individual insurance. He must take out a policy by himself, with himself and on himself. This kind of individual life insurance is as old as the race. It began with Adam, and it will end in eternity.

The Ten Commandments.

The Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer and the Sermon on the Mount contain all the law that can be found in a library of 5,000 volumes. There is hardly a statute in this State or any other—political, civil or criminal—the genesis and inspiration of which cannot be found in the Bible. It has been well said that "the man who has been trained to learn and obey the Ten Commandments will acquire an uprightness of character and steadfastness of purpose attainable in no other way."

The Lord's Prayer contains in its every sentence something that refers to human experience and meets human needs. In the introduction to the Sermon on the Mount, "we are taught humility, sobriety, mercifulness and purity." In the rest of the Master's great sermon we have the higher meaning of the moral law expounded and illustrated, and by its use we are enabled to understand more fully the meaning of the Ten Commandments.

The Ten Commandments, then, were really the first laws ever enacted with respect to insurance of life. They are written into every policy and are a vital part of every contract. He does not play the true part who does not know this to be true. The best policy, therefore, that a man can take out is the one he takes out with himself, based on the Mosaic self-insurance plan.

Introspective.

The Decalogue suggests the questions he should ask himself, answering as carefully and as truthfully as though he were filling out an application for a million-dollar policy in one of the largest companies.

He should take out this policy, knowing that if he violates any of its terms or provisions there is an automatic cancellation without notice, and charges will be made at short rate against his family, as in fire insurance. As a matter of fact, many of us, from our habits of living, would seem to need a policy carrying a fire clause as a sort of asbestos blanket for the hereafter.

Some of the questions suggested to be answered in an application for the Ten Commandment policy are these:

What is first in his life?

What is the right way to live each day?

What are the gods of this man?

How much time does the tenant in this body give to the improvement of himself?

Is he spending all his time and thought and energy on the house in which he lives and neglecting the moral, mental and spiritual health?

Is he clean in thought and life; is he honest, truthful and charitable?

Has he respect for his own person and that of others?

Some of the special features of this policy are as follows: If you fail to meet your premiums as they are due they will be charged up, with interest added, to your children.

They will have to settle "unto the third and fourth generations." They will be all their lives paying your neglected obligations. If you keep up your premiums of right thinking, right doing and right living, your children will receive a priceless endowment in the form of a sound mind in a healthy body, and they and your heirs forever will receive an annuity in the form of an inspiring influence from the memory of a life well spent.

This self-insurance policy also has endowment features: You will reap many benefits in a peaceful and well stored mind and a healthy body before the end of your life.

The fact is, this kind of a policy always combines the endowment with the straight life. There is another feature in this policy not to be overlooked—it has loan values beyond the tables of the actuaries. There is nothing like character as a financial asset.

A man's bank account may be low, but if he has by right living inspired a friend to believe in him, he has the best collateral in all the world, one not measured by the dollar mark. One of our greatest men gave expression to this thought not so long ago.

Another feature is that, after you have kept up your premiums for a number of years, the policy will carry itself.

You will have acquired the habit of doing the right thing. You will have secured a paid-up endowment and straight-life policy in one.

This, then, is what life insurance really means to your customers and to yourselves. Its real values are not to be measured in dollars and cents. They go beyond those while retaining them.

They are moral.

They have to do with life at its deepest and highest.

They make men.

It is a great field of service to society, making for better living, higher thinking and nobler feeling, which is all there is in life worth living—all there is in life insurance worth the labor of achievement.

We need the accent placed on the duty insurance owes to mankind to lead it into greater realization of its duty to the future.

To view it in any feebleness of light is to rob yourself of the glory of achievement and defraud your fellow-men of the best you have to give.

New System of Registration Proves Great Improvement.

John R. Fox, president of the Philadelphia association, was chairman of the Registration and Information Committee. The registration booth was to the left of the entrance of the Steel Pier and space had been provided for a dozen people to register at one time. Instead of the system which has been in use at conventions of the National Association for many years past, cards had been provided to be filled out by those presenting themselves at the booth. These cards were then passed in and the delegates, alternates or guests were given the official badge and other paraphernalia. The cards were then filed alphabetically by name and duplicate cards were made and filed alphabetically by associations. By means of this system of registration all congestion and confusion was obviated. Delegates, alternates or guests who desired information as to friends or associates who might be in attendance at the convention could and frequently did apply at the registration booth. Accurate information was immediately given by a young man in charge of this filing system.

The associates of Mr. Fox were: John W. Clegg, Philadelphia; Perez F. Huff, New York; F. H. Garrigues, Philadelphia; A. C. Hirsh, Philadelphia; Walter E. Long, Philadelphia; Eugene O. Mosier, Philadelphia; Lawrence Priddy, New York; H. Leon Reeves, Philadelphia; George E. Schilling, Philadelphia; D. G. C. Sinclair, New York; Samuel S. Voshell, New York.

For Ten Years

from 1900 to 1909, inclusive, The Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company maintained without change its very liberal dividend scale adopted in 1900, when the current premium rates were adopted. Furthermore, the Company has largely increased the liberality of its already extremely liberal policies, making the added benefits, in so far as possible, available to old members as well as new. Because of a very favorable mortality experience, and an economical administration of its business, the Mutual Benefit was able in 1910 not only to increase its regular dividend scale for policies issued since 1900, but in addition to apportion a special dividend to participating policyholders amounting to $675,000. In 1912 the Mutual Benefit made a general increase in dividends to policyholders; also, after adding to its suspended mortality fund (which stands as a bulwark behind the mortality assumptions of the scale), the Company set aside a dividend equalization fund to the credit of policyholders.

From this fund, in 1913, another special dividend of $867,000 has been apportioned to policyholders.

The 1913 Special Dividend

marks the CONSUMMATION OF THE 1912 PROGRAM of insurance benefits outlined last year.

The contingency reserves adopted in 1912 are not required by law, but are set aside voluntarily as a demonstration of the

The rules for determining the proper amount of surplus for the Company to hold, and for determining the proper dividends to policyholders (THERE BEING NO STOCKHOLDERS), were formulated after a careful investigation of the whole subject of surplus and dividends, based upon the PROGRESS SHOWN BY COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND CONSERVATION.

An Institutional Movement Prompted by Practical Business Motives and an Altruistic Desire to Render More Efficient Service to the Public at Large.

Address of Warren M. Horner, Chairman of the Committee on Education and Conservation.

In view of the fact that the Outlook Magazine in a recent issue very courteously refers to and quotes from a communication received from me, and for the further fact that that communication contains ideas with respect to the economic relation of life insurance to the people which is pertinent to the question we are to discuss to-day, I deem it advisable to read to the convention the exact words contained in the paper forwarded over my signature to the Outlook:

"Pride and independence must be reckoned with in every human being. The people of the United States are more interested in education and training for efficiency to the end that they may be of value to themselves and the State, than they are in any scheme of outside help which does not call for the exercise of their own brain and muscle to make them self-supporting."

People Not Interested in Paternalistic Plans.

The people are more interested in opportunity for industrial freedom and the exercise of equal business rights and in earned rewards through bonus, or profit-sharing system, and old age incomes from the sources for which they have labored than they are in any paternalistic plan on the part of the State or through the medium of swollen fortunes. The people of the country, as a whole, are anxious, in fact their pride demands, that there be a direct connection between the sweat of their brows and their support, including old age, when active employment must cease.

A large proportion of the time and money spent in charity, outside the assistance rendered those mentally and physically incapacitated for work, is worse than wasted because it tends to promote mendicants and make others industrially inefficient and of little or no value to themselves or the community.

The people, all the people, should be taught the pleasure of creating something of value, and of earning their own support through habits of industry and directly applied energy.

They should be shown the wisdom of habits of saving and the necessity of providing for unforeseen events and their own old age.

The people of the United States waste so much each year that any estimate of the amount, measured in dollars, would be only guesswork. However, the waste, including time wasted, probably equals or exceeds the total value of their production. The principal sources of causes of waste are loss of time, unscientific methods, waste of raw material and finished product, extravagant expenditures, lack of conservation of natural resources, lack of conservation of human life through inadequate safeguards against accident and in prevention of disease, and finally, the lack of conservation of human life in not carrying an adequate amount of life insurance as an offset against loss by death, or as a substitute for the cessation of earning power at the beginning of old age.

Conservation of Human Life.

The most important conservation problem before the American people is the conservation of human life. There are some phases of the conservation of human life not embraced by or connected with sound life insurance, but there are a great many more important things involved in life insurance which are fundamental in the conservation of life than most people realize.

These are: The death benefit, preventing the family from becoming social dependents; the payment of money into a business as indemnity against loss of the earning power of some individual; the supplying of a definite sum of money at the beginning of old age, or an income during declining years.

Life insurance has also done much to minimize pauperism in this country. It will do vastly more as the people acquire a more enlightened understanding of its scope and benefits. The mere nature of life insurance contracts, and the method of payment therefor, instills habits of foresight and frugality in the individual. The method of physical examination suggests care of health and prevention of disease, and individual companies do much toward the conservation of human life in promoting care of health and hygienic measures.

The National Association of Life Underwriters has established an educational and conservation bureau for the dissemination of non-partisan information of fact and interest to the public on insurance matters in general. This bureau will co-operate with institutions of learning, public and private, to promote insurance education, better fitting the younger generation to intelligently buy life insurance or engage in the business as a vocation.

This bureau is an institutional movement prompted by legitimate, practical business motives and an altruistic desire by the leading agents of the country to render more efficient service to the public at large, and to create a better spirit of understanding between the people on one side and life insurance on the other.

Life insurance has not been properly understood in its economic and beneficent relation to the people. It is in reality the conservation of human life. The public, and all too many agents, have not understood that an individual commercially speaking, is in reality only a human machine, and a frail one at that, and as such has a definite but perishable value which must be insured against loss by death or wearing out in old age.

A Great Service.

Too small a percentage of life insurance agents themselves recognize that they are called to a work of large import and have the opportunity to render a great service to humanity. A life insurance agent who does not understand the economic application of what he is doing, and rise to its professional attainments, is a positive detriment to the business. The life insurance companies are as babes in the woods in the method of appointing and training agents, and the States are equally as lax and unscientific in licensing the agents whom the companies appoint. The proper and adequate purchase of a life insurance policy or the care and selection of an individual's insurance over a term of years calls for a professional service, personally rendered by a trained individual possessing integrity and intelligence of the highest order.

There should be a uniform State law requiring an examination to test the knowledge and fitness of every applicant for a license to transact the life insurance business.

Legislators over the country would do well to pay earnest attention to this point, and also see that such laws were enacted as would make it impossible for new companies to be floated by spurious stock-selling schemes. They should make it difficult to organize new companies (which are not backed by sufficient integrity and experience) to prey upon the people.

Unjust Taxation.

It is these matters that deserve attention from legislators, and not the taxing of life insurance companies and life insurance funds, which tax has already reached a point beyond reason or justice, working an absolute loss and detriment to the policyholders. A tax upon life insurance, above the cost of State supervision, is a tax upon thrift and economy, and a direct discrimination against funds intended for widows and orphans, and is not a tax upon a corporation, but upon the individual who pays the premiums, or his beneficiaries.

There is a legitimate community of interest between the people and life insurance, and this relation should be understood and promoted and cemented by a spirit of unity and co-operation. No system of finance has yet been devised which even approaches the good rendered humanity by sound life insurance. The people are more interested in banding together in bodies under a safe and practical plan of co-operation, as exemplified in our sound life insurance companies, for indemnifying themselves against the known and unknown conditions incident to death and old age than they are in any charitable or paternalistic institution. A sound, well-managed life insurance company which standardizes its field representatives is more in tune with true Americanism, and in keeping with the pride and independence of the people, and better promotes their industrial efficiency than any organized charity or paternalistic institution fathered by the State or founded upon swollen fortunes.

A great deal of unintelligent criticism by muck-rakers is passed upon life insurance premiums as being too high. The premiums as charged by sound life insurance companies are no higher than is absolutely necessary to guard against all the known and unknown conditions concerned in the financial permanency of the companies. Security is the all-important point of interest to the people.

The old established life insurance companies have stood all the tests of permanency and adequacy of the legal reserve system in this country, and there is a determined movement on the part of the whole institution of legal reserve insurance to standardize the business and render better service to the insuring public.

Reliable Representatives.

This better service embraces matters of detail in the care of an individual's life insurance affairs by a reliable and competent representative in the field.

So many new companies have been formed during recent years that a word of comment in regard to these companies is important. New companies organized by men of strict integrity, with long training and experience in the business, founded upon the legal reserve plan, are entitled to the confidence of the people. However, as someone said a great many years ago in regard to assessment insurance, "Too many of them are formed either upon woeful ignorance or designing fraud, and whichever of the two basic evils impels the formation of a company it spells the same disastrous result to the people. The people need, therefore, to look thoroughly into the traditions of the representatives of a new company, and those who have not learned the experience through unfortunate losses need to be admonished against buying stock in such companies, especially where a large commission is paid someone for the sale of the stock.

The people in every walk of life are striving to live decently and acquire a competence for old age. Sound life insurance is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, aid to the end at which they are aiming. Therefore it is reasonable, and in fact necessary, that there should be an intelligent spirit of co-operation between the people themselves and their representatives, law-making officials and the institution of insurance as represented by company officers and the agents. That legislation should be directed toward securing better service by standardized field representation than toward an illegitimate, unjust or overburdensome taxation.

Lack of Intelligent Co-operation.

A spirit of antagonistic and unintelligent dealing is destructive to the companies and, what is more important, to the interests of the people—just as antagonism and lack of intelligent co-operation is responsible for most of the economic and social problems confronting the American people.

There are so many very able men who are going to speak to you on the subject of the education and conservation movement involving an institutional advertisement, and my own views have been so positively and frequently stated, that I will but briefly discuss this subject this afternoon.

If it were cloudy at Atlantic City to-day and someone told you it would be brighter and lighter if the sun shone, you would have just cause for feeling that an offense had been aimed at your sense of reasoning. A cloud is hanging over the business of life insurance, and instruction through the medium of educational institutions, public and private, and by means of an institutional advertisement will turn on the light.

I want to say to the gentlemen present representing the daily and insurance press that the life insurance business is the greatest business in the world and the least comprehended and understood as a business and in its economic and beneficent relation to humanity. The life insurance agent who is properly following his calling is ministering to humanity in the capacity of the clergyman, the doctor, the educator, and he is heading off the charity worker, and his vocation calls for mental development in discernment of human nature, and as counsellor and adviser is second not even to the profession of law. I make this statement to emphasize the fact that this movement springs from unbounded enthusiasm and abiding confidence in the business of life insurance conducted as it should be with an intelligent community of interest between the people, the companies and the agents.

The men who are urging this movement are not agitators, and they recognize the value and necessity of the closest spirit of amity and co-operation between the companies on one side and the agents on the other. For that reason it is proposed that the agents of the country contribute the funds necessary to inaugurate this campaign on the same basis that the companies were asked to defray the expenses, namely, five cents per thousand on the basis of individual production, and five cents per thousand on the basis of agency production.

The Ox-team Method.

The president of a prominent company commented recently upon the lack of understanding of the people in regard to life insurance, mentioning especially the matter of policy loans, recommending that the agents of that company indulge in a campaign of education. The agents of the country have been indulging in a campaign of education for a great many years. They have improved conditions, but men of experience in the field recognize that the process of word of mouth and shoe leather, unaided by printer's ink, is the ox-team method.

People read to-day, and if life insurance as an institution cannot and does not construct institutional reading matter that will educate the people in regard to life insurance in its many ramifications, then that is the fault of the business, and not the fact that the people do not need educating and that they are not ready to receive it.

Did you ever stand in a busy thoroughfare in a crowded city and see the automobiles and electric vehicles rush by and hear the whirring of the trolley car, and think of the electric light and telephone in the buildings about you, and have almost an occult feeling as if you were transported to another planet because of the modern inventions and conveyances about you? Then did you ever make comparison in your mind as to the advancement of field conditions in life insurance in the last generation?

A Union of All Forces.

Let me read from the Insurance Field of August 29, 1913:

"There is no error in pressing the point that although things are and have been improving in life insurance they can be made much better by a union of all the forces that are behind it to educate the public in its great beneficence and usefulness. The rule has always been to take fortune at its flood—to strike when the iron is hot."

Notice the expression, "Union of all the forces." Ah, gentlemen, there is the point about which this whole proposition swings. The people have been threshed to death with extreme partisanship. No two agents tell them the same thing and no two companies recommend the same kind of insurance as meeting the economic requirements of the policyholder, the one who pays the premiums. For once in the history of American life insurance we have the opportunity to come together upon a common plane and strike while "the iron is hot."

The Outlook in its issue of last week very ably puts the situation in the statement:

"If this bureau fulfils the function thus outlined, if its animating spirit is not to garner more premiums or write a greater volume of life insurance, but to insure—we purposely lay emphasis on the word insure—more people against the privation of death or of old age, it will perform a great and useful work."

EQUIPMENT

The Columbian National Life Insurance Company is a corporation chartered by and conducted under the laws of the State of Massachusetts, transacting the business of Life Insurance on the non-participating plan, and also a commercial Accident and Health business. No company has a more complete equipment of policy contracts, in both Departments, designed to meet every legitimate need for insurance protection. Every contract is clearly and briefly expressed in definite language, so as to be readily understood by insured and beneficiary. Specimens cheerfully furnished to friends or competitors.

The Company has no present opportunities among its Life general agencies, but will be glad to correspond with agents desiring a direct connection with a growing and progressive Accident Department.

THE COLUMBIAN NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

ARTHUR E. CHILDS, President

WILLIAM C. JOHNSON, Vice-President and General Manager

Let us use our reason and not our prejudice in deciding this proposition. Is it not true that the situation demands attention? Is it not psychologically sound and reasonable that when the people read about life insurance and get the same story in the different magazines and the daily press, and learn to recognize that the information is institutional and not partisan, it will have the desired effect?

During the present summer I have stood for over an hour on more than one occasion in the hot sun when it was a hundred degrees in the shade, talking to an Iowa farmer who did not carry a dollar of life insurance. This experience with an intelligent class of farmers more than ever imbued me with the idea that institutional advertising of life insurance is a practical proposition—and it is a pre-eminently practical proposition—but that experience and close attention to the matter in other ways for eleven months has convinced me that it is a duty resting upon the shoulders of insurance men, which responsibility cannot be shirked or ignored. If a farmer and his wife (do not forget the women in this proposition) read about life insurance in their daily and farm papers and current magazines, and you send an intelligent and reliable agent to them, the problem is solved.

Part-Time Agents.

Those who differ with John I. D. Bristol, of New York, in regard to his decided stand on the proposition of part-time agents make the claim that, if Mr. Bristol were transacting business in an agricultural State his views and practices would be different from what they now are.

I am trying to do business in the States of Minnesota, Iowa and South Dakota. If this association will adopt and carry out the idea of an institutional advertisement I will take my chances in these three great agricultural States, and against the other fellow who keeps up the practice of appointing the pseudo agent, the part-time agent and the unreliable and unintelligent agent.

Only recently the statement has been made to me, as it has been made more than once during the year, that the companies were not in favor of this plan because some were already writing their legal limit and others approaching the limitation. To begin with, if representation is standardized, the legal limit, which can be raised, would not be so much of a factor, and the men drawing the commissions paid by the companies would be making a living wage, and the people, the policyholders, the ones who pay the premiums, would be receiving an adequate and deserved service. The Honorable J. A. O. Preus, Commissioner of the State of Minnesota, a commissioner who is doing some real life insurance thinking, says:

"In this State and in most other States, the Commissioner of Insurance is obliged to license anyone to solicit life insurance who applies for a license. A man who is a milliner or a horseshoer can obtain a license and become the adviser of his fellow man."

Startling Statistics.

Perhaps you think this a rambling discussion, and I am sorry that I did not have the time to prepare nor to read here a complete address covering this topic somewhat in the nature of that read at the Insurance Congress in Seattle last June. However, with some companies writing their limit and others approaching it, with pseudo and part-time agents, and with plenty of those whose lack of intelligence and integrity disgrace the profession, the fact remains that the people of this country are only indemnified through the medium of life insurance to the extent of $28,000,000,000, or only about $300 for every man, woman and child in the United States; that nearly $10,000,000,000 of this amount is not the kind of insurance you sell, and sooner or later must be converted into sound insurance, the kind you sell; that the insurance you sell is only indemnifying the men, women and children against all future contingencies by life insurance to the extent of $200 per capita; that the total amount of insurance carried is only about $1,500 for each bread-winner, or the amount of the kind of insurance you sell only about $1,000 for the head of each family. Ten thousand dollars legal reserve insurance in standard companies for each family head, or $180,000,000,000, is not too much insurance for the fathers and sons to carry in this country.

Is education in life insurance necessary? Is an intelligent use of printer's ink imperative? Do you want to combine in these things in a spirit of common brotherhood, or shall we continue to tear at each other's throats and let other world movements stand by and jeer at our ox-cart methods, and the people remain in ignorance of the true functions of sound life insurance?

If you are an agent writing $200,000 a year, is it not worth $10 a year to you? If you are writing $300,000, is it not worth $15 a year to you, and if you are writing $400,000, is it not worth $20, and if you are writing $500,000, is it not worth $25? If you are the head of an agency organization and you are writing $1,000,000, is it not worth $50 a year to you, and if you are writing $2,000,000, is it not worth $100 a year, and if you are writing $5,000,000, is it not worth $250, and if you are writing $10,000,000, is it not worth $500 to you?

Much work has been done and lines well laid to carry this plan of general education in life insurance and institutional advertising in life insurance to a practical and successful fruition. You and other insurance men over the United States are given the opportunity to come together in a spirit of common brotherhood in rendering an enormous service to your fellowmen and, coincident with this service to humanity, you are given the opportunity to increase your incomes and raise the great profession in which you are engaged to its true position in the world's work.

Convention Notes.

Many of the pioneers of the National Association were unable to attend the convention because of illness and other unavoidable causes. However, there was a goodly number of the veterans on hand and much in evidence, although I. Layton Register, of Philadelphia, who was chairman of the Entertainment Committee, wired his regrets at not being able to be present. The other members of this committee were: C. W. Anderson, New York; Joseph Ashbrook, Philadelphia; Tilden Blodgett, New York; Richard E. Cochran, New York; Ezra De Forest, New York; Joseph A. Goulden, New York; Henry C. Lippincott, Philadelphia; Everett H. Plummer, Philadelphia; Charles H. Raymond, New York; William M. Scott, Philadelphia; Amos Wakelin, Philadelphia.

The reception at the Marlborough-Blenheim on Tuesday evening fully measured up to all anticipations, and the Reception Committee, of which Edward P. Langley, of Philadelphia, was chairman, deserves much credit. Mr. Langley was assisted by James H. Glenn, Philadelphia; Julian S. Myrick, New York; H. Kendall Read, Philadelphia; George F. Schilling, Philadelphia; R. M. Simons, New York. A sub-committee of ladies consisted of Mrs. Florence E. Shaal, of Boston; Miss Sara Jones, Chicago; Mrs. Eugene O. Mosier, Philadelphia; Mrs. Everett M. Ensign, New York.

Other committees having local arrangements to look after were the Press Committee, the Banquet Committee and the Banquet Ticket Committee.

Special attention had been paid by the General Convention Committee to the decorations in the ballroom on the Steel Pier. Canadian and American flags were festooned and draped from the balconies, and an isle of immense palm and bay trees led from the main entrance of the ballroom to the seats. An artistic arrangement of palms and ferns on the stage made an ideal background for the speakers and officers.

There was no business session of the convention Wednesday afternoon. The General Committee had chartered four of the safest and speediest yachts for the entire afternoon. The boats left the Inlet Pier at twenty minute intervals, and those who took the sail were exceedingly enthusiastic over the trip.

There were also a number of company gatherings and an informal dance in the grotto of the Hotel Rudolph.

EFFICIENCY METHODS IN THE SOLICITATION OF LIFE INSURANCE.

Real Progress Made by the Elimination of Waste, Transformation of Losses Into Profits and the Creation of By-products—All Standards Constantly Reaching Higher Levels.

Address of Winslow Russell, Agency Manager, Phoenix Mutual Life Insurance Company, Hartford, Conn.

These are great days in which we live. The increasing demands upon men and women to supply the world's needs in every direction are adding responsibilities to those whose leadership places them in positions where right decisions mean so much to the many who seek their councils.

Men and women everywhere are realizing this, and standards are going higher with each day. Upon all sides are heard the pressing demands for greater efficiency. Students in every line learn that real progress can be made by the application of methods which accomplish the elimination of waste, and which will transform losses into profits and create by-products never dreamed of in the rush and crush of competitive standards of the past.

With these general studies have come different standards in our own profession. There have been times when free and frank platform discussions and interchange of ideas between competitors in our business were harder to get than we find it to-day. Henry Van Dyke, in describing happiness, says: "Once it was not mine, and then it was mine, and now it is mine, but not alone"; and the standards of the real business life to-day are such that it is a joy to share with others, even our closest competitors, those things which we have found helpful to our own.

We should have a greater community of interest in this business of life insurance than in almost any other, and if by any interchange of ideas we can help to make success more real for those who enter our profession, we shall at the same time be contributing much to prevent unnecessary failures which for years have marked the course of this business.

And so we are here to exchange views on efficiency methods. No one institution has yet found the only panacea for all the ills of the business. Many underwriters present may be far beyond the standard of efficiency which is presented at this time. Some of the plans here suggested may not be workable in many fields, and if, from the study of some facts presented, there shall come an aroused desire in the mind of one person to do his or her larger share in more efficiently contributing to the highest possible standard, then the half hour which we spend together will not be in vain.

The subject to be represented may leave greater suggestion in your minds if we here resort to charts. We are to deal with suggestions for greater efficiency in agency building, and shall present it all in very simple terms. Chart No. 1 presents two requisites for the high standard of efficiency.

FIRST REQUISITE: EFFICIENCY IN THE HOME OFFICE.

Knowledge of field conditions.
Sympathy with field problems.
Well-developed service.

SECOND REQUISITE: FIELD EFFICIENCY.

Managers who manage.
Agents who succeed.
Satisfied policyholders.

A Home Office inefficient in its field methods ought not to expect too much from its agents, either in quantity of business or the all-important question of quality.

If there is to be skill in its agency department the executives will require that those who deal with the field problems shall carefully study and know the field conditions.

When agency officials appreciate what the real problems of their staff are, there will be a greater sympathy with all those whose work is so important to the company's welfare.

When the Home Office puts into its own efficiency program the real spirit which knowledge and sympathy will suggest, it will find that its great responsibility is to render a service to its soliciting force which is constantly being developed and improved to meet changing conditions.

The field service of 1906 will never again apply to the field conditions of 1913 or 1914, and a rate book and desk will be but a small contribution to the success of the man who gets them.

When high-grade service is applied the second requisite is in real process of accomplishment, and the company is found to possess among its best assets a corps of managers who manage, a steadily increasing number of agents who succeed, and these two mean a healthy body of well-satisfied policyholders.

If real efficiency in agency work is to prevail, it must have certain well-established underlying principles upon which a general plan may be worked out. No haphazard work will accomplish permanent results. A helpful chart is here used, taken from Prof. Walter Dill Scott's book, "Increasing Human Efficiency in Business." Two young men were given the "Chinese Ring Puzzle" to solve. Each one tried it ten times. The first one took a considerable period in studying the solution and found the principle, solving it each of the other nine times in less than half a minute. The second one sought no principle, and the chart shows him struggling away at the tenth attempt almost as hard as in the first. The time consumed by the man who used a method was less than one-fifth that which the second man used.

And so it is in handling the agency end of the life insurance business. Agency officials, managers or general agents who are in the rut of haphazard methods will find, as Hugh Chalmers well said to us a few years ago, that "the only difference between a rut and a grave is in the width and the depth." Carefully made plans and efficient service will make unhappy agents happy and will conserve their time and energy, and sometimes transform failures into successes.

The third chart—

HOME OFFICE.

Field men of quality rather than business in quantity.
FIELD.

The rate of commission does not necessarily determine the agent's compensation.

means that when the Home Office meets the requirements detailed upon the first chart it will discover that "men" are more important in the long run than "volume." Upon the other hand, when the manager gets his "efficiency program" ready for action, he may discover that "rates of commissions" are not the sole requisite to secure the all-important "incomes" for his men. It is likely that there were more failures among solicitors in the old days on 80 and 90 per cent. contracts than there are in the present days at half that, and the agent may have a 75 per cent. contract and earn only $3 a week.

The next four charts points to some important conclusions that are worth careful study. No. 4 says:

INEFFICIENT, UNTRAINED SMALL

producers cost good producers money.

The greatest efficiency in AGENCY BUILDING can be brought about by subtraction rather than by addition.

Now Then!

A close study of the facts which prompted the first half of this chart cannot fail to convince the student that the development of progressive agency building service for increasing the business of the good men in our agencies, is almost hourly impeded by the losses of time and money in working to secure and hold men who are unable to earn a livelihood, and who are for the most part too indolent or feeble to get themselves into a successful atmosphere from one year to another.

Think the problem through, ladies and gentlemen and the second half of the chart will perhaps appeal to us. It is probably a fair statement to make that the greatest need in the business to-day is to subtract from our agency organization rather than to add—so far as numbers are concerned.

Perhaps the suggestion in the next chart will help us to clinch the argument.

Sixty-four thousand licensed agents in New York, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania in 1912.

Five New England Companies doing about the same amount of business had 3,300 agents who produced less than $15,000 each in 1912.

	Total Agents.	Under $15,000.

No. 2.....	1,054	725
No. 3.....	1,045	731
No. 4.....	669	420
No. 5.....	647	421
	4,655	3,097

66.5 per cent. of their producing force did about 10 per cent. of their business.

Deduct, if you please, a considerable number from the 64,000 who represent the industrial companies, and then some more for the men who are licensed by more than one company, and some people will not find it hard to conclude that insurance companies and their managers have made it too easy for men to receive commissions under the title of "agents." And if further proof is needed the second half of the chart may supply it. Is it too frank to say to you that real good men will probably not be attracted to our business as a profession so long as we allow such a situation to continue?

Chart No. 6 continues the argument.

One New England Company had 419 men in 1912 who paid for less than $100 in new premiums.

Total premiums	$17,621
Average premiums	42
Average earnings at 40 per cent.....	16

We are at a point now where it is your right to ask for some remedy, and one is suggested in this chart:

ONE REMEDY. Elimination of the weak ones.

Higher training and better service for the strong ones.

To weed out is not sufficient in a new efficiency program, for in too many cases it might be that there would be nothing left. Unless with the process of elimination there shall be a plan ready to put into operation which shall make for higher training and improved service for those who are succeeding, the work will not be complete.

The plans and results noted on the remaining charts are offered for the purpose of showing that certain definite results may be obtained by very simple methods. They may be varied to suit differing conditions, and it must be remembered that the most efficient plans may come to naught in inefficient hands.

A FEW SUGGESTIONS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF AGENCY SERVICE.

CORRESPONDENCE COURSE IN SALESMANSHIP.

- Beginners.
- Graduates.
- Developing daily reports.
- Consecutive weekly production bulletins.
- Weekly or monthly meetings of agents.
- Allotment contests.
- Reports of hours and prospects.

Courses in salesmanship are not new in our business, but there is little room for doubt that in building an agency organization of men new to the business something of this kind should be done. Sometimes it is difficult to make good men see the necessity of this, especially when with somewhat wider experience they see beginners studying the same course. This may be partly overcome by the use of an advanced or graduates' course.

The matter of developing prospects is too important to pass lightly, and we take it up in connection with later charts.

The "weekly" production bulletins may be used effectively if care is used that "weekly" is not spelled "weakly," and their efficiency will be greatly increased if, beside each producer's name, there always appears the number of consecutive weeks in which he has produced business. Many cases may be shown where men who were previously irregular in their production became good agents to their respective agencies by that competitive spirit aroused in them when, after producing twenty weeks, they realized that without an application for the current week, the Honor Roll would for the next week show "one" instead of "twenty-one" beside their name. We know of an instance where this spirit has already kept one man, previously a failure, upon the list as a producer for 230 consecutive weeks, and many others ranging from 130 down to sixty, and these men are all in a contest with themselves to get at least one application a week.

In some territories weekly meetings of agents are feasible; in others once a month, while in nearly every life agency a quarterly meeting is worth consideration. A self-officered organization can be made effective, and especially so if contracts are uniform. We know of one local agency staff that unanimously voted to reduce the commissions on 20 Payment Life policies 5 per cent., the manager taking no part in the discussion except to state the necessity for such reduction at the beginning.

Allotment contests are always invigorating to an agency, and should be classified as far as possible with a view to gradual increase each year.

Vital to the whole subject of efficiency is the necessity for helping the agent to realize his sense of "proprietorship" when he signs a contract. His time may previously have been recorded upon a time clock. The chances are that he has for years worked for some one for whom he had to work a given number of hours. Release this obligation and give a life insurance agent his time as his own, and unless he has a full realization of what it means he will soon be working "short hours." Any plan to suggest the value of his time will be helpful, and our later charts will show a few results from our method of doing this.

Let us now return to Chart No. 9:

Now, approaching the final charts: No efficiency program can be complete without a plan continually before the solicitor which he knows is practical and not theoretical, and which he may have before him daily, or better still, committed to memory.

The "standard" as shown in Chart 12 has been proven of value, and a study of the figures will convince one that it is both conservative and practical.

If a solicitor obtains five interviews per day for twenty-six days in a month, the average number of cases closed out of the 130 interviews will be nine—and, followed out, his new commission earnings, conservative figure, will equal $3,024 for the year as a minimum.

But we said just a little while ago that few solicitors realized the fact that their time was their own, and in order to reach this "standard" some plan should be ready that will aid him in forming habits of industry. Such a plan will require an initiative, and if a man is of the right sort he will see it to his advantage to conserve his time by making definite reports of the number of hours he spends in his canvass, the number of calls, interviews, etc.

Chart No. 13 shows one form of tabulating this data, which should be properly carded and the results discussed frequently at agency meetings.

To further establish the fact that the "standard" shown in the last chart is conservative, we need only to say that a few figures will show that if a man obtained five interviews per day for twenty-six days during a period of six months, he would have secured 780 interviews in six months, and applying this figure to the "standard" commission earnings for the same period, we shall find the value of each interview to be $1.93.

is shown merely to clinch the argument, if need be, that a definite efficiency plan may be made effective. This chart shows the six months' record of fifteen men who reported as members of the Efficiency Staff. It also shows the records of the same men for the first six months of 1912 without any report which might tend to conserve their time and energy.

To briefly sum up the whole: We believe that it is important to adopt some very definite plans for continually improving service for those who enter our ranks. Experience shows that the best men come from other lines and know practically nothing of our business. Many of them have been selling things that appeal solely to men's heads. To the selfish man. We must train them directly away from that—to the straight heart appeal. To train men to interest others in investing their means in an unselfish way is no easy task.

Happy are the agency officers of a life insurance company who can make of themselves a background for a policy that will transform the ideals of their salesmen, who by patient training and careful planning are able to make over a cold, calculating piece of machinery into a successful minister of the gospel of protection for loved ones.

Happy the general agent who, by farseeing methods, is willing to forego a few of the immediate benefits that some time seem to come to unscrupulous competitors, and patiently bide the time when he, by clean methods, has carefully gathered about him a corps of solicitors who work for the love of their office as well as the necessary money compensation.

Happy the solicitor who, by close study and efficient co-operation with the general agent and the Home Office, builds up a clientele of men and women who rise up and call him blessed because he has been the means of convincing those who have passed on that a part of the plan of life was to live on through the unselfish deeds done in the flesh. Let no opportunity slip away from us, fellow underwriters, to build our part of the foundation right before God and man.

"CREATIVE SOLICITING, RATHER THAN COMPETITIVE."

First Prize Essay.

By George W. Johnston, President, The Johnston & Collins Company, General Agents, The Travelers Insurance Company, New York City.

Competitive soliciting sells insurance by proving from comparative statistics that there are many poor companies and a single good one. This enriches second-rate agents, enables ignoramus to pose as experts, and is showy because the light is in a vacuum. For muddling a clear subject it is ideal; the method originated with the squid. It is as needless as using quantitative analysis to sell wheat, and false as figures. In malignant, destructive force, it is identical with rebating and twisting. As a gentleman's occupation, it blends piracy with garbage handling.

Now, in an era of sanity, is the time to stop it. The trend is forward; management grows not clean merely but aseptic; we work under microscopes. Feudal warfare ceases; from old discords and barbarisms is evolving a code of ethics. Amid such renaissance this evil survives like weeds among crops, half-tamed brutish instincts or inherited blood taint; an anachronism, echo of inquisitions, a harking back to bigotry. It violates the true professional creed—not self alone, but Insurance!

Fair Competition.

Nobody objects to fair competition, which is the life of life insurance. It is keener to-day than ever, insurers more critical, agents abler. Dreamers say insurance sells itself; let them try it! We are zealous or starve. Some things, though, are taboo: poisoned weapons, the stiletto. Bankers never villify bankers, or doctors belittle doctors. Only quacks practise insurance defamation. It robs better men. It obstructs, for buyers are not fools; rings false, arouses suspicion. It fails; nobody wins woman's love or man's confidence decrying rivals. It worse than fails; it kills business; the listener, puzzled, bored by controversy, concludes insurance is a mystery, all companies questionable. Such work is no profession, only a sorry trade.

Who are we that sink so low? We boast of our mission as apostles of altruism. Then live our gospel! Be no selfish hypocrites! Paralleling obligation to insure is our obligation—though for others, all others—clients, companies, brother agents. Others originated insurance; we are but heirs through grace, tenants at sufferance, trustees. Let us then create, not destroy; help, not hinder, our whole great institution; say of rivals what we would have rivals say of us; make it easier for other men to sell, so that everywhere the most possible families may be safeguarded, age universally sheltered, insurance grow in respect and affection.

Success begins with this subjective attitude. Creative soliciting is knowing first insurance, then what not to say, what to say, how to say it. Exactly how, everyone teaches himself. Figures do not sell insurance, manhood does. What wins is ultimate purpose, one's better self. What do we seek—a living? Trickery is the hard way to earn it. If more, to live not long but largely, bequeath to our children a name, there are surer ways. Higher than achievement is the aim to be, to live clean, extract work's essence, be all our natures can attain. These considerations, the upward, inward look and not the words he speaks, differentiate up-builder from destroyer, true insurance man from sharper. Creation is inspiration; no formulae exist for character or guide-posts for genius.

Avoid Comparatives.

To overcome competition, decline it as duelling. Avoid comparatives and superlatives, because insurance is not question of better and best but good. Surprise by being different, generous; praise disarms like Aesop's south wind. Knowing there is no best company or policy, say so. Show not how other companies are bad and yours superior, but that to insure is wise, all companies sound, yours and its policy so desirable that further search is wasted. More is satiety. To any man sick of statistics and scandal-mongers, it is refreshing to hear a big theme treated broadly.

Creative soliciting is positive, not negative; leads, not follows; initiates demand, satisfies, retains by service. Our real competitors are ignorance, coldness, indifference, procrastination. Focus effort here; know much to talk little, avoid technicalities, pronounce your clients' shibboleths. Fend hostility by dignity. Win confidence. Be likeable; for personal charm, the smile, the courtesy of greeting, the very manner of handshaking, trifles apparently, count more than dividends. When men like us they listen. Our message need not be new; great things are old, elemental things immortally fresh. There is one fundamental creative argument: men die, age is helpless, insurance protects. Human nature concedes the logic—for other people. Paradoxically, not the certain but the possible, fear not of death but ill-fortune, decides most men. They want savings funds with incidental indemnity. We call this selfishness; it is life's healthy optimism. Handle it tactfully, persuading rather than arguing. Consummate salesmanship is the art, almost poetic, of making attractive as privilege what as duty is repellent.

Creative soliciting explains principles: that insurance distributes losses; without it commerce would crumble, almshouses*replace schools. It is safe; no laws so rigidly observed as those regulating it; no trusts so efficiently administered. Of modern machines this is nearest perfection.

Individual Needs.

Creative soliciting regards individual needs. What proportion of your income would continue after death? What comforts would your wife retain? Your sons, would they receive education and a start? Your daughters, are they safe from social wolves? Your family now carries the risk; premiums would not be spent but saved. Cover still another hazard: women seldom understand investment; hot-house nurtured, should they be exposed to sleet? Then by life incomes insure your insurance. Outside of family are needs—debts to cover, credit to preserve. For partnerships, insurance is the cement of steel-concrete construction. Corporations owe to stockholders conservation of rare personality which is coessential with capital, and without which railroads are streaks of rust.

Give for profit advice so intimate, and we become responsible like lawyers drawing wills. To merit such confidence pays more than commissions. For the world loves its builders. It forgets the madman's name who fired Diana's temple, but holds in glad, undying remembrance him who reared the Parthenon. To build insurance, place but our one sound brick, laid true, in a structure, where others may then place theirs, this is constructive salesmanship. It is a man's work, work for humanity.

Second Prize Essay.

By R. O. Miles, General Agent, The Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, San Francisco, Cal.

In these later years Salesmanship has advanced to a science. It is no longer merely a weird and mysterious magic by which one man influences another to buy from him an article which he may or may not want. It is no longer, as it was in the early ages, an exchange of necessary commodities. It is no longer a happy hunting ground for the shrewd and unscrupulous, but it has evolved from its first stages of necessary exchange, through all the mazes of charlatanry, bringing with it the best from each stage, until it has grown into a science and a profession. Slower than the professions of the physician and the lawyer in its development, it has, however, reached a degree now in which it is building its own etiquette and coming to its own recognition.

In view of this modern science of salesmanship I shall attempt to give you my ideas on the subject of creative solicitation and shall endeavor to show that from the standpoint of the best mental laws and the best ideals of this new science of selling there should be no room for competitive solicitation. Of course there will always be competition, but life insurance soliciting should be creative and competition should not be coupled with the selling idea or be used in antithesis to it.

Some successful agents state that only a small portion of their business is secured in competition. Others question the truthfulness of such statements and declare that 50 per cent. of their business is in competition. The degree of success of the first is generally greater than that of the second, for competition means argument and argument accomplishes but little. The reason such a difference in experience is found among men selling the same thing is because the first con- structs on what he himself creates, instead of destroying what another implants.

In true creative solicitation the fate of competition is to be ignored. Don't use the negative side of a proposition, but use the positive or creative side. The negative leads to inaction through argument, procrastination, harmful indulging in personalities, directing the attention from the proposition of use to the buyers, to a bickering over useless technicalities, destroying of another's ideas rather than the creating of your own. The creative or positive side of soliciting leads to satisfaction and action. If forced into competition by someone else the best weapon against it is a knowledge of your own business and of men. The knowledge of competing lines of business is of secondary importance and should be kept behind you for protection only.

Creative salesmanship is developed by the expert salesman largely through the implanting of right ideas in the minds of others in a non-argumentative, expository manner. With a creative foundation the constructing of your business may take place with little chance of competition becoming harmful, even though it does occur. What a desirable yet simple thing to cause a need to be felt, and then when that need has been realized, see to it that the thought be carried out in action. Complicating the act with irrelevant or competitive matter is never good business and simply defers the desired result. The satisfaction of defeating another man's arguments is nothing compared to the glory of a creative sale and its resultant respect, friendships and future business possibilities.

Arousing the interest of the buyer in a creative sale, the positive or strong, physical, mental and moral characteristics assert themselves at once and give the first impression of the seller as a personality. Then a salesman must know how to relate the article to the man's needs. This calls for knowledge of the thing to be sold and its merits, quick appreciation of the buyer's wants and the ability to instill into the purchaser's mind positive merits of your article. In other words, interest is aroused through efficiency in your personality, desire created through efficiency in your knowledge of your article and your subject, and the making of the sale is effected through efficiency in knowing how to bring a man's thoughts to their expression in the final act necessary to close.

When new thoughts are created intelligently and conscientious construction follows, the result is a feeling of confidence in the salesman; a feeling that a service has been performed, and whenever genuine service is rendered the question of competition does not arise. In other words, life insurance should be sold, not bought, that your client may justly look upon you as an authority and always consult you in the future as a friend and adviser.

The true test of the real merit of a creative sale is the relation of the seller and buyer after the sale. The salesman must render service to the buyer or there is not the right kind of a sale. Begetting in a man's mind positive ideas, constructing and shaping them along positive lines so that they grow into a new desire which will be expressed in the motor actions of the buying, is not of truly creative quality unless the whole transaction has foundation on an honest purpose of benefiting both buyer and salesman. The right adjustment between purchaser and buyer must be satisfaction of having received a service well rendered and of having performed a good service.

What greater commentary can be made on the need of men who create than to remind you of the fact that 5 per cent. of the people do the important thinking for the other 95 per cent.

In this, the twentieth century, the light of creative and constructive salesmanship is shining through the fog of competition, and we behold the power of education, creating, then constructing and illuminating, where in the past useless, often destructive, competitive methods held great business enterprises in bondage.

The above chart, based on the report of the Spectator Company, exhibits the gross interest realized on the mean ledger assets of the twenty-seven leading life insurance companies of the United States for the last thirty years. The upper line represents the rate realized by the Union Central and the lower line the average rate of all companies. Only twice in the thirty years has any of the other companies earned a higher rate than the Union Central. The most favorable record made by the nearest competitor in the several years is shown by the dotted line.

The Argument that Gets the Business

—"the Union Central pays larger dividends to policy-holders than any other company."

For proof of this examine the chart to the left—it shows how our company has, for the last 20 years, earned for its policy-holders a higher rate of interest than all competitors.

THE NEW FAMILY SERVICE OF LIFE INSURANCE.

A MODERN ANSWER TO THE WORLD-OLD AND WORLD-WIDE NEED OF FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR WIVES AND CHILDREN AFTER THE BREADWINNER IS TAKEN AWAY.

How Lump Sum Insurance Fails to Fulfill the Purpose for Which It Was Intended. The Time of Death Not the Only Time of Need, but Life Income Contracts Begin Where Old Forms Terminated.

This is the address of former National President Charles W. Scovel at the Atlantic City Convention. Mr. Scovel was impressed into service at the last moment to fill in the time in the program which had been allotted to the Hon. A. J. Montagne, who had been detained at Washington. There was little time for preparation and Mr. Scovel spoke from hastily made notes—yet his address is regarded as a remarkably cogent elucidation of the real purpose of Life Income Insurance if there is sufficient demand to make it worth while, the article will be published in pamphlet form, copies of which may be obtained at nominal cost.

Let us first stake out our field a little. Leaving out of consideration the great general groups of service that life insurance renders to the community and the state, we come to the services of life insurance to the individual—services by the company to the individual through its contracts. There are four classes of individual services. One is the Family Service; the providing for those who are left behind at the death of the breadwinner. The second is what we may call the Estate Service, that provides cash to settle indebtedness and to liquidate the estate without forced sale of slow assets. The third is the Business Service, furnishing to corporations and partnerships the protection of spot cash that will help solve the problems that are sure to arise when any valuable man drops out.

A Valuable By-product.

All of these services, you see, are rendered at death. The fourth service is rendered during life, without waiting for death, and is one of the main services, one that is too often overlooked as a real service, namely: the service of providing Emergency Cash and Old Age Independence. This is a by-product, incidental to every one of our contracts (except those upon the temporary plan), and it ought, I think, always to be so presented. For that service is also protection, which is our shibboleth. It is protection to the man and his home against all times of sickness, or accident, or misfortune. Protection against his own dependent old age. Protection also to the business against panic times and all sorts of emergencies.

And while I am in hearty accord with much that has recently been said as to the very great abuse of the cash loan privilege in our policies, I do not think that we want to let that affect us for a moment in presenting the absolutely legitimate service that the necessary by-product of a cash accumulation, subject to the man's order for time of emergency, gives to all who carry legal reserve life insurance. That is real protection. It is protection against what you may call partial losses of the life value, the loss where the productivity of the life is temporarily stopped by sickness or accident or misfortune. That is just as much a life insurance function as to pay a death claim (applause), if it is just as much a fire insurance function to pay for a partial destruction of the property as to pay for a total loss.

The Family Service.

Now, we will this morning confine ourselves to the Family Service, taking effect at death, but always remembering that the collateral service of emergency cash and old age provision is included in all cases. The family service that provides for the dependents after the breadwinner is taken is the taproot of the whole tree of life insurance. Here lies the great universal human need that called scientific life insurance into being nearly two centuries ago, and has made it the institution that it is. That need lies deep in the loving heart of every manly man—"How can I provide for my dear ones if I should die?" That need cries to heaven from the stricken heart of every widowed mother, "How can I feed my children?"

The modern answer to this world-old and world wide need is the institution of life insurance, with its millions of men, united in lifetime contracts, for billions of dollars to be paid to their families—an institution now everywhere recognized to be indispensable to the progress of the race.

The coming of the insurance money into the home whence the breadwinner has just been carried out has seemed like manna from Heaven. And apparently it has been deemed all-sufficient that there should be an attitude of prayerful thanks that this manna has so descended, without much question of how the manna is going to be kept and used.

It has seemed positively miraculous that the very event which caused the family's dire need should itself bring in the money to meet it. The insurance money has seemed different from ordinary cash; it has seemed to be what the economists call "conditioned" money—worth more because of the conditions, because coming at the time of the greatest need.

The Better Plan.

Gentlemen, the economists have been right, and we have been right, in all our talk about this money meeting the greatest need, only because we none of us knew any better! The world didn't know any better. Everyone thought the best and only answer to the great need for family protection was to dump a lump sum of money into the lap of a widow who had never seen that much money before, and to do this suddenly at the very time when, whatever her need, she was least able to take up calmly and wisely the utterly new, bewildering responsibility of conserving and investing that money.

What was that money meant for? Insofar as the man meant it to glorify his memory, to cause people to say, "He was a good provider; he left so many thousand dollars of life insurance," to that extent it did fulfill its rather ignoble purpose. Insofar as it was meant to cover his death-bed and funeral costs and other current expenses it also did fulfill its purpose, and in this it rightly deserved to be called money in time of special need.

Death Not Only Time of Need.

But insofar as it was meant to extend its protection to the family on beyond those weeks of grief and bewilderment, on into the future years of the widow's life and of the children's up-bringing and education—insofar, that is, as this money was meant really to do for his family what he would have done if spared—to that extent this lump sum in the widow's lap could not possibly, by itself, fulfill its purpose. The time of death is not the only time of need. Other and even greater needs keep coming for years as the growing children cost more and more to feed and clothe and educate.

To do all this the money has to be mixed, as Velasquez mixed his paints, with "brains!" Mixed with expert investing brains, which this widow hasn't got. If she seeks those brains in an adviser she has got to find character in him, too, or else the mixture of her money with his brains will be both explosive and expensive to her. Even if lucky enough to find both brains and character in her adviser she must always face costs, delays, troubles, and, at the best, enough risk of loss to keep her worried over the fear of coming to poverty in her later days.

Worse yet, this seemingly large sum of money is all too likely to spell riches to her, in comparison to the sums she has been used to handling. If so, it does positive harm instead of good. She thinks she can afford things for children, home or self that she never could get before; or thinks, at least, that they can keep on living the same way as before. So the insurance money, if it is really to protect the family, has to be mixed not only with the brains and character of a disinterested adviser, but with uncommon hard sense of her own and the will power to scale down the family living to the basis of four or five per cent. on the amount left after paying debts and current expenses.

A Sudden Fall.

A fearfully hard task it is for her to come down in the world to a lower level than she has been used to—a task almost impossible for her to accomplish abruptly and voluntarily and with the temptation of all that money staring her in the face. And yet if she does not do so, and do it quickly, it means living too well on the principal for a while, and then—abject and final poverty. And all this applies just the same to families living on the higher social levels as to those on the lower. Indeed, the higher the level the harder the fall. To scale the family living down from $5,000 to $2,500 is apt to cause more mental anguish and take more will power than to scale down from $1,200 to $600.

Falls Short of Purpose.

Gentlemen, when we look the plain facts in the face we see that the mere leaving of any sum falls most pitifully short of fulfilling the purpose of real, lasting family protection. Life insurance has not been really doing the thing we sold it to do! This was not the fault of life insurance. Its proceeds were just as good protection as any other money the dead man could leave. Nobody knew any better way—excepting only the trust-estate way, open usually to none but men of larger means.

The fact is, the world has for centuries needed a whole new line of financial service—needed it without knowing it, just as for centuries it needed the printing press, steam, electricity, without knowing it.

That new service is here. Life insurance has evolved it. It begins, like the old service, at that same time of greatest need, the time of death—but it doesn't stop there! It doesn't leave the distraught widow to her own devices or to chance advices. It not only supplies the money, but applies it also. And it applies it just as the husband and father did himself—just as she has been used to handling it—namely: in a regular monthly sum to meet the current monthly expenses.

This monthly sum can be made much larger than the safe rate of interest on the principal, if invested, would amount to. And yet, it will continue coming to the very end of the widow's life, however long; and though she die early, it will keep coming for twenty years in all, long enough to bring up the youngest child to maturity. Or, this monthly sum can be made just equal to a safe interest rate on the principal, and on this basis to continue through the mother's life, and then throughout the children's lives, and then to their unborn children until twenty-one years of age—with the whole principal untouched through all those years, finally paid to these grown-up grandchildren.

Of these two fundamental plans there are several varieties and many combinations. And this, new service can be applied to the proceeds of old policies (in most companies), though originally issued without any such provisions—applied at request either of the policyholder himself, or of the beneficiary after his death. We can now work out a complete financial program for a man—including therein his old policies, and what he can take now, and what he can plan to take later on—fitting all of them together in due proportion so as to accomplish all kinds of protective purposes to the very end, through all contingencies of the distant, unknown future.

Real Protection.

Here is, in truth, the new financial service the world has so long waited for. It begins where the old service left off. It really protects the family to the very end of their lives, and even to a generation unborn. It does for the family of the wage-earner or salaried man what no other machinery will do at all. For the rich man's family it does the main service that he has sought through trustees or trust company and does it better and carries it further.

'Gentlemen, we do know better now! Lump sum life insurance is no longer the real thing in family protection—though we once honestly believed it was. Monthly income insurance is that real thing. It takes a lot more time and trouble and knowledge on our part to explain this new service and fit it to the needs of a given family, and we do not get a cent larger commission for doing so. But the simple fact is—and I put it straight to the conscience of every man here—that we are under the plain duty of urging this real thing upon every prospect desiring family protection, beyond the small sum for debts and immediate expenses. If that is what he means his money for, we must in all honesty tell him of the new service of life insurance that will make the money really fulfill that purpose.

Always Applicable.

"What!" you say, "urge the monthly income plan to the man who can only carry a couple of thousand?" Yes, sir, that's our plain duty. If he can carry but $2,000 urge him to make the odd sum of $170, or whatever it may be, payable at once for immediate needs—with $10 a month through at least the twenty years certain, and through his wife's life beyond that.

Just think a minute what even these smaller monthly sums really mean—and how the world is setting its approval upon just such provisions in the mothers' pension movement, the workmen's compensation laws, the many plans of churches, institutions and business concerns for old age or disability pensions. Take only the mothers' pensions now provided by law in eighteen States—in a dozen or more of them by laws of this year, so fast is the idea spreading. Take for example the new law of New Jersey, where we are now meeting. It gives nine dollars a month to a mother with one child under sixteen, with five dollars more for a second such child and four dollars more for each additional one. These sums are deemed enough to give the children proper education and religious training, as well as mere support, or the pension will be revoked.

The Pension Plan.

Or take the pension plan lately recommended by a committee of the Protestant Episcopal Church to provide for the families of its clergy. It deems twenty-five dollars a month to be a sufficient minimum for livelihood—and adds a comparatively liberal allowance for education of the children, viz.: $8.33 up to the age seven, $16.60 from seven to fourteen and $25 from fourteen to twenty-one, if still dependent. This church, I understand, pays the largest average salary to its ministers, who are all highly educated, and, of course, belong to a high social level.

These two examples alone are enough to dispel any doubts of our own, or of any open-minded prospect, as to the practical wisdom of providing incomes of ten dollars to twenty-five dollars a month. That means the great bulk of our prospects, able to carry from $2,000 to $5,000. This is the class of families where the lump sum of money is least apt to give lasting protection and is most subject to risk of loss or unwise spending. It is the very class that most needs the new service of life insurance, and it is the class to whom we have been bringing it least.

The Sure Cure.

And yet we talk of being professional men, with a high sense of responsibility to those who must depend on our advice. Suppose a positively sure cure for cancer had been discovered and had been in the medicine case of every physician for months and years. What would you think of a doctor who, when you entrusted to him the case of your wife or daughter thus mortally stricken, failed to use or even tell you of that sure cure, and went right on with the old-style treatment that, as he well knew, could only give temporary relief and delay a little her certain death? What would you think of him? What would you think, if all the doctors, having such a cure, only used it to attract rich patients? Eh? What would you think of them if they let the great mass of their cancer cases die lingering deaths, while pretending to give them the best treatment—merely because the new cure would mean a little more time and trouble for themselves? What kind of professional men would you call those doctors?

No, this parallel is not one whit overdrawn. It would seem more brutal for a physician to act thus, because the patient lies right there dying by inches under his very eyes. But we, too, are handling issues of life and death; and, quite as serious, issues of virtue and vice, of innocence and crime. When for lack of that ten dollars or twenty dollars a month that we well know we ought now to prescribe, some family is broken up a few months or a year or two after the father's death, and presently the boy drifts into prison, or the daughter to the streets, or the overworked mother to her grave, the responsibility is no less ours because we don't happen to be right there looking on.

Wilful Neglect.

We hold ourselves out to be professional experts in this very matter of protecting families after the breadwinner's death. We urge him, in the sacred names of love and duty, to be examined and pay the premiums and leave the rest to us. Our companies have long since placed in our hands the one sure poverty cure that this man can buy for his own. State and church and business have adopted the very same cure to give to charity patients. And yet we wilfully neglect to prescribe it—neglect it most in the worst class of cases—and go right on prescribing the old lump sums, to be lost or wasted and soon leave the family even worse off than before.

We can no longer say, "I didn't know." Dare we henceforth—dare we say, "I forgot," or "It was too much trouble?"

NATIONAL PRESIDENT CLARK'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

Strong and Progressive Platform Outlined at Annual Function of the Pittsburgh Association—Higher Degree of Professionalism Urged—Popular Education, Conservation and Taxation to Receive Thoughtful Attention and Effective Action.

For thirteen years your magnificent association has been accorded the self-appropriated right of inaugurating the new president of the National Association of Life Underwriters, a function which has become as firmly fixed in an unwritten section of the National Constitution as the President's election. It has been my privilege and pleasure to attend the Pittsburgh "inaugurals" for many years, in varying official capacities, but to-night I am enjoying the rare honor and distinction of playing the principal role.

On these occasions it has been customary for the president to discuss briefly the present conditions and influence of the Life Underwriters' movement, and the work contemplated by the executive officers and committees on behalf of the National Association during the new administration.

This great national organization has just completed twenty-three years of history, which have meant everything to the life insurance interests of the United States and Canada. With a present membership of eighty-four associations in the United States, beside thirty-three in Canada, it has been able to extend its influence into practically every city of any size in the two countries.

General Reforms.

During these twenty-three years its influence and energies have been directed towards reforms and general improvement in field methods, legislation and better service to policyholders. Our membership throughout the country seemed to have caught the spirit of the movement as was intended by its founder, the late Col. Chauncey Munroe Ransom, as outlined in his address before the Milwaukee convention in 1897, entitled "Origin and Growth, Present and Future, of Life Underwriters' Associations," from which I quote the following two paragraphs:

"There is a great and far-reaching responsibility resting upon the members of these associations, and they should spare no effort to protect the business of life insurance, as well as the associations, from the assaults of foes, whether they be within or without the walls.

"Above and beyond the desire to see the association idea successfully carried out to its logical end, should be the determination to relax no effort which will place the business of life insurance on the topmost pinnacle of fame, and which will thus enable the men who at present constitute the membership of Life Underwriters' Associations to leave to their successors an inheritance of good work and of duty well performed."

Anyone attending the recent Atlantic City convention could not fail to appreciate the vast influence and benefits to be derived from such a program as that presented, and how deeply that determination to "place the business of life insurance on the topmost pinnacle of fame" has become rooted in the Life Underwriters' Movement.

Life Insurance Education.

Notwithstanding the far-reaching results which have already been accomplished, a broader and more important work now confronts us, namely, Education, Conservation and Anti-Taxation. Education, involving a higher and more scientific training of agents and systematic instruction in the fundamental principles and necessities of life insurance for the benefit of the insuring public. The life insurance agent of the future must be educated and trained along the most careful and scientific lines, in order to give to his clients the intelligent and conscientious service which their individual needs, according to varying conditions and circumstances, require. His services should be strictly professional in character. Let me, therefore, urge all general agents and managers to exercise the greatest care in the selection of agents, contracting only with those whose intellectual and moral qualifications indicate their fitness for this high calling.

Give no place to the man who has been previously connected with another agency or company unless he comes to you well recommended, with an absolutely clean and honorable record. If this practise is faithfully adhered to by the members of this great organization, it will not be long until the life insurance field will be free from the rebater, the twister, and those who misrepresent instead of represent the noblest institution on earth. In this connection let me also urge the elimination of the part-time agent in all metropolitan agencies or large centers. Gentlemen, the necessities of our business in the future, the protection of the insuring public against ignorant handling of their life insurance interests, and the protection of those agents who are devoting their lives to this intricate profession, along lines of intelligent training and conscientious service, demand it. Higher education of the agent, and improved efficiency methods, with the elimination of those agents who do not show either desire or capacity for attaining to these standards of service and efficiency, should be the aim of every general agent and manager throughout the United States and Canada.

Carefully Trained Agents.

The agent who has been properly educated and trained should be familiar with the principles, practises and history of life insurance, beside a thorough knowledge of his own company, its methods and policy contracts. He should study the needs of his client, advise the particular kind of insurance which conforms to his requirements, and instruct him in the fundamental principles of life insurance, its benefits and relationship to the life value, that the policyholder may at all times better appreciate the necessity of maintaining his insurance in force until the terms of the contract are completed in their entirety, avoiding all temptation to lapse, surrender or borrow on the policy, unless for a temporary emergency to prevent its lapsation.

Life insurance is often called a business. Properly speaking, however, it should be universally classed as a profession—the educational training and qualifications of the present-day successful agent, combined with the character of service rendered the insuring public, having long since settled this question.

Magnitude of the Institution.

Let us for a moment review the magnitude of this great institution of life insurance, which has been built up by our American life insurance agents. Last year, according to official reports, there were 232 legal reserve life insurance companies doing business in this country, with admitted assets of $4,572,000,000, with 34,878,969 policies in force, aggregating $19,745,000, distributed over 25,000,000 lives. The annual income of these companies was $843,256,000, and they paid out during the year $645,056,000, besides increasing the reserve and surplus to the credit of policyholders $408,016,000, the combined disbursements and increase of assets and surplus aggregating $359,675,000 in excess of the premium income from policyholders. When one stops to consider the real meaning of all this to the social and economic life of this country, can he be impressed with anything but the most profound respect for the great institution of life insurance, and can any agent fail to appreciate the dignity of his profession?

Notwithstanding the immensity of the volume of legal reserve life insurance now in force, it is less than 7 per cent. of the estimated commercial value of our American lives, which is computed at $350,000,000, consequently the life values of this country are to-day more inadequately protected than any other form of commercial value subject to destruction.

The National Association has really come into the fulness of its power for usefulness. Its membership, constituting a potentiality, the influence and force of which cannot be measured by any known standard. As "service" is our keynote, it is our duty to study the lines along which we can best serve the interests of our policyholders, and by so doing we also render the best service to our companies and ourselves.

The Special Committee on Education and Conservation, of which Warren M. Horner has so ably and efficiently acted as chairman, with the advice and co-operation of the Executive Council, has presented to us a campaign of education for the benefit of the insuring public which must necessarily result in a more intelligent understanding of the fundamental principles of life insurance, a deeper appreciation of its benefits and necessities, and with a corresponding increase in the number of lives written and average amount at risk on each life. The educational groundwork already accomplished during previous administrations has been magnificent. There are now over forty of our best universities and colleges which have courses of instruction in life insurance, and similar courses will doubtless be installed in other universities as rapidly as circumstances permit.

Life Insurance in Schools.

The first course in life insurance to be adopted by any of our American colleges was by Harvard University in 1897, and the last one was by the University of Cincinnati, notice of which I received on Sept. 29. Similar courses have also been introduced into a number of our business colleges and high schools throughout the country, and it is in this class of institutions, and even the grammar schools, that we wish to have introduced that form of instruction in life insurance appropriate to the grade of school involved. If our student class were taught in the various educational institutions of the country the fundamental principles, benefits and necessities of life insurance, there would develop later an unconscious appreciation of the moral obligation on the part of young men to provide adequate protection for their dependent ones or their estates against the ultimate destruction of their life values. And this life or income protection would be more intelligently selected, more in keeping with their financial condition, and more consistent, so far as amount is concerned, with their individual life values.

If life insurance were thus understood by the student classes, its effect would soon be reflected through the medium of an increased volume of insurance written, reduced lapsation, fewer loans made against policies, a less number of foolish and vicious laws introduced in the several States, and a material reduction in taxation.

The Conservation Movement.

This brings us to the other branch of this great movement, which runs in a parallel channel, and at the same time is dependent on education, namely, Conservation. Under this head are involved all those elements of preventable waste and loss, affecting the policyholder and company, and which come under the influence of the field representative, either in his individual or co-operative capacity, as the case may be. I refer especially to Conservation in its relationship to the laws of health, the enormous waste from lapsation and surrender of insurance, the unnecessary borrowing on policies, and the reduction of burdensome and unjust taxation. Excellent work has already been done by many of our home offices, the Presidents' Association and the Insurance Commissioners' Convention, on the conservation of health, but much additional can be done by the local associations throughout the country to aid in this most important line of activity. The lapsation and surrender of insurance constitutes an appalling waste, much of which could be saved through the medium of systematic effort and education of the public, as previously outlined. The greatest contributing factor to this enormous loss and waste is undoubtedly the securing of loans on policies, 94 per cent. of which is never paid back prior to the maturity of the policy or its surrender, which, in nine cases out of ten, is caused by the outstanding loan, resulting in decreased protection and increased cost in proportion to the interest paid. Gentlemen, discourage in every possible manner the policy loan. Don't hold it out as a liberality of policy contract and an inducement to the prospective applicant, for if you do, he is very sure to avail himself of the privilege in due time.

In view of the constant increase of taxation against the premium income of our life insurance companies, by the several States and Federal Government, the question of the National Association of Life Underwriters using its influence and good offices toward bringing about a relief from this intolerable condition was formally presented to the Atlantic City convention by Vice-President Edward A. Woods, in the form of a resolution that life underwriters everywhere be urged to acquaint themselves with the inequity and iniquity of this governmental burden, and upon all proper occasions to denounce this wrong taxation policy of State and government, and aid company officials in every way in opposing it; that the one hundred thousand life underwriters in this country assume as their special duty the awakening of public sentiment not only against the increase of this burden, but for its decrease; that committees by both the National and local associations be created to resist—and if possible secure—a decrease of this unjust burden to policyholders.

It is the intention of this administration, in connection with the proposed campaign of education and conservation, to give such publicity to this important question for the benefits of the insuring public that policyholders and legislators throughout the United States may be fully advised as to the extent of this State and National disgrace.

Unjust Taxation.

Elizur Wright declared that the government should as soon tax its asylums or hospitals as to seek gain from the deposits which foresight and affection had set apart for the protection of thousands among the most helpless of its citizens. A tax on life insurance is nothing more than a tax upon widows and orphans. This declaration was made in 1867, yet the burdensome and unjust system of taxation has steadily increased from 70 cents at that time on each $100 in premium, to over $2 for $100, amounting in 1912 to more than $12,000,000 by the several States and Federal government.

As was stated by Vice-President Woods, in his discussion of the question, this taxation would provide over $500,000,000 additional insurance, increase the refunds of the companies over 15 per cent., pay all executive salaries several times over, or reduce expenses about 8 per cent.

The German government, notwithstanding its great demands for revenue through the medium of taxation, with limited sources, compared with the vast and legitimate sources in this country, exacts a tax of less than one-fourth of 1 per cent. on the premium income of its life insurance companies, or less than one-eighth of the percentage imposed by our State and Federal government, and as an offset contributes approximately $12,000,000 per annum toward compulsory life insurance, or about thirty-six times as much as the revenue received by the government from the companies through the medium of taxation.

Life Insurance and the State.

The importance of life insurance to the State is also recognized by England, to the extent of exempting from income taxation what a man pays for life insurance, up to one-sixth of his income, taxing the man who does not carry life insurance, on his entire income.

While the questions of education, conservation and taxation have been discussed by me in this address under separate headings, the taxation problem is dependent on education for its solution, as the education of the insuring public and our lawmakers to the injustice of this iniquity means a reduction and possible elimination of oppressive taxation, and the ultimate conservation of millions of dollars for the benefit and use of policyholders in furnishing hundreds of millions of additional insurance for their dependent ones.

Having dwelt at considerable length on this new era of progress and opportunity which lies before the Life Underwriters' Association, I do not wish to overlook or minimize the other important questions which have been so successfully handled by former administrations, and are yet live issues with us.

It is my very great desire to see the extension movement continued, and local memberships enlarged, in order that the influence of the National Association may reach every agent in this country, and especially do I wish to recommend that, wherever practicable, all associations throughout the United States take advantage of the amendment to the constitution which was made at Atlantic City, providing for a non-resident membership, with minimum dues of $1, in order that the agents of smaller cities and towns and the country districts may be brought under the influence of the local associations, and also receive LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS, the official organ of this national body, and be kept in touch with its beneficent influences and educational program.

I wish to commend and urge a continuance of the Association Club idea, which was inaugurated by former President Sills and Vice-President Lewis, of Rochester, N. Y., as this plan undoubtedly stimulated the attendance at Atlantic City, and brought to the convention many of our representatives throughout the country who otherwise would probably not have been present.

In conclusion, I want to ask, on behalf of the officers, executive council and committees, especially the Committees on Education and Conservation and Taxation, the earnest co-operation of every local association throughout the United States, for, gentlemen, it is only through your efficiency and unqualified support that these respective lines of work and influence can be accomplished.

LIFE INSURANCE AND THE HIGHER LIFE.

"Individual Responsibility" Considered in a Threefold Aspect; in General Nature, as It Applies to Work of Life Underwriters and in Its High Moral Import.

By Bernard R. Rose, General Agent, Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, New York City. Paper Delivered at Atlantic City Convention.

"Individual responsibility" expresses the one indispensable condition of success of the life underwriters' movement, as it also is at the basis of success of every movement and of every institution wherever human beings undertake to co-operate for their mutual interest and benefit. This holds good all along the line, from the world empire down to a business partnership of but two individuals.

Everyone will admit the truth of this as a general proposition, but in considering the subject of "Individual Responsibility of Membership" in life underwriters' associations, it is, of course, desirable to be a little more specific, and to give an interpretation of the particular responsibilities the individual member should live up to. Surely this must have reference to nothing less than the most vital principle which life insurance stands for.

Mind you, I am saying "vital principle," and not merely "what life insurance is and does." This latter subject is often discussed in great detail and in an interesting manner in the press, on the platform and in company leaflets. But for our present purpose we must go deeper, we must search for the very soul of life insurance, we must try to find some idea which will comprehend in synthetic form the high mission which life insurance is to fulfil; because surely that is what the individual life underwriter is expected to live up to if he is to prove true to the life underwriters' movement and to the cause of life insurance generally.

The Deeper Significance.

Now, what is the deeper significance of the tremendous strides which the life insurance idea has made and the great hold it has secured on the public mind in such a comparatively short time? Undoubtedly there is some great natural law at work here. Although I feel utterly unequal to the task of adequately expressing what is in my mind on this subject, I shall try to formulate it in words as best I know how: It is well known that nature provides a remedy for every ill, and it is generally conceded that the greatest evil of our time is a too great love of money, an excessive striving after the material things of life. This great besetting sin permeates all grades of society, in practically every so-called civilized country on the globe.

Now, in the development of life insurance we behold the beginnings of a new tendency or force, which is destined ultimately to supply man's material needs on a rational and sure basis of mutual co-operation, thereby liberating his energies for the development of his higher nature, which higher and better nature always impels man to seek for his happiness not in self-indulgence, nor in the heaping up of material things, but in unselfish service to mankind.

A Spiritual Force.

Considered in this light, life insurance becomes a great spiritual force, instead of being merely a potent economic factor; viewed in this new light, we can clearly see that life insurance promises to do more for the real advancement of our race than any experiment, whether political, social or religious, of which history has left us a record. Do I hear someone say that it is blasphemy to class an economic movement such as life insurance with religion? I answer: Some very wise men assure us that the great religions themselves were, at their inception, merely economic movements. The Jewish religion, of course, had its origin in a movement for freeing the Hebrew people from bodily slavery; and many authorities assert that Christianity, in the beginning, was merely a protest against the economic conditions of the time.

But if such a forecast of what life insurance is destined to accomplish for mankind be even within the range or mere possibility, does it not follow that we should devote ourselves to our work not only with the greatest concentration, but with genuine consecration? It is true that some life insurance men are imbued with this missionary spirit of single-minded and consecrated devotion, but, unfortunately, many are not. And then, how about the part-time man? How long will he be permitted to drag this noble calling down to the level of the street huckster? How long will he be allowed to interfere with the work of the regular agent, thereby greatly retarding the fuller development of this great spiritual force?

Part-Time Men.

We like to talk about life insurance being a profession, but in what other profession do part-time men flourish? Just imagine a state of affairs where practically anyone may assume the role of a medical practitioner on merely securing a license from some State department, and then continue to devote himself to his old vocation, whatever that might be, giving to his new "profession" only such dregs of his time and attention as he may choose, or possibly none at all. How long do you think the self-respecting members of the medical profession would tolerate such a condition? Evidences multiply that the part-time man, this survival of the "dark ages" in life insurance, must go, and that very soon. The only question is whether we will get rid of him ourselves, by each man, at the home office and in the field, living up to his "individual responsibility," or whether we shall have to experience the great humiliation of having this long overdue reform forced upon us from without.

The elimination of the part-time man must precede the settlement of many other important questions in our business, every one of them also primarily a matter of "individual responsibility."

But more important than all other considerations is the deep moral significance of this question of "individual responsibility." These words imply a condition which flows out of the great human quality called "free will," because only where there is freedom of choice can there be individual responsibility. No one would, for example, say of the ox or the camel that they have individual responsibility. It is therefore quite clear that individual responsibility expresses not only a duty, an obligation, but a great privilege, the greatest of all human privileges. It expresses the divine quality in man by virtue of which he is capable of original action not suggested, either directly or remotely, by the mere instincts or appetites. This being the case, may we not ask of the man who fails to live up to his individual responsibility, "To what purpose are you a man at all?"

The Soul of Life Insurance.

But if it is our imperative duty by the very necessity of our higher human nature to live up to our individual responsibility, not merely in the conventional sense, but with reference to the very soul of life insurance, it becomes a vital question, "Where shall we find the soul of life insurance?" No one can discover it for us. We cannot find it described in text books. There is only one place where we must look for it. We must find it in our hearts and in our lives. If we have God in our hearts, we possess the "soul of life insurance," because we are then able to catch the vision of His great plan for the march of mankind "onward and upward forever," in which plan life insurance is to play, indeed, is already beginning to play, such an important part.

Someone will perhaps interpose and say that it is all very well to theorize and philosophize in this manner, but that it is not easy to live up to such a high standard. My all-sufficient answer to this is, that nothing worth while is easy. It is always hard to pursue one's ideals; but nothing in this life is more worth while or brings greater joy or more genuine satisfaction. The successful pursuit of ideals is hard because the mass of mankind still lives "by bread alone," and I have just shown that it is this very condition life insurance is intended to remedy. This necessarily makes our business a most ideal one, and should be pursued in an ideal manner. Shall we then not teach the great doctrine which life insurance enforces by the example of our lives as well as by the precept of our daily labor? And if we do pursue our calling in this spirit, sincerely and whole-heartedly, our ideals are sure to win out. In the words of the great German poet-philosopher, Goethe:

"When the crowd sways, unbelieving,
Show the daring will that warms!
He is crowned with all achieving,
Who perceives and then performs."

YOU'RE AS GOOD AS THE NEXT MAN.

Concentrated Optimism for the Man Sailing Under the Blue Banner.

By Robert J. Mix, Manager, Prudential Insurance Co., New York City.

It's one of the most important moments in a man's life when he realizes—suddenly, perhaps—that he's as good as the next man! I know that you will not misunderstand me when I say that. Everybody detests a conceited man or one who is overly impressed with the idea of his own importance and ability, but, by the same token, it's almost, if not quite, as great a mistake for a fellow to underestimate his own ability!

Modesty is an excellent quality—a most admirable one—but a man may be so modest and so skeptical as to his own powers and ability that he fails utterly to accomplish what he should in his journey through this world! You're as good as the next man in the sense that no man may forbid you the right to choose your vocation—to labor as hard as you please in that vocation—to develop your intellect as far as you like—to aim as high as you please and to enjoy the fruits of your toil!

In these wonderfully important particulars you're the equal of any man! Possibly you may not consider yourself as "good" in a moral sense as some others whom you may know, but your right to recognition as an individual—your right to that glorious possession—opportunity—is as great as any man's! If you keep yourself physically and morally clean, and if you're trying to make the best out of your God-given powers, you're not to be looked down upon by anybody!

As I remarked in one of my paper talks with you, it's splendid to know that you dominate yourself and can, in a large measure, direct your own energies and make of yourself what you will! It's splendid to be alive and to do as you please with every new day as it comes along! It's great, my brother life insurance man, to be occupied in a vocation which is as clean and helpful and elevating as ours, and it's a wonderfully inspiring moment in our lives when we realize that all these things are true! Such a consciousness never comes to many men. Has it ever come to you? Are you inclined to underrate your individual ability and your individual opportunity?

You hear of men who are doing great things in our calling. How does it affect you when such stories come to your ears? Do you promptly take the position that such feats are beyond you or are you wise enough to take the only right course and say to yourself, "That fellow's opportunity is no better than mine, he has no better brains than I and, if I avail myself of my opportunity and use my brains, I can do just as great things as he has done!" What wonderful results have been accomplished in this world, my friends, by men who made such a little speech as that to themselves!

You cannot become conscious of the fact that you're a better man than you thought you were without being wonderfully stimulated thereby! You're immediately affected for good, your ambition awakes, and, when a legitimate "ambition" is aroused, there follow increased effort, increased results, increased rewards! I tell you, friend, you're just as good a man as Jones or Brown or Robinson! Don't permit yourself to think otherwise—don't let any one else persuade you to think otherwise! Quit being satisfied to fill a little place in your calling. Expend the same effort and make the same sacrifices that Jones and Brown and Robinson do and you'll find yourself in their class, where you belong!

OFFICIAL NOTICE

Atlanta, Ga.,
Oct. 10, 1913.

To the Local Associations
of Life Underwriters:

You will find elsewhere in this issue of the News a complete list of the various committees of the National association appointed for the ensuing year. The selection has been carefully made, with special reference to the peculiar fitness of the members for the particular duties assigned to them.

At this time I desire to direct your attention to the work of the press committee, of which Charles W. Scovel, of Pittsburgh, is chairman. It is the purpose of this committee to enlist (more generally than heretofore) the interest of the local associations in securing publicity for news matter relating to life insurance.

To this end I would request each local association to appoint as a press committee two or three members experienced in newspaper work and otherwise fitted for this line of service. These appointments should be made at once, so that the good results of their efforts will be felt as soon as possible.

The special duty of these committees should be to keep the public regularly informed through the papers of all matters of general concern which transpire at the meetings of the associations. They should also from time to time furnish fresh news items which illustrate the benefits of life insurance in some of its many phases.

To secure the proper handling of this matter by the papers, it will be necessary for the press committees to first get in close touch with the local editors. This can be done by explaining fully to them the interest of the public in live news of this kind.

Let me urge local associations to promptly avail themselves of this simple but effective method of reaching the public with such information as will give them a better understanding of the beneficent character of our work. The good results will be reflected in the larger writing of new business and in the better persistency of that already on our books.

For further information write to Mr. Scovel, who has had valuable experience along this line, and who, I am sure, will be pleased to advise you.

HUGH M. WILLET,
Chairman Executive Committee.

THE EDUCATION AND CONSERVATION MOVEMENT.

Warren M. Horner, Chairman of Committee in Charge of This Phase of Association Work, Sketches
Necessity of Popular Knowledge of Life Insurance and Benefits Which Will Accrue Thereby.

Mr. Horner Delivered This Address at the Inaugural Meeting of the Pittsburgh Association, October 6, 1913.

The Education and Conservation Committee desires to respectfully recommend to the Executive Council the following:

First.—That all members of the association individually, and the officers in particular, consider themselves especially drafted to aid and promote the work of education in life insurance in public schools and other educational institutions of the country.

Second.—That this committee be authorized to proceed under the control of the Executive Council to have a textbook written to be used in the campaign of education.

Third.—That this committee be authorized, with the consultation and approval of leading educators, to arrange a definite program of education, or short curriculum as it were, the detail of which, when arrangements are made, to be looked after by the corresponding secretary of the National Association of Underwriters.

Individual Campaigns Discouraged.

Fourth.—That both the matter of education and the publishing of an institutional advertisement involving a series of human interest articles of fact and interest to the people, together with the raising of funds for the same, be conducted entirely for the present by the National Association of Life Underwriters, and that there be no scattering by local subsidiary campaigns, other than in co-operation with the national body, excepting such individual campaigns as may be deemed advisable by local associations as independent of and separate from the national campaign.

Fifth.—The committee further recommends the early publication of four or six of the institutional advertisements, one of which is to be upon the subject of taxation, at as early a date as is in keeping with due business procedure. This recommendation is made with great earnestness on the part of your committee because it believes that such action will properly visualize the efficiency of this whole proposition of the practical value to the people and the business of life insurance of publishing these human interest articles. Arrangements have been made to have these articles prepared without cost to this association unless they are finally made acceptable to the association. The committee is strongly imbued with the fact that the companies who have not been in favor of this proposition, and the agents who do not understand it, will, by the publication of these additional articles, have photographed upon their minds exactly what the education and conservation movement, through the institutional advertisements, intends and will accomplish.

A Preliminary Step.

Sixth.—Finally, the committee recommends that a partial call for funds be made through the local associations for the contribution of managers only, to defray the expenses of this initial campaign. That the companies who have already given pledges, and all other companies, be given to understand that the National Association invites their contributions and co-operation in behalf of this great work, but that a general campaign for raising funds be deferred until such time as the real merit of the idea be established and photographed upon the minds by this initial campaign. The committee is satisfied that the first call will bring sufficient funds from the managers over the United States to defray the expenses of what is contemplated in the recommendations for the present. No individual, even those who are most earnest in the support of the work of conservation and education and the most sanguine of the scope of the movement for the future, can properly visualize the value to the public and the business of these institutional advertisements until they have seen them in print, and unless they can be so written upon the subjects of taxation, loans, surrenders, income insurance, old age insurance and business or corporation life insurance, and covering the broad economies of life insurance, they will not be published at all. This recommendation of visualizing the idea by publishing some of the articles in advance is not alone the earnest judgment of the committee, but is predicated upon the very best advice of shrewd advertisers who can have no possible interest in this campaign, directly or indirectly.

(Signed) EDWARD A. WOODS,
JULES GIRARDIN,
H. H. WARD,
L. L. HOPKINS,
W. M. HORNER.

The public mind in every walk of life is in a receptive mood toward high-class advertising. The committee during the last eleven months has very earnestly tested public opinion wherever time and opportunity would permit, and in no single exception has any thinking individual failed to endorse the idea, not just by perfunctory statements, but by a ray of light passing over his countenance when he once understood what was proposed.

Interest the People.

The committee has repeatedly, through its chairman in a personal way, made the statement that the people, the ones who paid the premiums, were the ones vitally interested in this campaign. These and other utterances on the part of the chairman of this committee were made in a personal vein because it was not deemed advisable to commit the National Association without full permission from the members of the Executive Council, and with the pioneering necessary the last association year it was utterly impractical, if any headway was to be made, to proceed by any such slow method. It is very gratifying that there has been so little criticism of this action, and what criticism has been given is cheerfully borne because the results speak for themselves.

The only purpose in referring to this matter to-night is to call attention to the fact that eleven months ago here in Pittsburgh I admonished those present at the dinner to not refer to this education and conservation matter as a personal proposition, and ended by whole-heartedly presenting the infant born at Memphis to President Sills, who so earnestly and ably fought for the advancement of the National Association during the year just passed. However, let me remind you that it was necessary to put some human interest into this campaign of human interest, and the only way you can put human interest into a thing is to put a human being into it and back of it. Somebody had to take the responsibility of being considered a fanatic and that person had to be the goat, if the life insurance agents of the country en masse did not consider what was proposed rational.

I hope the gentlemen within reach of my voice to-night give me at least credit for knowing and feeling the responsibility which was voluntarily assumed.

Executive Council to Co-operate.

With this plain statement of fact, it is my purpose when acting in the future as the chairman of this committee to be the mouthpiece of the committee under the direction and approval of the Executive Council, all of whom deserve the most heartfelt appreciation of the entire insurance fraternity over the United States for their many able and unselfish acts in promoting the cause of true life insurance.

It is my purpose to speak only in the voice of the National Association of Life Underwriters, because this movement of education and conservation in the many ramifications which it now contemplates and into which it will grow is too big and broad to be voiced by any one individual or set of individuals, and it can only be considered in its due proportion as a movement marching onward hand in hand with the whole national body.

The people and their interests have already been mentioned. Nations, political parties, one great political party of this nation, have gone to ruin because they put off the evil day, as they thought, or at least said, when they must take the people into their confidence and work and strive conscientiously for the good of the whole people and not for any separate class.

There is a legitimate community of interest between the people, the companies and the agents in the business of life insurance. This community of interest will be cemented and promoted by the things contemplated in the education and conservation movement. It is to the interest of the people themselves and to the whole institution of insurance that we create intelligent attention upon the part of the public. Education alone is too slow. Had adequate education been indulged in beginning a generation ago, then a campaign of enlightenment through the medium of institutional advertising would not be necessary or at least as necessary as it is now.

However, we are dealing with conditions as they are, not as they might have been, and the best way to look after the public's interest and have them in a proper state of co-operation with us, is to inform them by the shortest route of the modern and practical way by publishing broadcast over the country institutional advertisements, which will convey due information of fact and interest to the people. The time to do this is to do it now, and not prolong the situation of unnecessary lack of co-operation.

Education in the public schools and other institutions of learning is all-important and will take care of the oncoming generation, but if life insurance is to be made such a smooth running organization, as to stand the test of time in its present relation to the people, it cannot sit by and merely watch the onward procession of events, and not get aboard the band wagon.

The people at large in life insurance and in other matters of great moment to them are only interested in that they get adequate and proper service in return for their money, and when once rightly imbued with this fact do not have an undue interest in the affairs of any world movement.

Why I Carry Life Insurance.

I carry life insurance because my worldly possessions are not sufficient to maintain my wife and children should I be taken from them. My wife has never had to make a living, other than to attend to her household duties, and her time is pretty much taken with them and with our children. I want our children to be good men and women, an honor to us and a credit to our country. To do this they must have education and home influence, which they could not have if they were to be separated. I want my wife to respect and remember me when I am gone, which she cannot do if I fail to provide for her. She may not be as attractive to another as a widow as she was to me in budding womanhood. I have no right to think any man would marry her, support and educate my children. A step-father makes a step-mother (and vice versa). My children are tender-hearted and would miss our caresses. I would not do anything to injure them now. Why should I in the future? Their happiness thrills me with pleasure. They are at the gate awaiting my return. If I am late they turn to their mother for comfort. When I am gone and have made no provision for them, she can have little comfort for them. "He that provideth not for his own is worse than an infidel." I am not an infidel.—Plowman.

Practical and Theoretical Training in Life Insurance at University of Pittsburgh.

The University of Pittsburgh has recently added a new course to its evening school in economics. Through the influence of the Pittsburgh association, practical and theoretical training has been arranged for in all branches of life insurance. Professor L. A. Flock, instructor of economics at the university, will be in charge and prominent life underwriters of Pittsburgh will deliver addresses.

AMENDMENTS TO INCOME TAX SECTION OF TARIFF BILL ASSURE A SAVING OF $3,000,000 TO POLICYHOLDERS.

Interesting Figures Compiled by the Association of Life Insurance Presidents—Resolutions Passed at Atlantic City Convention Plays Important Part in Securing Favorable Action at Washington—Great Influence of National Association and Its Prominent Members at Crucial Moment.

From figures which have been compiled by the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, it is estimated that the income tax section of the Tariff Bill, which recently became a law, as compared with the original draft introduced on April 7, assures a saving of nearly $3,000,000 a year to life insurance policyholders through company transactions, while an additional amount that cannot be estimated is saved to many of them or their beneficiaries in connection with paying taxes on their personal estates.

The original draft of the bill contained much ambiguous language which life insurance men feared might be interpreted against the interest of companies and their policyholders. One very important point raised was whether the phraseology of the measure might not result in taxing as "net income" of companies the annual net addition to reserves. The Corporation Tax Act of 1909, which the new Tariff Law supersedes, specifically exempted this item. On the basis of business done in 1912, the tax to all life companies on this item would have amounted to $2,195,000, and it would have been larger each succeeding year. When the situation was pointed out to the leaders at Washington, they disavowed any intention of taxing this item and agreed to an amendment clarifying the phraseology beyond any question.

An Immense Saving.

The exemption of the returned premium portion of dividends, granted during the last days of the bill and nearly six months after the life insurance men began their campaign, means a saving, roughly estimated, of about $700,000 on the business of 1911. These two items make a total of $2,895,000. Based on the business of the present year, they probably would total $3,000,000.

In addition to these and various other items involving life insurance policyholders in their company relation, there were important changes made in connection with their reporting of income as individuals or by such reporting on the part of their beneficiaries. The phraseology of that part of the first draft of the bill relating to the reporting of income by individuals, immediately raised the question in the minds of insurance men as to whether it might not be interpreted as taxing proceeds of life insurance policies as income. Arguments for amendments were made and the language was improved from time to time until the following was adopted, providing that practically no life insurance returns in the hands of policyholders or beneficiaries shall be included as income for taxation:

Not Included as Income.

"Provided, that the proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured or payments made by or credited to the insured, on life insurance, endowment or annuity contracts, upon the return thereof to the insured at the maturity of the term mentioned in the contract, or upon surrender of contract, shall not be included as income."

On the business of 1912, returns described in the above paragraph were as follows:

Death claims	$205,154,837
Endowments	55,712,220
Annuities	7,767,337
Surrender values	87,338,216
Dividends to policyholders	92,795,105

Total paid policyholders and beneficiaries. $448,817,715

No figures are available for estimating what the clearing up of this provision has saved policyholders and beneficiaries, for, of course, the provision would have applied only to those whose entire income is taxable under the law, namely, unmarried persons receiving in excess of $3,000 a year and married persons receiving in excess of $4,000 a year.

The amendment itself, which became law when the Tariff Bill was signed by President Wilson, is as follows:

"Life insurance companies shall not include as income in any year such portion of any actual premium received from any individual policyholder as shall have been paid back or credited to such individual policyholder, or treated as an abatement of premium of such individual policyholder, within a year.

The victory for the policyholders, after a full discussion during a period of months, should give us not only great cause for congratulation, but courage to take up the broader campaign against future increases of taxation and for decreases of present.

In a movement in which so many persons were interested throughout the entire country, it is difficult to apportion to each his proper share of credit. Many of the executives of our companies did heroic work, devoting their principal attention to this all-important matter from the time the Income Tax Bill was introduced until it was passed. The Association of Life Insurance Presidents, with Robert Lynn Cox, was assiduous in its attention; as well as the American Life Convention, scores of thousands of policyholders, and others.

Some Friends at Washington.

Life insurance had some good friends both in the House and Senate, and perhaps its best friend in the Presidential chair. President Wilson, in a public utterance, has said that he believed in so following the English practise as to exempt from the income tax that amount paid for life insurance up to $500; and this broad policy shows an appreciation of the value of insurance that has never yet been shown by legislative bodies in this country.

But it is proper for LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS to speak particularly of the work of agents. So many agents, with so many Congressmen, Senators, public men and policyholders of influence, did such efficient work that it is difficult to particularize. The Law and Legislation Committee, under Mr. John Dolph, with headquarters at Washington, gave much attention to the work. Using life insurance agents, many of whom—although from fields far distant from the companies' headquarters—had great political influence with particular and often influential legislators, showed the potent force that could be employed, and should be employed hereafter far more effectively.

The "Wall Street" Attitude.

It is recognized by all those who are on the inside of affairs at Washington that executives, however able, often did not receive from members of Congress the consideration to which they were entitled. The attitude toward "Wall Street" seemed to extend to the officers and even still more to the paid attorneys of the great life insurance companies. A signal illustration of this was the side-tracking of such an able man as Drawin P. Kingsley by the Senate Committee, when at the hearing Senator Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, consumed a large part of the precious time on the threadbare and ten or twenty year old subject of campaign contributions—made by a Democratic President—and in trying to prove that because he (Senator Williams) did not get back all he paid in from a three year old policy, the company must have made the difference and not be mutual.

It was noticeable how in all powerful circles the life insurance agent was recognized as really representing his clients and having a potent influence, often companies representing powerful constituents of the Congressmen and Senators having influence. What effect Edward A. Woods and Lawrence C. Woods had in the hearing given to them by the President and the brief submitted by them the week the bill passed the House, cannot be stated; but the fact remains that three important amendments to the bill—viz.: striking out the words "or return of premiums;" exempting surrendered policies and death claims—were made to the bill that very week, notwithstanding that it passed within a few days after that interview.

It is claimed on good authority that the only hearing given to life insurance by President Wilson was therefore to these two agents.

After the bill left the House, of course, such important members as Judge Hull still had a potent influence in shaping it; and Judge Hull was a frequent correspondent with, and an attentive listener to, many field men, including Reau E. Folk, of Nashville; Lawrence C. Woods and a great many others. It will probably never be known how many life men from all over the country exercised, sometimes a very quiet but a very powerful influence with one legislator or Democrat—or a Senator who was not approached and more or less educated by some active field man. The combined influence of this cannot be estimated and will probably never be known. The Senate Finance Committee, particularly Senators Shively, Williams and Gore, was interviewed and corresponded with by many field men; and towards the last, that astute politician, Henry J. Powell, knowing not only Senator James, but other men of importance, was most helpful in Washington.

Great Influence of National Association.

Competent authorities feel that the telegram sent by the National Association of Life Underwriters to every member of the Conference Committee, House and Senate, Republican and Democrat, and to the President, following up the telegram by a letter signed by the President and Secretary of the National Association while the Conference Committee was finally considering the amendment of the bill exempting refunds from taxation, had a great influence.

Certainly the fact that rarely, if ever, in the country's history a Conference Committee took up something that was not a point of difference between the House and Senate bills and amended it, exempting dividends, and without objection or point of order raised in either House, is a proof of the justice of our cause and its clients before this high tribunal.

The magnificent apostrophe to life insurance from Senator Sherman is alone worth all the effort of insurance men to have the cause of their policyholders placed fairly before Congress.

Irrespective of the rights of the case, in which agents were strongly entrenched, and of their earnestness and zeal for their policyholders, there was the politics of the situation. Politicians are human; members of Congress are astute, shrewd men politically. No long argument was required to suggest the bad politics of forcing one or two hundred thousand active life insurance men, in their daily canvass among 25,000,000 policyholders, to explain that the increased cost of insurance was due to Congress and this Administration.

A Potent Argument.

The program of the present Administration calls for decrease in the cost of it. To increase cost in so valuable and vital a thing as life insurance was not a pleasant thing for public men to consider, especially when it affected enough voters to sweep any party from power. The blame placed where it belonged by thousands of active, energetic agents, talking to their own clients in each Congressman's district, was potent. It was far greater, probably, than the fear of officers' public utterances or even circulars to policyholders. Even in State campaigns, every experienced person knows that an argument by an outsider, however able, has nothing like the influence that an argument has direct from one of the legislators' own constituents.

The just vindication of the policyholders' cause largely through the efforts of agents among others should give us great encouragement to proceed further. We should resist

THE PLATFORM FOR THE YEAR.

The first official address of National President Ernest Judson Clark was made in Pittsburgh, on the 6th of this month, before the Pittsburgh association. The full text of Mr. Clark's address will be found elsewhere in this number.

By long usage a new president's speech at the annual reception of the national officers by the Pittsburgh association, is regarded as his inaugural and his utterances on that occasion are considered as announcements of the policy of his administration, in the same fashion as are regarded the pronouncements of a President of the United States at his formal inauguration. It should be gratifying therefore to all members of the National Association to mark in Mr. Clark's Pittsburgh address his entire sympathy with and belief in the three great problems to which the National Association pledged support at the Atlantic City Convention.

Succinctly stated, the policy of President Clark's administration will embrace an advocacy of a high degree of professionalism and the elimination of part-time men in all metropolitan agencies or large centers; a thorough training and education of agents, and careful attention to serving the best interests of the policyholders. Education and conservation and the taxation problem will naturally be the subjects which will stand out most prominently, but in whatever direction association activities may be directed in the solution of these question, all steps taken will be guided by a hand of long experience in association matters.

Through the amplification of the ideas to embrace within the membership of local associations those agents working in outside or country territory, it is now possible for every life insurance agent in the country, who will subscribe to the ethics of the association movement, to become affiliated with the National body and to receive each month LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS. That this is feasible is being demonstrated in a most practical manner by several of the local associations in the Northwest. With over 100,000 agents scattered over the country, the possibilities of a greatly increased membership will not be overlooked and it is evident that Mr. Clark intends to give this phase of the work much attention.

Unfortunately there seems to be an undercurrent of opinion from certain quarters that the National Association, in the working out of the education and conservation campaign and in the agitation of the taxation matter, intends to overstep its limitations and impinge upon the prerogatives of other organizations. It has been implied that the National Association, fatuously elated with its progress during the last few years, shows a disposition to arrogate to itself credit for which it is not justly entitled; that there is at the present time just a slight suspicion of a chip-on-the-shoulder attitude.

Nothing could be more distantly removed from the actual facts, and, above all, there will be no attempt made to play politics, in the general understanding of that term. Safe, sanely progressive, but at the same time judiciously conservative, are the underlying principles of the present administration. Indeed, those who are most familiar with Mr. Clark, recognize in him the very qualities which will be necessary to tactfully modify the opinions of the fanatic and to weld together into rational and effective action the many conflicting views of strong personalities. In the mental chamber of the National President hangs the adage, always to be seen: "Be sure you're right, then go ahead."

Education, which perhaps should be termed the keynote of the present administration, precludes the circuitous methods, employed in playing politics. When reforms are advocated appeal will be made direct to the people. It must have occurred to every agent, and it must be apparent to every individual interested in the amendments to the Income Tax Section of the Tariff Bill, that much of the legislation embarrassing to the institution of Life Insurance, has been the outcome primarily of ignorance on the part of the people who elect legislators. The public at large does not know what a tremendous factor in business prosperity life insurance is, and the average legislator is peculiarly obtuse as to who and what he was striking at when he struck at Life Insurance.

As matters now stand it would seem that there would never be a superabundance of popular knowledge of Life Insurance, either with regard to the question of taxation and other forms of inimical legislation or in connection life insurance as related to the home and family. That the National Association at its Atlantic City Convention advocated a campaign of popular education and that President Clark in his inaugural address reiterated its necessity, should not be criticized on the grounds that the public might become too well informed.

This latter condition would be an impossibility. Life insurance has nothing to conceal and as an institution it needs no apologist; its future success, as well as the future success of its representatives, depends upon the simple proposition of telling ALL, to ALL the people, ALWAYS and ALL the time.

State taxation and create such a public sentiment as will ultimately make it not only impossible to increase State and Federal taxation, but to have onerous, burdensome, annoying and often conflicting laws amended. It should cause life underwriters to feel the deepest sense of responsibility to their clients. There should be such an organized effort on the part of underwriters throughout the country as to make it just as impossible to have legislatures tax life insurance companies as the United Workmen or the Woodmen of the World.

Many of these fraternal orders openly boast of their political power, and it is a fact that no legislature and no Federal bill dare even propose tax upon them. It is humiliating to think that the far greater latent power and responsibility of life underwriters has so long remained dormant. There is no other body that represents all companies—new and old, mutual and stock, large and small, from all sections of the country. Indeed, during the recent campaign at Washington, one of the humiliating spectacles was the conflicting efforts of companies working against each other; bewildering legislators, who frankly said some companies asked them to do one thing and some another until between the two they did not know what to do.

In many cases companies deliberately proposed to be exempted themselves from certain phases of taxation, while openly or tacitly encouraging the taxing of others. Life underwriters cannot, as an association, do this. They must work for the exemption of policyholders of all companies, from all sections, of all kinds, whether stock or mutual. Indeed, it was the conflict between the interests of stock and mutual companies that imperiled dividend exemptions; many mutual companies being either tacitly or openly willing to be exempted themselves if the stock companies were taxed, and the stock companies naturally, even if selfishly, insisting that if they were taxed, mutual companies should be too. No national association or no local body of insurance men could take this position; and this, in itself, is a source of great strength, in that our battle must be the cause of all policyholders.

Why Some Men Fail.

With rare exception every man is underinsured; yet fully 80 per cent. of the men approached for life insurance and in actual need of the protection will offer one kind of an excuse or another to escape the persuasive arguments of the interviewer. However, these men eventually buy and having bought become satisfied and persistent policyholders.

Perhaps the most fatal mistake made by men entering the business of selling life insurance is that they are too ready to take no for an answer. They do not drill themselves to expect this no and are not ready to meet it.

"Can't afford it," "Too busy," "Carrying too much now," all are knock-out drops for the beginner.

A very successful and experienced life insurance solicitor once stated that he never expected anything but discouragement when he approached men for life insurance. Yet this same man has the reputation of writing, on the first or second interview, a very large percentage of his prospects.

Life insurance selling is a game of the mind; yours against the other fellow's, and if you carry away his application after receiving a decisive "no," you win.—R. W. Stevens.

THIS EFFICIENCY DIAGRAM IS CONSTRUCTED ON THE THEORY THAT AN INDIVIDUAL'S EFFORT FOR SUCCESS SHOULD BE DOMINATED BY THE IDEA THAT A STRAIGHT LINE IS THE SHORTEST DISTANCE BETWEEN TWO POINTS

Point E is an individual's visualized ambition.

The straight line A-E is the visualized course that this individual must hold in mind.

The curved line is the general course that a successful individual will travel who keeps in mind the visualized point and indulges in directly applied energy, remembering that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points.

A, B, C and D represent the scope of an individual's efforts, practical and otherwise, between just existing, A to D, and rising to maximum capacity, A and C.

C is the highest point of accomplishment that a given individual can attain.

The dotted lines above E represent the actual course of a successful career of one who keeps in mind point E, and works in accordance with curved line A and E.

Of course, the curved line A and E with the successful individual actually becomes a curved line to follow the course of one of the dotted lines above E or A-7, 6, etc., to assumed maximum, A and C.

Dotted lines below E, and between E and D, represent a lessening of vigilance and efficiency. A and D is just keeping one's head above water.

Below D is failure, and point 14 total failure.

A, B and C is the forbidden zone.

The stars represent points of contact of an individual when he is working inefficiently or in an impractical way. Stars in the forbidden zone, bounded by A, B and C, represent points of contact of an individual where he is wasting his energy entirely because of being outside his sphere as a means to the end to be accomplished.

The purpose of this diagram is to convey the idea that so many people are constantly working in the zone A, B and C, and represented by the stars therein, working out of their element, indulging in impractical and visionary things in their daily work.

An important lesson to be learned from the diagram is that an individual will always reach a higher goal than the objective, provided he work constantly for an objective and indulge in directly applied energy, eliminating wasteful and impractical endeavor.

I. LAYTON REGISTER PASSES AWAY.

A Former President of the National Association and a Veteran in the Movement.

I. Layton Register, who was president of the National Association for the association year of 1900-1901, and a general agent of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of New York, died suddenly of heart disease at his home at Ardmore, Pa., on Monday afternoon, Sept. 29. Mr. Register was 71 years of age. He was one of the most prominent life underwriters in the country and was the oldest General Agent in the employ of the Equitable, having been appointed its Philadelphia agent in 1863, just four years after the company was established.

Mr. Register had always been actively identified with the Philadelphia association and was one of its founders. He was born in Newcastle, Del., April 3, 1842. Early in life he became a solicitor of the Mutual Life in Philadelphia, and after two years' service he then became connected with the Equitable. He was one of the prominent directors of the Bank of Commerce and of the United Security Trust Company, and at different times served as president of the Sons of Delaware.

He was a member of the Union League. He was an elder of the Second Presbyterian Church, a thirty-second degree Mason; past master, Lodge No. 51, F. & A. M., and past grand commander of the Cyrene Commandery, Knights Templar, Camden, N. J.

He is survived by a widow, who was Miss Emma Volmer; three sons and a daughter, the wife of Matthew Baird, Jr.

Among the Associations

NOTICE TO SECRETARIES.

Every secretary of a local association should send to us, as far in advance as possible, notice of the date of the next meeting of his association and the program. But do not wait for all details if doing so will cause such delay that the notice cannot reach this office by the eighth of the month. A brief notice is better than none, but the fuller the better. Directly after each meeting send an account of the business transacted and the occurrences at the banquet, including, whenever possible, copies of all speeches or extracts from the most important of them.

Baltimore.

Many of the most prominent life insurance men of Baltimore and other cities of the East gathered in the largest hall of the Merchants' Club on East German street on the evening of Oct. 4 to pay a brilliant and an eloquent tribute to National President Ernest Judson Clark.

The banquet room was transformed into a place of beauty and fragrance by decorators and florists. Marcellus H. Goodrich, chairman of the executive committee of the Baltimore association, was the toastmaster. After recounting the achievements of Mr. Clark he introduced Adjutant-General J. Kemp Bartlett, vice-president of the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company, as the personal and official representative of Governor Goldsborough. After conveying the deep appreciation which the Governor feels for Mr. Clark having honored the State of Maryland by being worthy of so high an office, General Bartlett spoke briefly against the tax of 2 per cent., which the State levies on insurance premiums, urging the insurance men to work for its repeal.

The Mayor's secretary, Robert E. Lee, spoke as the representative of Mayor Preston, who was in Chestertown.

Rev. Dr. Charles Hastings Dodd, of Philadelphia, former pastor of the Eutaw Street Baptist Church, was the next speaker. He spoke of his intimate association with Mr. Clark, in his position as a member and a trustee of the Eutaw Street Baptist Church. Following Dr. Dodd, Roland O. Lamb, of Boston, Mass., president of the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, told of the rise of Mr. Clark in the employ of the company, and of the high esteem in which the company holds him.

Rev. Dr. Polemus H. Swift, pastor of the Madison Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, then made a strong plea for character, finding in the object of the gathering's honor a model of character.

He closed with an eloquent plea for a single standard of morals for men and women on the grounds that no man of character would ever ask for any exemption for himself.

Jonathan K. Taylor, local manager of the Provident Life and Trust Company, presented Mr. Clark with a large bouquet of roses, each blossom representing a member of the local association.

"I present this bouquet to you, Mr. Clark, and through you to your wife," he said, "realizing that whatever prosperity and happiness have come to you have come through the love and companionship of your wife and children. Our inspiration as insurance men is to take care of such as they."

Short responses were then made by Thomas H. Bowles, chairman of the board of directors of the Baltimore Trust Company and ex-president of the National Association of Life Underwriters; John Dolph, of Washington, D. C., another former president of the national organization, and Neil D. Sills, of Richmond, Va., another former president.

Mr. Clark himself was the last speaker. As he arose to speak the entire assemblage was on its feet, singing the last verse of "Maryland, My Maryland." He first expressed his deep appreciation of and gratitude for the wonderful tribute that had been paid to him. Then he outlined briefly what he and the men who will administer the affairs of the national organization with him hope to accomplish.

Cincinnati.

The regular monthly meeting of the Cincinnati association was held on Sept. 30 at the Business Men's Club. The speakers were Frederick L. Hoffman, statistician of the Prudential Insurance Co., and Professor F. C. Hicks, dean of College of Commerce of University of Cincinnati.

W. A. R. Bruehl, Jr., was elected secretary in place of Ralph Bloom, who recently retired from the insurance business.

Mr. Hoffman spoke on "Training and Retaining Agents." In taking up the matter of conservation, he referred to the great waste of agents who after once starting in to solicit insurance became discouraged and went in to some other line of business. Mr. Hoffman claimed that even a plumber or a bricklayer had to be trained before he was allowed to take up his trade, but in the life insurance profession a man is given a rate book and told to go out and get business. Mr. Hoffman also spoke at some length upon several phases of the business which had most impressed him at Atlantic City.

Prof. Hicks, who followed Mr. Hoffman, spoke on the great economic and social service which life insurance is rendering the people of the country. He claimed that competition was absolutely necessary, but that it should be constructive competition rather than that which is destructive.

Connecticut.

The regular October meeting of the Connecticut association was held on the 10th inst. in New Haven. The speakers were J. L. Loomis, H. H. Anderson, Lee C. Robens, R. J. Adams, F. A. Griswold, James L. Coyle and Maximilian

Stein. The address of Mr. Loomis was devoted to the various phases of the taxation situation. Other matters taken up by the speakers were the Atlantic City convention and local association work in general.

Detroit.

There was a good attendance at the regular monthly meeting of the Detroit association, which was held in the Elliott-Taylor-Woolfenden banquet hall on the evening of the 9th inst. Former President H. Wibirt Spence told of the work accomplished at the Atlantic City convention. In speaking of the non-resident membership amendment to the constitution of the National Association, Mr. Spence called attention to the fact that the constitution of the Detroit association as adopted last spring provided for a non-resident membership with nominal annual dues.

Announcement was made that the November meeting would be addressed by Judge Alfred J. Murphy, of the circuit bench of Wayne county.

District of Columbia.

National President Ernest J. Clark was the guest of Clement W. Huske, president of the District of Columbia association, at a luncheon on the 2d inst. in Washington. Other guests were the regular members of the association and a few life insurance men who had not affiliated with the local body, and George W. Ingham, District Insurance Commissioner.

Georgia.

The Georgia association tendered a complimentary dinner on the evening of the 3d inst. at the Ansley Hotel to Hugh M. Willet, who was recently elected chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Association. President Paul Dobbins acted as toastmaster, and told briefly of the honor which had been conferred upon Mr. Willet which had not been one of that gentleman's own seeking. Mr. Willet responded and in his remarks paid glowing tribute to the other officers of the National Association.

Robert L. Foreman gave an interesting talk on income insurance. Major Thomas Peters called attention to the fact that the Atlanta body was the first local association to suggest reforms in the matter of rebates and in the twisting of agents.

Grand Rapids.

An enthusiastic meeting of the Grand Rapids association was held on the 4th inst. at the Hotel Pantlind. Interesting talks were given by W. A. Willing, of the Equitable Life of Iowa, and R. E. Billings, newly elected secretary-treasurer of the association. The officers elected for the ensuing year are as follows: President, F. M. Wright, Equitable Life of Iowa; secretary-treasurer, R. E. Billings, Massachusetts Mutual; first vice-president, A. H. Bennett, Provident Life and Trust Company; second vice-president, P. A. Geldhof, Canada Life.

Indiana.

The October meeting of the Indiana association was held on the 6th inst. in Indianapolis. The speakers were Edward H. Young, Dr. E. E. Flickinger, W. C. Flynn, Isaac Pinkus and George R. Wilson, all of whom spoke on the Atlantic City convention. W. C. Flynn reported that he had made arrangements with the Indianapolis Star for an insurance column in the Sunday issue.

Iowa.

The Iowa association held its first meeting since the three months' summer intermission at the Grant Club on the evening of Oct. 4. Some twenty members attended the meeting and took part in the discussion of plans for increasing the membership of the organization and developing its activities. Will D. Bowles, who had been delegated to the national convention at Atlantic City, told the members of that meeting and its results.

Kansas.

The Kansas association anticipates an active season and President H. O. Garvey has nominated committees as follows: Membership.—S. E. Barber, Aetna, chairman; Richard J.

White, Germania, and Charles S. Sutton, National of Vermont.

Finance.—Elton S. Clark, Mutual of New York, chairman; E. D. Clithero, Home of New York, and John T. Moss, Massachusetts Mutual.

Press and Publicity.—Frank B. Parker, Connecticut Mutual, chairman; Henry H. Hall, New York Life, and E. H. Lupton, Bank Savings National.

Entertainment.—George Godfrey Moore, Germania, chairman; H. M. Leonard, Home Mutual of Topeka, and A. H. Hanson, Penn Mutual.

Conference.—E. W. Thompson, National of Vermont, chairman; F. B. Parker and Charles A. Moore.

Executive.—President H. O. Garvey, Massachusetts Mutual; Secretary Richard J. White, Germania; Treasurer, John T. Moss, Massachusetts Mutual; C. A. Moore, Equitable of New York, and E. W. Thompson, National of Vermont.

Maine.

At an enthusiastic meeting of the Maine association, which was held at noon on the 4th inst. at the Falmouth Hotel at Portland, arrangements were made to prepare a membership card. J. Putnam Stevens, F. M. Grant, D. S. Thomas and Sylvan B. Phillips, who attended the Atlantic City convention, gave the members the benefit of their impressions of the proceedings. An interesting talk was also made by Charles Widmer, of the Home Office staff of the Mutual Life of New York.

Minneapolis.

The September meeting of the Minneapolis association was held on the 27th of that month. J. Edward Meyers gave a brief outline of the proceedings at the Atlantic City convention.

New England Women's.

The New England Women's association met on the 4th inst. and fine enthusiasm marked the gathering. It was unanimously resolved that every woman present should consider herself a specially appointed committee to see that the attendance record this year would be perfect, with a view to having the association continue as custodian of the Waite trophy for attendance. It is anticipated that the next convention will see even a larger delegation from the New England Women's association than that which was present at Atlantic City.

North Dakota.

Members of the Fargo, N. D., association listened to a splendid address at noon on the 1st inst. by Hubert H. Ward, of Seattle and Portland, a former president of the National Association, and noted throughout the country as an insurance publicist, which followed an elaborate luncheon spread at the Gardner Hotel.

The address given by Mr. Ward was one of great value to the life insurance men of the city. In recent years he has become the recognized authority on life insurance advertising, and this phase of the business he thoroughly discussed in a most comprehensive manner. His audience, comprising the city's best known life underwriters, was much impressed with his discourse and gave the speaker the closest attention.

Philadelphia.

Much credit was given Congress for its action in amending the income tax provision of the new tariff act, so that the life insurance companies of the country will not be compelled to pay a tax on dividends to policyholders by National President Ernest J. Clark, in an address at the autumn dinner of the Philadelphia association, held at the Continental Hotel. While urging the members to exert every effort to prevent any increase in insurance taxes, either State or Federal, the speaker called attention to the amendment to the act just before it was passed, which, he declared, will mean a saving to the policyholders of the country of about $700,000 per annum.

The new national leader also advocated education, conservation and united efforts among the agents to help the policyholders in every way. He believes that it is essential for the good of the future in the insurance business that agents be well educated and morally clean, and he called particular attention to the recognition of the important place the insurance men occupy as shown by 40 large universities and colleges that have inaugurated courses in insurance. He insisted that increased taxation simply places a burden on the public, as it must pay the increased cost made necessary by it, and urged the agents to do their best to create public opinion against such legislation.

Tributes were paid the late I. Layton Register, a former national president and an ex-president of the local association, and the late R. Dale Sparhawk, an ex-vice-president of the local association, by Mr. Clark and other speakers, and at the business meeting of the organization resolutions were adopted on both deaths.

The banquet was the largest ever held by the organization, there being more than 250 at the tables. Songs and vaudeville entertainments were enjoyed during the courses and many cheers were given for "Home-run" Baker, Bender, Collins and Connie Mack.

Frank D. Buser, of the local association, who was chosen national secretary at the recent convention, was given a rousing reception when he made an address asking the co-operation of the organization, and other talks were given by William G. Carroll, a member of the National Executive Committee; former National President N. D. Sills; Hugh M. Willet, chairman of the National Executive Committee, and E. H. Plummer, an ex-national president. The toastmaster was John R. Fox, president of the Philadelphia association. Applications were presented for membership by 30 agents.

Pittsburgh.

For the thirteenth time in its history the Pittsburgh association held its inaugural meeting in the English room of the Fort Pitt Hotel on the evening of the 6th inst. In point of attendance and enthusiasm it surpassed any previous meeting of that body. Many of the past and present officers of the national body were present, including National President Ernest J. Clark, National Vice-President Edward A. Woods, Secretary Frank D. Buser, Chairman of the National Executive Committee Hugh M. Willet. The following former National Vice-Presidents were also the guests of the local body: Henry J. Powell, Neil D. Sills, Chas. Jerome Edwards, John Dolph.

Others prominent in National Association work were Warren M. Horner, chairman of the Committee on Education and Conservation; Jules Girardin, of Chicago; Herbert R. Lewis, of Rochester, and J. J. Jackson, of Cleveland, both former National Vice-Presidents; James M. Dickey, former president of the Erie association; Frank Tracy, president of the Buffalo association, and Everett M. Ensign, corresponding secretary of the National Association.

The only formal business of the evening was the election of five new members.

President Royal S. Goldsberry presided as toastmaster and briefly introduced National President Ernest J. Clark, who delivered his inaugural address. Mr. Clark in his address set forth the issues of the present association year, outlining the platform on the several important matters which are now before the National Association. The full text of his address will be found elsewhere in this number.

National Vice-President Edward A. Woods was the next speaker, and he discussed the victory won by life insurance men in securing important amendments to the income tax section of the tariff bill.

In speaking of the great injustice of taxes imposed upon the life insurance business he said, in part:

"Is the burden great? The tax of 70 cents for each $100 in premiums of 1860—and imposed then for the purpose of defraying the cost of State supervision—has grown to over $2. The $2,000,000 exacted in 1890 last year amounted to over $12,000,000 in addition to over $2,000,000 of real estate taxes."

"This amount would keep up over half a billion more life insurance. It would increase dividends or refunds by 15 per cent. It would reduce the gross cost of insurance 2 per cent. It would pay the salaries of all executive officers of all the life insurance companies of the United States several times over; and it would reduce the expense rate of life insurance companies about 8 per cent. It is therefore no trifling matter, irrespective of the principle.

"Do we understand clearly, and does the public and do legislatures understand, what claim life insurance has to be encouraged, not handicapped by taxation? Charles Sumner, arguing against life insurance taxation when the nation was at war and was straining to the utmost every possible source of revenue, said:

"What are the premiums? The premiums are themselves a tax. The premiums constitute the tax which the person insured pays for his insurance. * * * Here you are proposing to tax those who have taxed themselves that the nation might not have to support them. You are pulling down the pillars of the temple; you are undermining the structure."

"Life insurance in its essence is not a money-making enterprise, but a method of distributing a loss by combining large numbers of people. It promotes thrift and reduces poverty and the consequent burden of dependents upon the State. It is used either to indemnify for loss, or as a savings for old age or for both purposes in combination. It therefore partakes of the nature of fraternal insurance associations and of savings banks. Why, therefore, should it be the general policy of the State, as it is, to exempt from, or largely favor in taxation methods, fraternal and assessment associations, organized for exactly the same purpose, mutual savings banks, mutual domestic building and loan associations, mutual fire insurance companies, mutual marine insurance companies, all organized for the purpose of either thrift or sharing loss, and yet impose taxes upon sound, regular, life insurance?"

The speaker concluded his address by referring to the work which the National Association's committee on taxation had in view, and claimed that the campaign outlined would tremendously help and strengthen the National Association and every local body.

At the conclusion of Mr. Woods' address, Mr. Goldsby introduced former National President Henry J. Powell, who made an eloquent plea for new members. Mr. Powell has few equals as an exhorter and in a short time 66 applications for membership were handed in to President Goldsby.

Frank D. Buser, the newly elected secretary of the National Association, discussed publicity, developing his subject along two lines, the possibilities of publicity and publicity of the right sort. "Let me give you," said Mr. Buser, "a concrete illustration of how publicity was obtained in another line of business. It is reliably stated that during the past year 37 million dollars worth of bonds were sold by the bond houses of this country in denominations of $500 or less. Think, for a minute, what this means! Could these issues of bonds have been sold in these small denominations ten years ago, or even five years ago? Could the public have been persuaded that these investments were the proper form and kind for them to make in small denominations? We know that the public have made these investments, and what is the cause which produced this change?—purely and simply publicity.

"The information as given states that there was a combination formed by the leading bond houses throughout the country subscribing a fund to obtain publicity for these small issues and to open up a market which heretofore had been closed. In the columns of the Saturday Evening Post, Collier's Weekly, Leslie's and other standard publications, reading articles were published, explaining different forms of bond and stock investments, and an analysis, which, if properly followed, would tend to create in the mind of the buyer an answer to the question whether or not the particular issue in which he wished to invest was a safe one for him to undertake.

"On the side of the reading story of bonds and investments appeared the advertisements of many bond houses. The solicitors selling bonds used the current issues of these magazines most effectively when they went to their patrons and showed them that many of the securities listed and approved in the articles were the same bonds which they desired to sell, making use of the fact that the advertisement of the bond house which they represented was accepted by the periodical which published the articles, and that carried with it some guaranty of responsibility.

"That was a publicity movement, wisely controlled and carefully concealed. That is the sort of publicity movement we want to engage in, and to get over our reading stories in such shape that they will sink deep, and be retained in the minds of the people with whom we desire to do business."

Warren M. Horner, chairman of the Committee on Education and Conservation of the National Association, delivered a stirring address, in which he took up the matters to which his committee was devoted and outlined the results which the committee expected to accomplish. His address is given in full on another page of this issue.

Hugh M. Willet, chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Association, was the last speaker. His remarks were brief but highly complimentary to the spirit displayed by the local underwriters.

Utah.

The Utah association held a special meeting, preceded by the regular noonday luncheon, at the Commercial Club in Salt Lake City on Sept. 20. The attendance was unusually large. One of the principal features of the meeting was the reading of an address given by John Wanamaker, of Philadelphia, before the Leaders' Club of the Fidelity Mutual at that organization's recent convention in Philadelphia.

Fifteen new members were added to the roster, all of

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS

Entered as second class matter, Feb. 4, 1907, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

Vol. 8.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER, 1913.

No. 3.

An Official Communication of Interest to All Members of the National Association of Life Underwriters.

MR. HUGH M. WILLET,

Chairman Executive Committee,

National Association of Life Underwriters, Atlanta, Ga.

Dear Sir:—

In response to your letter regarding the "Federation of Insurance Agents" recently organized in Ohio, Missouri, and other sections of the Middle West, it is a movement in which the National Association of Life Underwriters or its local associations can in no way share or participate.

The necessities of such an organization to the fire, casualty, surety and other lines of insurance are doubtless apparent to those engaged therein. Life insurance and its interests, however, are so entirely different and the foundation principles of the National Association of such character that in the judgment of its executive officers our interests and those of our local associations throughout the United States and Canada can be far better served by maintaining an absolutely independent existence.

The great work which we have before us now is that of publicity, education, conservation and anti-taxation as applicable to life insurance, in addition to taking the best of care of this magnificent organization which has been built up during the past twenty-three years; consequently, with all due respect to our friends in other branches of insurance, our membership cannot afford to be drawn into any outside federation to the possible injury of our legitimate interests, opportunities or National influence.

Yours very truly,

ERNEST J. CLARK,

President.

THE STORY OF THE LIFE UNDERWRITERS' ASSOCIATION MOVEMENT.

AN INTERESTING HISTORY OF EVENTS WHICH GRADUALLY BUT IRRESISTIBLY TRANSFORMED CHAOTIC FIELD CONDITIONS INTO A STATE OF ORDER AND EFFICIENCY.

Development Of The Idea Passes Through Four Periods From The Early Years Of Local Initiative And Organization To The Present Day Era Of National Initiative, With Real Organization And Public Functions.

By Charles W. Scovel, President National Association, 1905-1906.
This article first appeared in the Fortieth Anniversary Number of the Insurance World.

Are we merely "here because we're here," or do we know the reason why? Do you really know that you are a member of one of the most influential and powerful organizations in this country? You are. Field conditions as you find them to-day are the results of thirty years of strenuous and unselfish labor. Read Mr. Scovel's story and learn about the movement which has made the solicitation of Life Insurance a dignified and profitable profession—Editor's note.

In the beginning—RANSOM.

I feel no irreverence in thus appropriating the first words of the Book of Genesis. This subject matter justifies it. For Life Insurance ranks next to Church and State as one of the three main institutions in which the millions of men unite to advance the welfare of mankind. And Chauncey Monroe Ransom, finding its methods of propagation in a state of chaos, created the Life Underwriters' Association as the one fittest force to bring about, very gradually but irresistibly, a state of order and efficiency.

Col. Ransom was editor and publisher of insurance journals, successively, at Baltimore and Boston, in which latter city he died, December 9, 1901, at the ripe age of 70. His daily work brought him into close contact with the chaotic, dog-eat-dog conditions prevailing among the life insurance men, and at the same time made him the natural mediator, friendly to all and wholly neutral, to bring them together. He began his efforts at Cincinnati in 1870 and worked two years to secure finally the organization of the Cincinnati Life Underwriters' Association. This was the first movement of its type to achieve even a temporary success; for it spread and lasted four years, whereas the only organizations recorded before 1872 (at Chicago in 1869 and at Pittsburgh in 1870), as well as several formed in the South in 1873-4, has proved mere flashes in the pan. Cleveland followed Cincinnati's example later in 1872, and the next year the two bodies united to form the Ohio association. The story of these and later beginnings is told in Col. Ransom's notable paper on the "Origin and Growth, Present and Future, of Life Underwriters' Association," read at the national convention of 1897, at Milwaukee, substantially as follows:

Local Beginnings.

"As in the case of both the Cincinnati and Cleveland associations, the State association undertook to regulate rebating and control the business practices of its members by hard and rigid rules. The whole idea at that time—which experience has proved to be a mistake—was to organize for the purpose of extreme action. Trouble appeared very early, and the final disbanding of both State and local associations, in 1876, was undoubtedly the result of this excessive ambition on the part of members to effect much needed reforms by stringent legislation, and a constitution and by-laws too exacting to secure harmony. Notwithstanding their failure the Ohio associations were instrumental in doing away with many bad practices in field work.

"The next movement to organize a life underwriters' association was inaugurated in Boston in 1883, seven years after the demise of the Ohio State association. The Boston Life Underwriters' Association was organized April 18 of that year, at a meeting held in the office of The Standard, of which paper I became publisher in 1878. The Boston organization has been conceded to be the first successful life underwriters' association ever organized. With the inauguration of that movement in Boston began the steady spread and development of the association idea."

It is more than a mere coincidence that the Pittsburgh association, the second one to prove permanently successful, was likewise organized (March 2, 1886) in the office of an insurance journal. James Calvin Bergstresser, founder and editor of Insurance World, was the prime mover in bringing together the Pittsburgh agents, just as Col. Ransom had been at Cincinnati and Boston.

In the fall of 1886 three other associations were formed: Michigan (Detroit), Minnesota (St. Paul) and Western New York (Buffalo); in 1897, New York (City), Maine and Philadelphia; in 1888, Kansas City and Chicago; in 1889, Cleveland and New Hampshire; and up to June, 1890, Nebraska, Cincinnati, Baltimore, Providence and Vermont—making seventeen in all. Fourteen of them—being all, except Minnesota, Kansas City and Cincinnati—took part through their delegates in starting the National Association. At this point Col. Ransom's paper, above-cited, continues in part as follows:

National Federation.

"At the time of the organization of the Boston association, and subsequently in the organization of other local associations, the final goal looked forward to was the organization of a national association. In 1890 the time seemed ripe to inaugurate this movement. At a conference in Boston, April, 1890, between representatives of the Boston, New York and Philadelphia associations, Messrs. Tilden Blodgett, of New York; E. H. Plummer, of Philadelphia, and D. N. Holway and C. M. Ransom, of Boston, were chosen as a committee to issue a call for a national meeting in Boston, June 18, 1890. Fourteen associations responded to this call by sending delegates, who held a two-days' session and completed in a most satisfactory manner the organization of the National Association of Life Underwriters.

"As had been predicted, the organization of the National Association acted as an immediate stimulus to the organization of local associations. During the seven years that have passed since then, thirty associations have been organized, more than double the original number. Some of these associations are not now active, but with few exceptions all are in a healthy state and are doing good work in the cause of genuine life insurance.

"Following the signing of an anti-rebate agreement among its members individually, the Boston association was instrumental in securing the passage in 1887 by the Massachusetts Legislature of an anti-rebate law—the first passed by any legislative body in this country—the wording of which is doubtless familiar to most of the members of this body. Since that time the associations in nineteen other States have been the means of securing the passage of similar laws; making twenty States up to date in which, under the law, rebating is a criminal offense for the agent, and in some States for both the agent and the applicant.

Improving Field Practices.

"Other improvements, too numerous to mention, over former field practices have been brought about through the influences of association work. There has been an earnest effort to up-build the great system of life insurance as a whole, instead of, as in former days, trying to tear down competitive companies; and to-day instances are not infrequent where agents cheerfully assist each other in securing applications.

"Through the opportunities afforded to hear and meet men of other callings at the social gatherings of the National and local associations, the doctrine of protection has been liberally spread abroad and a general elevation has taken place in the public estimation of the men engaged in the business.

"The future of life underwriters' associations depends upon the interest which the members of these associations manifest in their aims and purposes. As in all large enterprises, loyalty to a common cause is an essential element of success.

"Loyalty to the association means strict adherence to those principles and practices which will continue to reflect credit upon all those who are toiling in the great field of life insurance.

"Neither the local associations nor the National Association are legislative bodies. In the future, as in the past, their ends must be accomplished by suggestions, precept and example.

"There is a great and far-reaching responsibility resting upon the members of these associations, and they should spare no effort to protect the business of life insurance as well as the associations, from the assaults of foes, whether they be within or without the walls.

"Above and beyond the desire to see the association idea successfully carried out to its logical end, should be the determination to relax no effort which will place the business of life insurance on the topmost pinnacle of fame, and which will thus enable the men who at present constitute the membership of life underwriters' associations to leave to their successors an inheritance of good work and of duty well performed."

Truly Col. Ransom himself left such an inheritance, never to be forgotten. The National Association keeps his name in its constitution as its original and only honorary member, for whom that class of membership was created at organization. Over his grave at Newton, Mass., stands a fitting monument of granite, erected by all the associations, inscribed "In Grateful Recognition of His Inestimable Service in Their Formation and Nurture," and thus characterizing his life: "He Loved His Fellow-men."

The Life Agent First.

Like Ransom and Bergstresser many insurance editors elsewhere rendered inestimable service in helping to organize the local associations and assisting the whole movement by wise counsel and invaluable publicity. But with all due acknowledgment of editorial nurture and aid, the main credit for the inception, scope and influence of the association movement remains with the life insurance agent himself.

It is significant that the agents, the men that did the companies' fighting for them, were the first to realize that there could be such a thing as a common cause among life insurance men. They began in the 70's and reached permanent organization in 1883. Even the strictly professional forces, the actuaries and medical directors, did not organize until 1889, and it took the upheaval of 1905-6 to bring the executives together in January, 1907. Indeed, except only the fire insurance boards (needed in the daily routine of that business), no other class of insurance men got together on common ground as early as the life agents. The only other agency body is that of the local fire agents, formed in 1896. The organizations of fraternal, accident, casualty and surety and marine executives all date later than 1883.

The thirty years' record of the life underwriters' movement falls naturally into four divisions, two of seven years and two of eight years, viz:

1883-1890—local initiative and organizing.

1890-1897—local initiative, with national federation.

1897-1905—transition; ebb and turn of the tide.

1905-1913—national initiative, with real organization and public functions.

Transition Period.

Col. Ransom's paper has given us the most authoritative general survey of the first two periods, and of the purposes and ideals which have from the first animated the whole movement, even when there seemed least prospect of having them prevail in daily practice. Such a time of trial and turbulence was at hand in the third period, 1897-1905. Then the fires of company rivalry blazed more fiercely than ever. The years 1897-9 saw the hot finish of the race between the three "Giants" of their day to reach the billion dollar goal. These conspicuous examples were followed by many other companies. Things fairly sizzled. In the carnival of rebating other field practices also went to the dogs.

Of course, all this affected the associations. Their high aims and efforts of 14 years were mocked by conditions almost as bad as before they started. Weak members fell away, more of the weak locals than usual disbanded, and new organizing halted. From the roll call of 14 locals in 1890 there was solid growth up to the 30 recorded in 1897, with their membership reaching 1,337. The record for 1898 showed only 23 locals, with 967 members, a terrific slump. Something had to be done.

Peripatetic Presidents.

Here is where the National association first began really to take the initiative, by systematically stimulating the life of the local bodies whence its own life had been derived and sustained up to this time. It had no funds and no machinery to do it with. The initiative was taken by the voluntary action of President Richard E. Cochran, elected that year, in making himself the first of the long line of peripatetic presidents who have each traveled many thousands of miles at great cost of time and energy, and (until 1911-12) without a dollar from the treasury to do it on. By personally visiting "almost all the associations" Mr. Cochran stayed the ebbing tide and reported 26 locals and 940 members in 1899. It took the successive efforts of Presidents Johnson, Register and Wyman, each exceeding his predecessor's mileage, to bring both totals back to and above the 1897 mark by listing 35 locals and 1,441 members in 1902. Presidents Farley, Ward and Dolph successively increased the pace, the conventions of 1903 and 1904 devoted much time to discussing methods and means, prizes were offered. Also in 1904-5 an "Extension Fund" of $2,500 was raised by special subscription to be applied for some years to come in meeting the greatly increased cost of printed propaganda, addresses and correspondence centering in the secretary's office, which Ernest J. Clark had already made a beehive.

As the result of all these valiant efforts, with a few stalwart helpers in each administration, the whole movement took on new life. Local membership and fellowship was greatly stimulated and, while rebating kept on unchecked, the bitterness of competition and many of its incidental evils and abuses kept growing less. In many locals the sub-agents as well as the heads of offices were admitted to membership, and the leaven of the common cause began to permeate the entire field force as never before. The tide had turned, indeed. The 1905 roll showed 45 locals with 2,032 members, and that convention broke all records for delegates present. Thus this third period, beginning in gloom, ended with the organized agents grown stronger and more united than ever—as though made ready with prophetic foresight for the storm that was about to burst from an entirely new quarter and rage with unexampled fury.

The Epoch-Making Year.

At this distance one can look back at that year of 1905-6 in association work and say it was a wonderful year. As it seemed at the time it could only be described by the short, ugly word that General Sherman used for war. But just as war always does, that outburst of crowd-madness—attacking all life insurance indiscriminately, because of the uncovered faults of a few conspicuous individuals—welded the agents solidly together and developed leaders among them, not one, but many. In this strenuous year, though the president had to travel over 45,000 miles and devote practically all his time, it was no one-man job. Success was made possible only by the continuous co-operation of a dozen men, who traveled some thousands of miles apiece in attending hearings and conferences in the national work, in addition to the scores of leaders and thousands of agents who did active service in their own cities and State capitals. The result was to give to the whole association movement (to quote Secretary Clark's 1906 report) "a strength and influence throughout the continent that it could not have gained under normal conditions in the next ten years."

The New York investigation had begun in September and its first effect, soon manifest, was to frighten the millions of policyholders and to start lapsing on a wholesale scale, with widespread misery among dependents to follow. To reassure the people was the first line of association effort. Of the president's inaugural address on October 2—setting forth the "safeguards" of life insurance in plain words for the layman—10,000 copies were printed and distributed for use by the members everywhere.

To Comfort the People.

President Roosevelt, former President Cleveland, Secretaries Garfield, Taft and Root, former Secretary Paul Morton, Counsel Charles E. Hughes and the Armstrong Committee, and many others, were visited in October and November and interested in a fully elaborated plan for a great national dinner, to be given by the association at Washington and to be addressed by the President himself and a dozen of the country's biggest men of all classes—sounding a mighty unison of confidence in life insurance that would reach and comfort every policyholder in the land. Unfortunately, the very day the plan was to come up again at Cabinet meeting for final approval (which seemed assured) the testimony at New York as to the political contributions made by some life companies in 1904 filled the morning papers with the biggest scare-heads yet—and the intended unison led by that President did not seem "timely" just then. Nor had it become so, when considered again in December and January.

This important plan, on which a half dozen leaders spent as much travel and time as a whole year's administration had usually required, was, of course, kept from any publicity at the time. It seems all right to tell it now, however, and it ought to have its place on the record because, while seemingly unsuccessful, it directly brought about results that were nothing short of epoch-making. In January, when President Roosevelt sent word by Mr. Loeb that the dinner plan still did not seem timely, he added, "But tell Scovel that I have just directed that their association be invited to send delegates to this conference at Chicago, and that I hope they can work to the same purpose there."

Summoned for Public Service.

Thus it came about that the organized agents, who during 23 years had restricted their own activity to field matters exclusively, were officially called on to act for life insurance in general and for the policyholders in particular. The agents' delegates were enrolled with the State officials as regular members of the Chicago Conference; of the many company officials present, several were allowed to speak only by special consent. On this historic conference and the agents' share in it, let me quote from an address at the national convention of 1911 by Wm. J. Graham, who took a most useful part in the events of 1906 as actuarial adviser to the Committee of Fifteen—slightly condensing his language as follows:

"The revolution in life insurance, dating from five or six years back, has done much to develop the force of the agent in life insurance affairs. Superintendent Potter [of Illinois] in his address to-day emphasized the importance of the agent's position as a representative alike of the policyholder and the company. I think much of this recognition of the dual capacity of the agent was first won by . . . the representatives of the Life Underwriters' Association at the convention of Governors, Attorneys General and insurance commissioners at Chicago in February, 1906.

The Chicago Conference.

"This was an epochal convention, the first that ever brought together the officials of the different States in joint conference to make for uniform action and uniform laws. Company officials beyond number were present at the convention and later, before the famous Committee of Fifteen which emanated from this convention. Unfortunately and unreasonably the utterances of company officials were discounted at that time. It was then that the agent stepped in for the recognition which was due him as a representative of the policyholder, as well as of the company. The words of the agent, as spoken by Mr. Scovel and Mr. McMullen, and later by Wm. C. Johnston, Chas. Jerome Edwards and others, won from State officials and Legislatures consideration which was denied at that time to the utterances of the officials. The agent at that time took his part in the reconstruction era and in forwarding the renaissance of life insurance—and took it well."

The incalculable benefit gained by the Chicago conference was to hold back the tidal wave of extreme legislation that then threatened to sweep through most of the States. In restraining the legislators at that time, and in helping later on to enact the moderate reform laws finally recommended by the Committee of Fifteen, the officials of many States were backed up and greatly aided by the local agents, with their new prestige as the one class of insurance men that had been summoned by the President of the United States for that very service. It is noteworthy that in Texas and Wisconsin, where alone the later legislation ran to extremes, there were no associations at the time; and that in New York, the storm center where alone the legislation was rushed through in 1906, it was wholly due to the five strong associations, backed by the 18,000 agents, that the original bills reported by the Armstrong Committee, were opened at all to let in the 223 amendments that made them even temporarily workable.

Helping State Officials.

That these new public functions of the Life Underwriters' Association have become permanent, in normal times, is attested by the following shortened extracts from an address before the 1911 convention by Superintendent Hotchkiss, whom Governor Hughes chose to head the New York department:

"In very recent years your leaders have established a working arrangement with the supervising departments themselves. Anxious to sense the public's wishes as to laws or policy, we of the field of supervision have grown accustomed to ascertain such wishes by conference with your representatives. The response has been hearty, usually frank, and the result good. . . .

"The agents should make insurance legislation their business, not for selfish reasons, but for the common good. In no kind of law-making does the average legislator more need reliable advice than in this specialty. For reasons well understood, he is more apt to reject than accept the proposals of company or counsel; the policyholder, in the aggregate, can express himself, if at all, only through the department—and such expression depends largely upon the sort of man who for the moment is such department's head. Who understands these insurance problems better even than does the company? The agent. Who is the natural spokesman of the policy-holder? Not the company, but the agent. Why may he not, as the spokesman of both—yes, of the public itself—guide the departments and legislatures towards laws that shall always be broad and fair?"

New Working Machinery.

The emergencies of 1905-6 had enormously increased association activities everywhere, and had finally centered in the national body the general initiative of the entire movement and a brood of new public responsibilities. This meant inevitably new machinery that could keep going between conventions, and new constitutional provisions with enlarged powers in the national body and uniform standards of membership, etc., among the locals. The first three years of this fourth period brought these changes to a sound footing and registered the final transforming of the association movement from a loose federation, occasionally active at this or that point, into a close-knit, efficient organization with its national plant in continuous operation and its local branches far stronger and more active than ever before.

LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS, the official organ published monthly by the national body, was the first of these new developments and has proved to be the chief and essential factor in bringing about all the rest. It was started by the officers on their own responsibility in the summer of 1906, and has fully realized the broad purposes then declared, viz., first, to energize and unify the whole movement by interchanging our news and ideas and stimulating wider publicity for them through the insurance journals and other papers; second, to provide the sorely needed central headquarters and staff, on a permanent business basis; and, third, ultimately to yield revenue to extend the work and help pay the heavy traveling expenses of the president and other officers.

Its capable editor, Everett M. Ensign, has long since been made corresponding secretary of the association and in his office the work and records are centered, with great gain in efficiency and saving in money. While retaining a sizable surplus in its separate account, the News has paid into the general funds dividends of $500 in 1911 and $1,000 in 1912. The volunteer service of Walter L. Sammis, as editor, was invaluable during the first two years. Mr. Clark from the very beginning, and Mr. Edwards after the first year, have served continuously on the publication committee and deserve the lion's share of credit for working out the results. I may be pardoned the personal remark that I would rather have the administration of 1905-6 remembered for the founding of LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS than for anything else. Its usefulness is bound to keep growing with the years.

Efficient Organization.

The constitutional amendments of 1906-8, among many points, covered two main matters of membership and two of organization. For the first time the national body set definite membership standards for the locals, preventing the admission thereafter by old or new associations of the agents of any other than a regular legal reserve company—the "regularity" of a company depending not at all upon its age or size, but wholly upon its keeping clear of false principles and vicious practises, hurtful alike to the business and the public. The personnel of the national body itself—delegates, committee men and officers—was limited strictly to persons "clearly identified with the agency field as distinguished from the home office," while leaving the locals free to admit home office men, examiners and journalists to such local membership privileges as they pleased.

The long-established plan of having each local association represented in the executive committee by a member elected for three years was made really effective by authorizing a member pro tem to be substituted when the regular one could not be present. This insures at all times a fully representative smaller body to save the time of the convention, and to act with authority between sessions.

An entirely new and much-needed advance was the creation of an executive council of seven—the president, secretary, executive chairman and four others elected in alternate pairs for two-year terms, on the president's nomination. This is the cabinet, in session by correspondence all the time and physically together whenever needed, overseeing the editorial policy of the News and generally sharing the continuous executive responsibility with the president—normally a most welcome aid in his work; but also, should the need ever arise, an ever-ready power to overrule him by a majority not of his choosing.

The administration of the National Association of Life Underwriters is no longer a one-man job in any sense of the phrase.

Canada's Organizing.

In extent, as well as in content and intent, the growth of the movement during this last period, 1905-13, has exceeded all expectation. Canada's organizing was the wonder of 1906. Transitory organizations had started at Toronto in 1900 and at Quebec in 1902, the latter showing much strength for a year or two before dying down. Montreal agents (sub-agents only at first) began the great permanent movement by organizing early in 1906, after corresponding with Secretary Clark, of the National Association, about methods, constitution, etc. At the mid-year meeting in May this new association was admitted to membership and its representative, Mr. Thos. J. Parks, seated in the executive committee. Meantime the fire was spreading. By June half a dozen others had started, and on June 25 the writer and Vice-President McMullen attended the first luncheon of the present Toronto association and the meeting of delegates to organize the Life Underwriters' Association of Canada. The fire spread on from coast to coast, and by October the half dozen locals had become eighteen, and the Dominion organization, including them all, was admitted as one member of the national body, now become international. The Canada association has kept right on growing, its annual convention of 1912 having a roll of 35 associations with 1,101 members. In 1906-8 it was represented by invitation at the sessions of the Royal Commission and parliamentary committees, and there, too, the organized agents gave welcome aid in framing a wise and fair life insurance code. Office and Field, the adopted official organ, has been a vital factor in the Canadian movement from the first. How warmly the brilliant start of the Canada organizers was appreciated by the older associations was shown by their promptly choosing Toronto as the place of the 1907 national convention, one of the best of the long series.

New Growth and Groups.

St. Louis in 1906 brought the convention farther to the south and west than ever before and added growth in those directions was stimulated by meeting at Los Angeles in 1908, Louisville in 1909 and Memphis in 1912, with Detroit and Chicago in between. St. Louis started this fourth period with a roll of 51 associations, counting Canada as one; or 68 locals all told in the two nation-wide organizations; with total membership of 2,556, including 500 for Canada. President McMullen, in the hard year of 1906-7 with the new laws turning things topsy-turvy, and President Edwards, in the two following years of financial panic and depression, pulled mightily at the laboring oar; and Presidents Whittington, Powell and Bishop, though in better times and with all the new machinery running smoothly, kept up practically the same fast pace in travel and work. Thus the 1912 roll was brought up to 69 associations, counting Canada as one; or 104 locals, all told, in the two groups; with total membership of 3,796, including Canada's 1,101. President Sills has this year been keeping right along the same lines and will doubtless have yet larger totals to report. He has also assisted former President Ward in starting off a new group, the Northwest Life Underwriters' Congress, formed by the existing locals in Washington, Oregon, Montana, Idaho, Utah, British Columbia and Alberta. Its first annual session was held at Seattle June 2 and 3, the next is fixed for Portland, and Vancouver is in line for the third. Other similar groups may well be formed in the more remote sections to bring convention benefits closer home to the rank and file—and with the further result, I believe, of increasing their appetite for the big circus in the main tent.

The main achievement of the association movement has made the least noise—the bringing together of once hostile agents into a consciousness of their common cause, a sense of fellowship, a desire to have the other good fellows think well of one. In other words, it has gradually evolved within the ranks a public opinion, favoring the square deal and frowning at evils. That silent, pervasive and persuasive force has gained much headway in the new era of life insurance; it is ever pressing onward, and the end is not yet.

The Great Silent Force.

Against old evils the association has used all means of attack. Rebating it sought to destroy by pledges and discipline within its own ranks from the first; also by getting a score of States to make laws that were too far ahead of the times to be enforced. Then it put the issue squarely to the companies to control each its own agency force, which 18 companies in 1893 privately promised the association to do, and which 25 companies in 1895 (as the result of President Plummer's personal round of the offices) publicly contracted with each other to do, providing $10,000 a year and such referees as former Governor Russell, of Massachusetts, and Speaker Thomas B. Reed to enforce the compact. This also failing, the convention in 1899, and again in 1900, further proved the agents' good faith by urging the companies to reduce first-year commissions and increase renewals, and thus encourage bona fide business only and keep it on the books. All in vain. But as soon as the New York investigation got far enough to throw the fear of God into the worst high-pressure headquarters, the agents got busy right away and for the very first time succeeded. Pittsburgh led early in December, 1905, with its special committee, attorney and prosecuting fund. Many other association have since had like success, and almost everywhere King Rebate is now an outcast. The anti-rebate laws have been amended generally to penalize both giver and receiver and make either testify against the other, and also to cover the later devices of board-contracts, stock-options and the like inducements. With the advance of public opinion in and out of the business, these laws are now as well enforced as other penal statutes.

"Twisting" was denounced in a strong campaign and booklet by President Bowles in 1897-8 and by numerous resolutions since—particularly in 1911-12 when the national and local bodies did much to stop the so-called abstractors and others in their specious efforts to induce policyholders to withdraw existing reserves to invest themselves and carry new policies with the interest. In many States the associations have got new laws passed to penalize any misrepresentations or incomplete comparisons by the would-be twister. More than that, he is looked upon by all decent agents as a sneak and a snake—and he knows it!

Good Ethics, Good Business.

As to competitive practices in general, the full stature of association ethics was declared by the 1911 convention in a strong resolution that expressly recognized the "obligation to put the larger interests of the life insurance business above any personal or company interests," and the consequent duty to "eliminate all prejudicial and unfair competition." To these ends the association "calls upon its membership to eschew all competition of a nature calculated to unsettle the insurance mind of a prospect" and "in general to apply the Golden Rule where at any time there may be temptation for personal interest in competition to encroach upon professional service." The one further step is indicated in choosing for the 1913 Prize Essay Contest, now under way, the subject, "Creative Soliciting, Rather Than Competitive"—in order to bring out the practical reasons and methods whereby these higher ethics shall be seen by all to be also good business; to be the most profitable working plan, dictated not only by professional idealism, but still more by enlightened self-interest.

Efforts to improve the personnel of the field forces and to drive out rounders and grafters have been constantly made by the associations, a number of them maintaining reference bureaus or other defenses against the disreputables. Merely undesirable part-time men have also been opposed by a growing sentiment since 1901, when the convention urged the companies not to employ "persons who only make the business a make-shift or temporary employment" and urged the locals to prosecute those found soliciting without a license. The 1909 convention, with ringing resolutions, led a stronger campaign against the harm done by "part-time agents and one-case brokers who neither educate a prospect nor create an applicant." Already new laws have been secured in several States, under which the department can and does refuse licenses to any but bona fide agents, and which also forbid any commission to be paid to or shared with an unlicensed person.

Education and Publicity.

Education of the public through both the schools and the press has been advocated and practically promoted from early days. The second convention, 1891, appointed a committee to correspond with various colleges and institutions throughout the country to get life insurance made "a common class study" as generally as possible, and also endorsed a proposition for establishing a chair of life insurance in the University of Chicago. A large number of higher institutions give some general, theoretical instruction in life insurance, and of late years many local associations have helped make these courses more practical by supplementary lectures and addresses from prominent officials and agents. Local newspaper publicity of the most readable and informing kind has been an indirect product of these educational efforts, and the same has been very widely obtained for the actions, ideas and addresses developed in the association meetings and conventions. When there is any sort of a news happening to hang it on, the newspapers are often very generous in printing such matter, especially if they are supplied with advance copy, photographs of prominent speakers or other data. For instance, before the St. Louis convention, much advance copy was mailed by the three press associations to their 1,400 papers and 100 were also reached by Associated Press wire direct from the platform, resulting in some thousands of notices ranging from a dozen lines to several columns. All this publicity made the best kind of a beginning for the "campaign of education among the public, the press and the legislators" that we had promised President Roosevelt and the Committee of Fifteen to undertake as our part in that great movement for wise and uniform laws.

A Greater Campaign.

Now, in these piping times of peace, the National Association is entering upon another and greater campaign of education and conservation—started by the 1912 convention in the hands of the strong special committee headed by Warren M. Horner. To the academic part of this campaign, directed to the colleges and high schools, President Sills, as well as the committee, has been giving a great deal of attention, and much more has been done this year in the way of increasing and amplifying life insurance courses than ever before.

Meantime the committee is pressing forward with the broad plans for diffusing among the people generally correct ideas as to life insurance, what it is and what it does. The possibilities of benefit to the public and to the business are beyond imagining. It is a big contract to handle such a campaign (over and above the financing of it)—but it is peculiarly the work of the agent, who is in closest touch with the people, and what they don't know, and how best to tell it to them. And the agent's great country-wide organization, after this eight-year period of development along kindred lines, is now strong and ready for just such a monumental undertaking to crown its thirty years of past achievement and inaugurate a new period of still broader and higher public usefulness.

Postscript.—To the foregoing record the Atlantic City convention of September, 1913, has added its full quota of progress.

Its attendance was 934, much the largest yet. And it threw its whole force behind the great campaign of education and conservation in all its phases. It repeatedly showed real enthusiasm for the big, vital idea of institutional publicity in the advertising and other columns, and it bade the existing committee go right on with the work along that line, as well as among the colleges and schools.

The subject of taxation, one phase of the conservation campaign, was singled out in two ways: First, a ringing appeal was telegraphed to the congressional conferees and President Wilson to exempt all policyholders' dividends from the National income tax—which telegrams, it is since learned, were main factors in winning that eleventh-hour victory at Washington for a just cause deemed already lost. Second, a strong new committee, headed by Vice-President Edward A. Woods, was created to lead in a broad movement to educate the agents, policyholders, legislators and everyone else to realize the error and injustice of the present excessive taxation levied by the several States upon policyholders' premiums and assets.

Unprecedented growth in all lines was reported for the year. Seventeen locals were added to the roll and only one dropped out, bringing the total to 84. The number of members reported was 4,139; paid for 3,616—a gain of 921, or 34 per cent. These figures are exclusive of Canada's 35 locals and 1,216 members. The association movement as a whole now includes two general and 119 local bodies, with 5,355 actual members. A very large proportion of all the agency heads are actual members, and their scores of thousands of sub-agents can thus be counted on as adherents, ready to follow association leadership in actions for the common good.

LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS, while holding a balance of $312 larger than a year ago, paid into the general funds a dividend of $1,500—being one-half more than last year and $207 more than the entire national dues in 1904. Thus its net cost to the association for the year was less than half the subscription dollars received. Its value is not so easily measured.

The 84 cities now represented include the bulk of those capable of keeping up a live, active local association. Future growth must mean more members, rather than more organizations—more members for each local, not only within its own city, but in all the towns around. To help locals enlist non-resident members on a distinct basis, the convention reduced the national dues for such a class to $1 apiece, just enough to cover the individual subscription to the NEWS required by the postal regulations.

To visit 67 old associations and to organize and enroll 17 more, President Sills had to travel for 174 days over 32,000 miles of track. He will close the list of the traveling presidents, now 15 years long. The task has grown too great. Moreover, while the need of an organizer on the road is growing less, the need of a central executive always on the job is growing far greater, with the greater scope and importance of the national activities now undertaken. In a resolution rehearsing these facts, the convention requested the incoming president to act accordingly. Then it proceeded to elect, in the person of Ernest J. Clark, the one man of widest administrative experience for nine years past, the one peculiarly fitted to inaugurate the more centralized system of operation henceforth demanded. He will have to work as hard as his predecessors, and will get less fun with the work. But his success in this one year will mean much for the whole new era of broader activity upon which the association has embarked.

THE OBSERVANT MAN IN LIFE INSURANCE.

The Psychological Moment in an Interview Recognized Only by the Solicitor Trained to Habits of Keen Attention and Observation.

By Hubert H. Ward, General Agent, Pacific Northwest, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company.

There is considerable difference between a man and an insect. Certainly! But did you ever stop to think that one great difference was in the range of vision? Some insects have a range of vision taking in about half a sphere, and therefore, they are able to see objects behind as well as those in front. Man's opportunities for observation are more limited, but this gives greater possibilities for concentration. Mr. Ward tells us in an easy and interesting manner, how we may use our powers of observation to greater advantage.—Editor's Note.

Are you, Mr. Agent, an observer? Do you notice the little things in life as you go about your daily work? I know of no business where observation counts for so much as it does in the salesmanship of Life Insurance.

We, in the Life Insurance game, might be said to be on a straight-away track which reaches as far as the eye can see, and is only lost in the dim horizon, but we know that it goes on even beyond our vision, stretching out into infinite space. As we look back along the track over which we have come, we see the rails stretching backward as far as the eye can reach and to the dim horizon. If we have been keen with our "observation" we have some idea of the scenes along that track, and if we are keen observers, we are constantly having a relish for the scenes which we know are just ahead of us. Life for each one of us is a track and we, as individuals, might be likened to a train on that track.

The modern train of to-day is composed of the following essentials, first power represented by the engine that the train may get somewhere; second, day coaches and sleepers that comfort and rest may be had, and third, on first-class long-distance trains, the observation car. This car is a comparatively new innovation.

A Lesson.

I do a great deal of riding on railway trains and wherever I can I always ride on a first class train, and I ride in the observation car. I have crossed the continent on first class trains on all the trans-continental lines, and have usually only been in my own section of the sleeping car when the berth was made up. I have spent my time in the observation car. Why? do you ask. First, because of its many opportunities for observation. There is the place where the traveler may observe two things, nature and human nature. Many an hour have I sat on the observation platform watching nature. Many an object lesson have I had pointed out to me on the back platform. Many an hour have I sat in a comfortable chair on the inside of the observation car watching human nature. There is a freedom which the traveler carries with him into the observation car which does not exist anywhere else on the train. The average traveler is open to impressions, and if he is keen, those impressions, little as they may be, serve to accentuate his observing powers. The observation car is a good place in which to make acquaintances. Not long ago in riding from Seattle to Portland I got acquainted with the man who originated a simple little lotion called "Tiz," and in our conversation of an hour I got some good ideas from him.

On my recent six weeks' trip East, I covered a distance of 8,059 miles from Portland to Portland, and I tried to make the most of my powers of observation. I think I spent nearly all of my time in the observation car and many an hour was spent on the observation platform. Sometimes on that observation platform, even though it may be crowded, I may wish to be alone with my thoughts and it is always one's privilege. At other times I may be learning something by conversation with my fellow passengers. In any event, I try to make full use of what that car is on the train for—OBSERVATION. The railway train is a great place for the study of human nature. We meet all kinds, some pleasing, some disgusting. If we have trained our observation powers properly we will let the pleasing make impressions on the brain and we will dismiss from our thoughts that which is disgusting.

Three years ago up in the Cascades near the tunnel at the top of the railroad grade on the Great Northern occurred an avalanche which swept a train from the track into the canyon below, killing some ninety passengers. Following this catastrophe the Great Northern Railway with the energy characteristic of J. J. Hill proceeded to make on that mountain a massive concrete snowshed over which future avalanches might go at will and with perfect safety to the trains which might happen to be there at such time.

Mr. Life Insurance Agent, take the lesson to heart. Catastrophes frequently overcome you at times. Possibly an avalanche strikes you and sweeps you from your moorings and carries you bruised and bleeding into the depths of despair. Are you (Mr. Agent of the catastrophe temporarily sweeping you from your feet) going to permit your life's railroad track to be severed so that there may be no connecting rails between the past and the future, or are you going to pick yourself up again, build a concrete snowshed and start your trains going again on schedule time?

Starting from the Terminal.

Did you ever stand in any of the great railway terminal stations of our cities and watch the trains arrive and depart? Well, Mr. Agent, every morning you start out from your railway terminal in life insurance, and you have a schedule to keep and a certain distance to cover which requires a certain number of hours of good hard work and at night you pull your train into the terminal at the end of the day's run and your engine stops. What happens when the train stops in a railway terminal at the end of a trip? The platform quickly becomes alive with passengers who have disembarked and are hastening to their various destinations. The train has not made its run in vain. It has had something to deliver. It has delivered goods, both human, baggage and express. Mr. Agent, at the close of your day's run when your day stops and your work for that day ceases, what have you to deliver as a result of that day's run? The deliveries which you can make are largely the result of the observations which you have made during the day. With one prospect you observe by keen attention that he is ready for life insurance. You know the psychological moment when it arrives and the result is you write the application.

The Psychological Moment.

By lack of observation you may not see the psychological moment when it arrives and you lose the application to some other man. Remember the railroad train. First you must have an engine, you must have your steam up. With that steam you must generate power, power to move things, power to accomplish tasks. An engine of itself may have power, but an engine running over a railroad track without cars behind it carrying something, is burning fuel and accomplishing nothing. You then, Mr. Agent, must have your steam and your power, but you must have something back of the steam and the power, something back of the engine. You must have a trainload of passengers, in your case, intelligence, honesty, truthfulness, sobriety, knowledge of your business, interest in others, knowledge of human nature, and last but not least, a keen power of observation that you may apply these other qualifications at the right moment to the right man in order to produce the results necessary for your success in business.

Mr. Agent, do you get me? The engine is the first and foremost essential, but the observation car at the other end of the train also has its place. A train is rated to-day as a first class train by its observation car. The Life Insurance agent is, in turn, known to-day as a first class Life Insurance agent by his power of observation, his ability to see things.

In conclusion, Mr. Agent, you are ready each morning with your train for a day's run just as the engine is ready with its empty cars. The train makes dividends for the company, however, by having passengers in those empty cars. You have a pocketful of empty applications when you start out on your work in the morning. You only make dividends for yourself as you fill those empty applications with the signatures of prospects for Life Insurance.

At night when you return to your home after your work is done, you rate the success of your day's work by the one, two, three or four signed applications, which you have with you, and you will find that most of the applications you do write are written from the "observation car" of your brain.

OFFICIAL NOTICE

Pittsburgh, November 10, 1913.

In re Local Publicity.

To the Local Associations:

The national press committee wants to do what it can to help you get more publicity in your home papers about your association and its doings, and about life insurance and its doings.

To get editors and proprietors to realize personally what this great association movement is, and that it really stands for public service, is the point on which the rest hinges. That means they must be personally cultivated by the right men, using the right seed.

We will try to send you from national headquarters some of the right seed. The first batch will be some pamphlets telling the story of the association movement, as printed in this issue of the NEWS, but in a shorter form.

You will have to supply the right men, if you have not already done so. That doesn't mean taking just any old men, not otherwise assigned, and labeling them "press committee." It means your best men—best in local standing, in association zeal and in knowledge of newspaper men and methods.

Better include one or more in close touch with your colleges and schools, and call them the "Education and Conservation Committee." This will concentrate the local end of the whole work that the two national committees have in hand, and be most effective in dealing with the newspapers.

From those men, or any others, I urgently request suggestions of just what they want this committee to do, if possible, to help them as time goes on.

We want and need these practical suggestions, and full information as to local conditions. The whole idea of national co-operation for such local publicity is new in our associations. We have no set plan, no elaborate prospectus; but are beginning with these first steps, in firm faith that worth-while results (maybe more than any of us imagine) can be worked out step by step, if all of us put our heads together and our shoulders to the wheel.

NEW FEDERAL INCOME TAX BRINGS TO LIGHT IMPORTANT QUESTIONS.

Alfred Hurrell, Attorney for the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, Files Memorandum with the Revenue Bureau Discussing Various Points with Relation to Companies Withholding One Per Cent. of Certain Payments.

Beginning with the first day of this month, life insurance companies must withhold, in behalf of the Federal Government, one per cent. of certain payments made by them to individuals. This is required by the Federal Income Tax law, which provides for withholding taxes at the source. The companies are now trying to determine what classes of their thousands of transactions with policyholders, agents, officers and others will come within this requirement. The Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department at Washington is busy preparing rules and regulations for the guidance of corporations and others affected by this administrative feature of the law. The Association of Life Insurance Presidents recently filed with the Revenue Bureau a memorandum, prepared by Alfred Hurrell, the association's attorney, discussing various points which have come up for consideration.

Mr. Hurrell's memorandum is as follows:

Memorandum Concerning Income Taxes That Should Be Withheld by Life Insurance Companies on Payments Made by Them After Oct. 31, 1913.

Life insurance companies will be confronted on Nov. 1, 1913, with the question of what taxes must be withheld by them under the new Federal Income Tax law on their daily transaction with policyholders and others, numbering in the aggregate many thousands. The importance of correctly and accurately understanding and applying the provision of this law requiring taxes to be withheld at the source can scarcely be overestimated. Such a provision is an innovation in this country and inevitably much misunderstanding and friction will abound in its operation for a time at least. However strong the legal obligation on corporations to withhold the tax when paying income to third persons, the tendencies of those who must submit to the deduction will be to criticise and complain of the corporations and the Government alike regarding taxes so withheld. Hence the importance of avoiding as much of this irritation as possible by early and well-considered rulings and instructions.

In the case of life insurance companies, with their millions of policyholders and the multifarious payments that are made annually under many forms of insurance contracts, it is a matter of great concern that confusion and annoyance should be avoided by correct initial construction of the act by those charged with the duty of enforcing it.

Rule of Construction.

To get at the true meaning and intent of the law in question, we need first to free our minds of all preconceived ideas (if we have such) in order that we may take the language as it is written and seek to apply to it the rules of construction by which a court would be bound to construe it. Any other course will bring only confusion, controversy and probably in the end litigation, under which every one will be brought back to the legal point of view which should have been taken in the beginning and which must ultimately prevail.

Payments to Policyholders and Their Classification.

In dealing with the matter of withholding the tax we need to consider only those cases where life insurance companies are required to pay out money to individuals. As the bulk of their payments are made to their policyholders, and as it is with their relation to their policyholders that companies are chiefly concerned and with whom there is the greatest danger of misunderstanding, we will discuss this class of payments before touching on others.

The query then is, when and under what circumstances must taxes be withheld on payments by life insurance companies to policyholders or beneficiaries?

Now, what are these payments in the main?

1. Death claims or proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured.
2. Matured endowments paid to the insured at the maturity of the term mentioned in the contract.
3. Surrender values paid in cash to the insured upon the surrender of his contract.
4. Annuities payable during the life of the annuitant.
5. Annuities payable for a term certain (not involving a life contingency).
6. Premium refunds or so-called "dividends" to policyholders.
7. Interest paid on moneys left on deposit with the company.

Death Claims, Endowments and Surrender Values Not Annual Income Within Meaning of Paragraph E.

Turning now to paragraph E we find that life insurance companies are required to deduct and withhold the tax upon payments which constitute fixed or determinable annual income of the payee when such payments exceed $3,000 for any taxable year. It requires no argument to show that a single payment of either (1) the proceeds of a policy, or (2) a matured endowment, or (3) a surrender value, cannot be classed as a fixed or determined annual income. Each is merely a lump sum payment in discharge of a contract obligation which, from the very nature of the transaction, cannot recur and which, therefore, cannot be regarded in any sense as an annual or even a periodical gain of the recipient. To quote the word of the law used in paragraph B, such payments are not annual income, that is, "fixed or certain," but are distinctly "irregular as to the amount or time of accrual." We will discuss later the question as to whether these three classes of payments or any of them may be taxed in whole or in part as income of the insured or his beneficiaries. At this point we urge only that no tax upon such payments need be withheld by life insurance companies since none of such payments constitutes a fixed or determinable annual income of the person receiving the same, as would be required to bring it within the provisions of paragraph E.

Paragraph E Is Modified by the Provisions of Paragraph B

This brings us to the second group of payments to policyholders consisting of (4) annuities for life, (5) annuities for a term certain, (6) premium refunds or so-called "dividends" to policyholders. These payments come within the provision of paragraph E as being "fixed or determinable annual gains, profits and income," hence, if in excess of $3,000 they would come within the provision requiring the tax thereon to be deducted and withheld by the company paying the same, were it not for the fact that by paragraph B they are specifically exempt from the law and are not to be included in the taxable income of the persons receiving same. This provision (in paragraph B) says:

"Payments made by or credited to the insured on life insurance endowment or annuity contracts upon the return thereof to the insured at the maturity of the term mentioned in the contract or upon surrender of the contract shall not be included as income."

We note first that payments made on "annuity contracts" are specifically enumerated in the language just quoted; that dividends or premium refunds are payments made "on life insurance contracts" and are generally specifically provided for by the terms thereof.

Annuities Wholly Exempt Under Paragraph B.

Perhaps it will be best for us to discuss separately the classes of payments just referred to. The specific mention of annuities in paragraph E among other payment items on which the tax must be withheld leads us to consider whether there is a conflict between this requirement and the exemption given to payments on annuity contracts in paragraph B as quoted above. It seems clear, however, that what was intended was to draw a distinction between payments on annuity contracts by life insurance companies and payments of other kinds of annuities such as arise by reason of gift, trust deed, demise or bequest. We may assume that the tax must be withheld on the class of annuities last referred to, and yet as to payments made by life insurance companies under annuity contracts issued by them no tax need be withheld, because under paragraph B none must ultimately be paid by such annuitants.

The suggestion that life insurance company annuities may be taxable in part and exempt in part leads us to consider the words "payments made by or credited to the insured on * * * annuity contracts upon the return thereof to the insured." It has been urged that the use of the words "return thereof" indicates that only such annuity payments or parts of payments as represent moneys paid as a premium by the policyholder to the life insurance company are exempted under this provision. This argument might have some force were it not for the use of the words "or credited to." These words seem to indicate that not only payments made by the insured, but payments of interest to the company which have been credited to the insured will be exempt when paid to the policyholder. This view of the matter covers the entire fund out of which annuity payments must be made, since the fund is made up solely of payments of premiums to the company by policyholders and payments of interest to the company which in turn are credited to policyholders. In other words, the funds which life insurance companies hold for the payment of annuities are made up of payments by the insured plus payments credited to the insured. Viewing the matter, therefore, from an insurance company's standpoint, it would seem that the words "return thereof" can mean nothing more than "the payment thereof," so we reach the conclusion that all payments made by life insurance companies on annuity contracts shall not be included as income of the annuitant.

Same Rule Must Apply to Dividends.

As to premium refunds or so-called "dividends" to policyholders, we feel that much the same argument must prevail as that which we have used with reference to payments of annuities. Dividends are clearly the return to policyholders of the excess funds created by their premium payments beyond what experience has proved the cost of their insurance to be. Life annuities they mature in instalments, and are, therefore, payments at the maturity of the terms mentioned in the contract. There is no limitation of the exemption to sums of less than $3,000, so we must conclude that the exemption extends to annuities and dividends to policyholders regardless of the amount paid in each case.

If it be claimed that dividends to policyholders are paid in part from the net earnings of insurance companies, as some have contended, and as such are taxable as income of policyholders, we would call attention to the seventh deduction permitted to individuals in computing net income for the purposes of normal tax. This provision says that "dividends * * * from the net earnings of any * * * insurance company which is taxable upon its net income as hereinafter provided" shall be deducted. There can be no doubt but what insurance companies are taxable under paragraph G upon their net income computed in the manner which the statute prescribes. So we find that whether we view a life insurance dividend to a policyholder as a refund in part of his premium or as a payment to him of a portion of the net earnings of the company, the dividend is wholly exempt as income of the policyholders.

Tax of Small Interest Payments to Policyholders Need Not Be Withheld.

Dealing now with (7) payments of interest on moneys left on deposit with life insurance companies, the question arises as to whether the tax should be withheld under the provision in paragraph E requiring the tax to be withheld on interest "upon bonds and mortgages, or deeds of trust or other similar obligations" although such interest does not amount to $3,000. Obviously the ruling of the Department will have to turn on the meaning of the words "similar obligation," because a deposit left with a company under the provisions of a life insurance contract cannot with accuracy be described as either a bond, a mortgage, or a deed of trust, nor do we believe that it can be called similar to such obligations.

It will be illuminating to review the history of the clause which requires interest to be withheld at the source on "bonds and mortgages or deeds of trust or other similar obligations of corporations," etc. As it originally appeared in the House bill it covered not only interest on secured obligations such as bonds, mortgages and deeds of trust but also "other indebtedness" of all corporations, including life insurance companies. When the bill reached the Senate this provision was amended to read "bonds and mortgages or deeds of trust or other obligations," the word "similar" not having been inserted as yet. It was only when the Conference Committee came to deal with the matter in its final work of perfecting the bill that the word "similar" was inserted with the plainly evident intent of confining the withholding of the tax on small interest payments of corporations to obligations like bonds, mortgages and deeds of trust, though perhaps not called such by name. Knowing as we do that these amendments restricting the scope of this provision were inserted from time to time for the very purpose of meeting the criticism of the hardship that would result in having the tax withheld on numberless interest payments of very small amount, particularly payments made by life insurance companies on deposits left with them, pursuant to the terms of life insurance contracts, we cannot escape the conclusion that it was the intent of Congress to exempt these payments from the deductions imposed on general corporate obligations.

Tax on Payments to Life Agents Should Not Be Withheld Because Such Incomes Are Not "Fixed and Determinable."

We come now to the consideration of compensation paid by life insurance companies for services of various kinds. No question is raised as to whether the tax must be withheld on salaries to officers and employees in excess of $3,000.00 per annum, such salaries being strictly within the designation of "fixed or determinable annual gains, profits and income." The question does arise, however, as to whether the deductions to be made on payments on November 1st and thereafter shall be merely the tax accruing on salaries for the last two months of the year or must include the tax on salary income for the eight months preceding November 1st. We presume this question will be determined with reference to business interests generally, so make no special comment upon it in behalf of life insurance companies. We do urge, however, that the matter be considered and that definite instructions be given so that life insurance companies may clearly understand what their duties are in this respect.

Life insurance companies sometimes compensate brokers acting for them in connection with the purchase or sale of securities on a commission basis, while attorneys representing them in legal matters and physicians making examination of applicants for insurance are usually compensated on a fee basis. Compensation under such cases is dependent upon the services rendered and, as we take it, comes clearly within the classification of income described by the statute as being "not fixed or certain," but is "indefinite or irregular as to amount or time of accrual." For this reason we assume there will be no doubt that life insurance companies will not be required to withhold the tax upon such payments. However, a definite ruling to this effect is desirable.

When it comes to the matter of compensation paid to agents, we believe the answer must be the same, though the relation is not quite the same and the circumstances are more varied. There are comparatively few instances in which compensation to agents is on a straight out-and-out salaried basis. To the extent such cases exist they would, of course, come under the provisions requiring the tax to be withheld. But speaking generally, agents and managers of life insurance companies are compensated by commissions arising from the placing of new policies and by renewal commissions paid on policies previously written, during the period which such policies remain in force. In some instances a nominal salary or guarantee is paid in addition to commissions and collection fees. Nearly every general agent receives payments of commissions on policies turned in through his sub-agents, which payments represent in no sense his individual income but are, in fact, commissions which he in turn must pay over, largely if not entirely, to the sub-agents who wrote the business. The magnitude of these transactions and the injustice that would arise from withholding a tax upon the aggregate sums paid to general agents is illustrated by pointing to one agency which employs more than three hundred sub-agents and whose commission transactions with the home office amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars annually. It may be said as a general matter that the life insurance companies do not know and have no means of finding out with accuracy how much of the gross payments made by them to their general agents are in fact net income of such agents, as net income must be computed under the Income Tax law. In other words, a large proportion of these general agents are independent contractors so far as their home offices are concerned, and to require the companies with whom they have agency contracts to withhold the tax would do the agents a great injustice and burden the companies with an elaborate accounting all to no purpose.

A Problem.

From the very nature of the subject agents' commissions and percentages are not "fixed or determinable annual gains, profits, and income." They cannot be determined or computed in advance. It cannot be said how many new policies an agent will write in any given year. It cannot be foreseen how many old policies will be renewed or collected in any given year. At best the most that could be given would be an intelligent guess, and in no proper sense could the result thus attained be said to be "fixed or determinable." Indeed, when we consider the fact that the companies do not know how much of the commissions actually paid must go to sub-agents or how much of those commissions will go in office rent, carfare, clerk hire and the other innumerable business expenses of the agent, it is easily seen that such commissions or compensation is essentially the opposite of "fixed and determinable."

We, therefore, contend in this connection that the income of life insurance agents (except in those rare cases where they are compensated by salary only) is not fixed or determinable annual income, but is indefinite and irregular in amount and, therefore, does not come within the provision of paragraph E requiring the tax to be withheld at the source.

Ruling Suggested.

It, therefore, seems that for the guidance of life insurance companies the Department would be amply justified in ruling, and should rule, that the tax need not be withheld on payments representing (1) the proceeds of policies (2) matured endowments or (3) surrender values, on the ground that such payments are not part of any fixed or determinable annual income of the persons to whom the payments are made; that the tax need not be withheld on (4) annuities for life, (5) annuities for a term certain and (6) premium refunds or so-called "dividends," for the reason that persons receiving the same are not liable to pay a tax thereon as such payments are specifically exempt from the operation of the law by the first proviso in paragraph B; that no tax should be withheld on (7) payments of interest of less than $3,000.00 on the proceeds of policies left on deposit, as the obligation thus created is not "similar" to "bonds and mortgages or deeds of trust" as provided in paragraph E, and because it is apparent from the history of the bill in Congress which showed the successive changes in its phraseology that it was not the intention to have the tax withheld on such payments; and further that the tax should not be withheld from payments to brokers, professional men and agents for services where such payments are occasional only, or into which the commission of percentage elements enter, for the reason that such compensation is necessarily "not fixed or certain" but is distinctly "indefinite" and "irregular."

Respectfully submitted,

Signed)

STRAIGHT FROM THE SHOULDER.

Five Paragraphs of Electrical Inspiration Written for the Man Who Lacks the Quality of Earnestness.

By Robert J. Mix, Manager, Prudential Insurance Co., New York City.

I've watched some of the greatest golf players in the world and I never saw two of them who played the game just alike. There are certain fundamental rules of the game that everybody has to observe—as, for instance, "to keep your eye on the ball" and "to carry through"—but when it comes to the details as to just how a fellow should stand when he addresses the ball and just how he should swing at it—why, I say, I never saw two men who went through exactly the same emotions. Every expert player has his own way of getting the best results.

By the same token you may take hold of a life insurance agent, tell him of the experiences of a dozen or more successful canvassers and explain to him how they close their cases, but the chances are a hundred to one that he will not—probably cannot—get out into the field and duplicate the exact methods of any one of these successful agents. I don't mean to say that I wouldn't think it well to tell the agent how the big men in our calling have achieved success and the methods that they pursue in their daily practise, but I do mean that the real good that these stories are likely to do the agent is to awaken his enthusiasm and start up his own "think tank"—to set him at work harder than ever before along his own best lines of endeavor!

What you want, my friends, in order that you may get to be a bigger man in our business, is to develop your own initiative—your own originality—bring to bear upon the prospect those of your own powers which are most effective—to develop your best mode of attack—not the other fellow's!

I tell you, friend, it's a terribly discouraging thing to try to imitate anybody else in selling life insurance—it's almost a hopeless task! "There are a dozen ways to skin a cat," but there's just one way in which you can do it most effectively, and only one, and that's the method for you to pursue! You may listen to a dozen of the greatest orators in the land and every man of them will make a deep impression upon you, but no two of them will make the same impression in the same way! I'll venture to say that the man who will impress you most deeply will be the man who is most intensely in earnest, and this is where we get down to hard tacks!

A life insurance agent who is in dead earnest—whose heart and soul are bound up in his vocation—who isn't thinking about the commissions he's going to earn if he closes a certain application but about the need that the prospect has for the policy which the agent is trying to sell, and who is exercising his best judgment in the conscientious attempt to fit the policy to the applicant's needs—why, that man will unconsciously develop a system and a method which are infinitely better suited to him than could be the system or the method of any other agent whatsoever, no matter how successful! When all's said and done, there's nothing that creates so favorable an impression, or which is so effective, as earnestness! Have you ever heard a comparatively ignorant man—a man who was homely of feature and even poorly clad—make a speech that moved an audience to tears or laughter? Of course you have, and the reason for it was that the man was chock full of his subject and was desperately in earnest! Why can't you and I practise our own profession in a similar way, my fellow agent? My contention is that if we can't do that we ought to get into some other kind of business without delay!

The Physician and His Own Medicine.

Dickens' London pieman, in a moment of supreme confidence and ebullient boastfulness over a rival, with whom he had been arrested for offensive pugnacity, exclaimed to the sitting magistrate: "I'll eat one of my own pies, Your Worship, and that's something he daren't do."

Confidence in that for which you have contracted to dispose of is one of the essential, and perhaps the most important, principles of salesmanship. To no one in the business world should this appeal with greater force than to the Life Insurance salesman. He should not only be himself well insured, but he should be insured, all things considered, in the company he represents and by the policies to which he advises others to subscribe. His confidence in the strength of his company and the worth of its policies are his most tangible pieces of evidence to convince a prospect of his sincerity.

Those who attended the Atlantic City Convention will doubtless recall an incident which gives point to our contention. Hubert H. Ward called the attention of the delegates to the fact that he always advised his agents to insure their own lives before attempting to persuade prospects. Such suggestions are more valuable than they at first seem to be, and often by reason of their simplicity fail to make the impression which it was intended they should convey.

Little more than a year ago there died in New York City an insurance agent who, prior to the Armstrong Investigation, made yearly records which were wonders of the insurance world. When his estate was settled the peculiar fact developed that he carried but $500 on his own life, and that sum was the measure of the estate he left to his widow and any other dependents who might by reason of family relationship look to her for assistance.

Where did the fault lie? This man was known to be a phenomenal producer; his knowledge of the principles of Life Insurance was thorough; naturally he must have been imbued with an understanding of its obligations. He succeeded with everyone—but himself; he was instrumental in inducing other men to furnish protection to their families, but left his own family destitute.

There is a lesson to be learned from this and its epitome will be found in this: "To thine own self be true, and it must follow, as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man."

The agent to whom we have just referred made a conspicuous success in the field by selling to others that in which he had no confidence so far as his personal needs were concerned, but his truly marvelous record of productivity was made before the Armstrong Investigation. Such a record by the same methods could not be duplicated to-day. There are, of course, two great reasons for this statement. The Insurance Laws now say "You must not" to many phases of field operations, where but a few years ago they said nothing. The other reason is that with an enlightened public conscience it is a psychological impossibility for a man to attain permanent success unless it is built upon absolute truth and sincerity of purpose.

Horace Greeley said, "GO WEST, YOUNG MAN." We add, "TO THE PACIFIC WITH WARD." Good opportunities for young men.

We have always been taught that things equal to the same thing are equal to each other. All men who are physically eligible, whether rich or poor, bear the same relation to Life Insurance. This relationship does not contemplate the situation from the standpoint of the dollar, but from the standpoint of a principle, assuming that Life Insurance offers the only plan of positive and permanent protection to the families of the country. Therefore, if Life Insurance is good for you, it is equally good for me. Conversely, if Life Insurance is not good for me, it is not good for you.

The attempt to sell Life Insurance by a solicitor who carries no insurance upon his own life is the act of a coward, and he brands himself with the scarlet letter of the Twentieth Century—a symbol which stands for insincerity and hypocrisy. Such a man is a living lie. And it is the insincere solicitor who eventually joins the filthy herd of camp-followers, ready to pounce upon an unsuspecting victim and with the poisoned weapons of his craft accomplish his barbarous purpose.

Certainly the solicitor who recommends a company or a policy in which he has no faith is guilty of the most despicable form of deception, and deception is a habit of vigorous growth. It is the height of absurdity to imagine that one who is untruthful in trivialities, one who wilfully deceives or misleads in small things, will be truthful in matters of large import.

Ignorance Kills Sales.

Experience has demonstrated that more customers are lost through the apparent ignorance of the salesman through hesitancy in replying to questions concerning the goods, or through blundering replies, than for lack of interest in the proposition by the prospective customer. The agent should be required to thus qualify himself before starting out to solicit business, as his willingness and aptitude to learn the details of the business will usually determine his future success or failure.—American Relief Assurance.

OFFICIAL NOTICE

To Secretaries of Local Associations:

In order to render the publicity part of our National Association campaign during the next twelve months more effective and to enable the Education and Conservation Committee, also the Press Committee, to determine something as to the extent of the publicity which the National Association, as such, and our local associations throughout the country are able to secure from the daily press and magazines, will you kindly bring the question before your association at its next meeting and arrange for your local committee in Education and Conservation to systematically and continuously forward to Everett M. Ensign, corresponding secretary, 56 Pine street, New York City, clippings of any and all insurance items of publicity and news which may come to their attention, or to the attention of the officers of your association, growing out of your meetings or otherwise. By so doing it will also enable our national committees, and LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS, to use such articles from time to time as may be of interest to the entire membership.

I naturally assume your association has already appointed a live and effective committee on Education and Conservation. If not, please have such committee appointed. May I further ask that you forward to me by EARLY MAIL the names and addresses of your local committee, as this is very necessary in order to complete our entire plans.

Trusting that we may have the fullest co-operation of your association, and that your committee will be able to thoroughly interest the editors of your local press in the above important matter, I remain,

Yours very truly,

ERNEST J. CLARK,
President.

Suggestion vs. Assertion.

By mere chance we recently heard a life insurance solicitor begin his talk to a well-to-do business man prospect, and he went wrong in his very first utterance. He said:

"Mr. Blank, you should carry life insurance!"

Plainly it made about the same impression as though the solicitor had said:

"I am here to tell you what you should do and when you should do it."

Even the best natured of us don't like that sort of thing.

Suggesting, instead of asserting, a thing, is the safe and sure way of gaining receptive attention for whatever thought we wish to present.

None of us like to be told what we should do.

How much better if the solicitor in question had opened with something like this:

"Mr. Blank, may I for just a moment submit a matter that is of the greatest immediate importance to you?" then go right on with the talk.—International Lifeman.

What's in a Name?

Since the year 1596 English-speaking people have, in constantly increasing numbers, generally accepted the belief that any plant or flower of the genus Rosa which might be designated by another appellation would affect the olfactory nerves with the same degree of fragrance as that which existed before the misnomer. Shakespeare was to a very considerable degree discourtous, in that he said before us what we would have said had he not said it. But, at any rate, "What's in a name? That which we call a rose, by any other name would smell as sweet."

Is this true? Perhaps not, if one would follow a course of reasoning parallel to certain arguments which recently came to our attention. Indeed, one might call a rose a cabbage, and by reason of the transposition of the names the sweetness of the flower would not only be intensified, but it would suddenly possess all highly desirable qualities it did not have before. Hundreds of years ago the rose was a symbol of secrecy, and when hung up at entertainments was a token that nothing which transpired was to be divulged by those present. Therefore, one might say that this is a subject about which nothing should be said. One might say that, but hundreds would call it a reducio ad absurdum, and in this view we concur.

The reasons for our comment will be found in an able editorial which appeared in a recent number of an insurance journal which objects to the word "agent." "The Surveyor" says, "The word 'agent' as a descriptive term is one that should be discarded by the life insurance world." While it would be execrable professional taste to agree with the editorial expressions of any other publication, we must admit that the article in question contains much food for thought, consequently it is reproduced herewith:

The word "agent" as a descriptive term is one that should be discarded by the life insurance world. It does not comport with the modern conception of the real function of the life insurance advocate, and conceals the social significance and value of that function. This is not because the word "agent" lacks anything of honorable import, but rather because life insurance has risen immeasurably above the somewhat narrow and exclusively business atmosphere implied in the word as generally accepted in the public mind.

The realization of the higher and more universal character of the work of propagating the spread of real life insurance, furnishing the reason for discarding the word "agent," also furnishes the reason for the existence of "life unwerwriters' associations," composed of those who are in that work. The degree in which this fact is understood by the individual life insurance advocate in the field forms an index of his character and mental attitude toward the work in which he is engaged. Consequently it can be truly said that those who are earnest in the organization and maintenance of these associations evidently understand that the verities demand a larger repute for the life insurance advocate, a repute that will readily ensue when all, or most, of such advocates have attained to a deeper realization of the dignity of their work and a commensurate respect for it in their own minds. Some one anciently said that the world accepts men mostly at their own valuation.

One can imagine an agency superintendent asking a new man, "Do you want to be a life insurance agent or a life insurance advocate?" But this kind of a question should be impossible in life insurance. Can you imagine the State Regents asking a candidate for a physician's course, "Do you want to be a quack or a physician?" At banquets and other formal gatherings of men the professors of medicine are voluntarily given places of honor in recognition of the honorable character of their work. The real life insurance advocate is a social physician, an opponent of the diseases of poverty and ignorance that afflict the body politic. His honor should be at least as great as that of the physician, and will become so when he is sufficiently convinced of it himself, so as to convince all other men.

Therein is the deep necessity and purpose of associations of life insurance advocates. To the trivial man, or the man who looks upon life insurance merely as a business, this does not appear. The difficulty is that there are so many men in life insurance who will not be convinced of the dignity of their work. The hoped-for professionalism does not appeal to such; when asked to join a local association they ask, "What benefit will it be to me?" Their little "me" looms large in their own minds, and they think they cannot bother with ideals or with the general benefit.

The practice of medicine arose from being merely a business of charlatanism and quackery, when those in it who realized what it should be insisted upon the dignity of its human benefit and the necessity of hedging it with the requirement of special knowledge and qualification.

The men who belong to the associations are those who personify the insistent thought that the human benefit in the advocacy of life insurance will ultimately cause it to become recognized as a profession, and who are trying to arouse all their fellows to an essential appreciation of the dignity of the work. They are the pioneers clearing the ground for a better future. It is worth while to belong to such a company of courageous spirits. It also may be said that, somehow, or other, prosperity always attaches itself to earnestness.

A Thriftless Nation? Yes! No!

If there were such an invention as an economic seismograph which would register the various fluctuations of economy and extravagance of the people of America; if science had devised a gigantic stethoscope with power to convey to our ears, and to analyze, the dismal wail of poverty and the hysterical shrieks of the millionaire joy-rider; THRIFT might then be reduced to a calculable basis, and we might be in a position to accurately determine whether or not as a nation we were guilty of the charge of the lack of it.

The Pittsburgh Dispatch says that American life insurance is the answer of the American people to the charge of lack of thrift. It is seldom that a daily newspaper attempts to prove an assertion and by the nature and character of its arguments advanced in support of its contention, casts a boomerang at its readers, which returns and demolishes the structure of which it was originally a part. Doubtless the Pittsburgh Dispatch published the article to which we have reference with the altruistic purpose of calling the attention of the public to what life insurance had accomplished and what that institution is prepared to accomplish so far as the saving of dollars is concerned. In that respect it did life insurance and the public a good service. The Dispatch said, in part:

"John W. Gates' yellow dog was so accustomed to being kicked that he walked sideways. There is some danger of Americans walking sideways on the charge of lack of thrift.

"Are we such a thriftless nation? We are spending more than we ought to in government, particularly in Nation, State and city. Undoubtedly, too, there are too many people who wish to enjoy a $5,000 a year expenditure on a $2,500 a year income, and to sport an automobile on a street car salary. But no less certainly there are offsets. What about the ten million individuals who have more than four and a half billion dollars in the savings banks of America—a billion more than any other nation in the world? And above all, what about the twenty-five million life insurance policyholders depositing some two million dollars every business day of the year—a savings for their own old age or for their families after they are gone—to the extent of some $35,000,000,000?"

"When some other country points the finger of criticism at Uncle Sam, let us remember that American husbands and fathers are showing a sacrificing love for their families greater in extent than the people of Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Italy, Spain, the rest of Europe, Asia, Australia, Africa and South America all put together. After all, what safer, more conservative method of saving could be devised? What financial program could the individual follow to the better advantage of his family and the community? American life insurance is the answer of the American people to the charge of lack of thrift."

In the absence of a better medium of comparison, thrift may be roughly calculated as the difference between individual income and individual expenditure; the difference between necessities and luxuries; the difference between economy and extravagance.

Now how as a nation do we stand? While it is true, as the Dispatch says, we have on deposit in savings banks $1,000,000,000 more than any other nation in the world, how does this figure out individually in comparison to the people of other nations? A writer in The Investors' Magazine claims that only 99 out of every 1,000 of the people of this country have deposits in savings banks, while in other countries the proportion per 1,000 inhabitants is as follows: Switzerland, 544; France, 346; Germany, 317; England, 317; Japan, 270; Italy, 220.

The Dispatch calls attention to the twenty-five million life insurance policyholders, which represents a total of $35,000,000,000.

BUT the Dispatch makes no mention of the fact that we spend yearly for tobacco as much as we spend for insurance premiums; half the amount of our premiums for candy, and two and one-half the amount of premiums for alcoholic liquors.

No, the Dispatch says nary a word.

Did you ever stop to think that the men, women and children of America are protected against all future contingencies to the miserable extent of only $200 per capita?

It's true, and we believe we richly deserve the charge which The Pittsburgh Dispatch attempted to refute.

A Bridegroom's Policy.

Elbert Hubbard has a solution to the problem of the eugenic marriage. He believes, or says he believes, that every man, before the marriage ceremony is performed, should present to the prospective bride an insurance policy on his life. The Fra works in the eugenic idea in this manner: "A life insurance policy implies the health of the individual, and all medical examiners will understand and appreciate the importance as well as the import of 'A Bridegroom's Policy.' If a woman gives her life into the keeping of a man, why should not the man in return give her at least a policy on his life?"

Mr. Hubbard's suggestion reminds us that this is quite a common practise among the Italians in New York's East Side. Father Curry, of St. James Parish, was recently interviewed by a reporter from the New York Sun and the subject of marriage came up.

"You have been in the marriage business a long time—that is, not only wedding but bringing about weddings," the reporter suggested.

"Oh, yes," the priest remarked with a cheerful twinkle. "It is an old story with us. Of course we encourage fitting marriages as much as we can. I favor healthy marriages only, to be sure. Health certificates would be an excellent thing.

"I have noticed that the Italians among us have a tactful way of managing that. The Italian father and mother ask the young man who seeks their daughter if he is insured.

"If he is not they urge him to take out insurance before the wedding and sometimes they insist upon it. They put the argument for it on the usual grounds, the risk of his dying suddenly and leaving his family penniless. But what they are often most concerned about is insurance as to the suitor's good health. They feel satisfied that if he can get insurance there is nothing serious the matter with him.

"Now that seems to me a happy way of dealing with a delicate problem to the satisfaction of all hands and the embarrassment of none."

Society to Teach American People Thrift.

The American Society for Thrift has begun a national campaign from its headquarters in Chicago. S. W. Straus, a banker of New York and Chicago, is chairman of the organization committee. The plans of the society, as announced a few days ago, have been well worked out in advance, and will include courses on thrift in public schools, colleges and universities, together with discussions of the subject by commercial organizations from its economic standpoint and the preaching of thrift in the churches from its moral aspect.

We have before us the names of the members of the organization committee, and, strange as it may seem, in view of the plans and purposes of the organization, we fail to see the name of a single man prominently or even remotely identified with life insurance; that is to say, legal reserve life insurance. On the other hand, we do find assessment insurance represented by Charles E. Piper, one of the leading spirits of the National Fraternal Congress of America. Legal reserve life insurance has evidently lost a trick at the very beginning of this project. One would imagine, however, from the bulletin recently issued by Mr. Straus, that legal reserve life insurance will have an opportunity to present its arguments in this organization if it desires an opportunity to do so. In support of this we herewith quote a paragraph from the bulletin just referred to:

"It is the plan to make the personnel of the Board of Advisory Council of the society nationally representative. All industries, trades, charities and philanthropies will be represented. All representative bodies will be asked to co-operate to discuss thrift."

What the Local Associations Are Doing

Life Association News has no paid correspondents. We depend entirely upon the secretaries of local associations to send us stories of all meetings of their respective associations. If an account of the last meeting of your association does not appear in this department, ask the secretary of your organization why he did not send us the particulars.

Immediately after each meeting, on the same day if possible, secretaries of local bodies should send us a full account of the business transacted, including copies of all speeches, or extracts from the most important of them.

Baltimore.

The regular monthly meeting of the Baltimore association was held in the board room of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of Baltimore, at 12:15 p. m. on Tuesday, Oct. 28. There was an unusually large attendance, and a most interesting program, consisting of reports of the delegates to the Atlantic City convention and a discussion under the head of 'New Business' of the educational work as proposed by the National Association and applicable to the educational institutions of Baltimore. The local committee on education and conservation presented a letter from the Baltimore Young Men's Association requesting the Baltimore Life Underwriters' Association to introduce a full course of lectures in life insurance in connection with their educational department. In the course of the discussion President Clark, of the National Association, not only urged the committees to comply with the request of the Young Men's Christian Association, but also to at once introduce, if possible, a similar course of lectures in the Baltimore City College, also Baltimore Polytechnic Institute, both of which institutions have large student bodies. Mr. Clark's recommendations were immediately endorsed by a motion which received the unanimous support of the association.

The question of local publicity through the columns of the daily press of news items and educational articles was also discussed at considerable length. It is the desire of the Baltimore association to ultimately make Baltimore a life insurance educational center, and their local committee will undoubtedly work to this end.

Boston.

What was evidently one of the most enthusiastic meetings of the Boston association, was held on the evening of Oct. 28, in the Salla Italiana of the Cafe Bova. This was the annual fall business meeting and election of officers. Preceding this, however, a business meeting of the association was held at the Home Office of the Columbian National at 5:30 P. M. The reports of the various officers showed the association to be in splendid financial condition. The following officers were elected: President, Clarence C. Miller, National Life; vice-presidents, Vernon B. Swett, Provident Life & Trust, and Franklin W. Ganse, Columbian National; secretary, Leon F. Foss, Berkshire; treasurer, Edward March, John Hancock. Executive committee—Elmer E. Silver, chairman, Union Central; A. S. Browne, New York; Ashton F. Carter, Northwestern Mutual; F. A. B. Stanton, Massachusetts Mutual; Richard O. Walter, Equitable.

Retiring President Silver expressed his thanks to the members for co-operation during the year and President Miller, who was escorted to the chair by Messrs. Gammons and Stratton, voiced his appreciation of the honor.

Mention was made by F. C. Sanborn of the retirement of Francis Marsh as treasurer of the association, after serving in that capacity thirty years. It was the consensus of opinion that Mr. Marsh should receive some testimonial from the association evidencing its appreciation, and the matter was referred to the new Executive Committee. Several new members were admitted.

The banquet was served in Italian style and accompanied with Italian songs and chorus singing by the entire membership. Retiring President Silver acted as toastmaster and reviewed the work of the year, paying considerable attention to the substantial gain in membership. President-elect Miller spoke on the possibilities of the association movement in the future.

F. Spencer Baldwin, Dean of the College of Business Administration at Boston University, was one of the formal speakers and had as his subject, "The Present Trend Toward State Insurance." In closing, he said:

"I can conceive of only one thing which in the face of the objections to State enterprise in this field might bring about a general movement toward State insurance. That is some 'bad acting' on the part of the insurance companies in the way of an exhibition of indifference to their obligations and responsibilities and disregard of the interests and demands of the public. It would be unfortunate if the behavior of the companies should be such as to furnish encouragement or justification for experiments with State insurance. I believe that we should go very slow in this country in the direction of State socialism. In my opinion, the remedy for the abuses that have developed in connection with American industrial enterprises is to be found through measures of legislative regulation rather than governmental administration leading toward socialism. The aim should be to eliminate these abuses, while retaining the fundamental principles on which our 'industrial system now rests—principles vital to social order and progress—namely, private property and enterprise, individual initiative and independence, personal freedom and responsibilities.'"

Ten minute addresses were made by four of the delegates to the Atlantic City convention. Vernon B. Swett had as his subject, "What the National Association Means to the Industrial Solicitor," while Ashton F. Carter discussed "Life Income Contracts." J. Everett Hicks spoke upon "Three Essentials of Successful Life Insurance Salesmanship," and Franklin Ganse gave some interesting facts on "Efficiency Methods."

Buffalo.

Charles Warren Pickell, of Detroit, manager of the Massachusetts Mutual in that city, entertained the members of the Buffalo association with a breezy talk on "Efficiency" at their October meeting and luncheon at the Hotel Iroquois.

Mr. Pickell, a forceful and interesting talker, complimented the Buffalo underwriters on their live association. He said that never since the beginning of the association idea back in 1896 had he seen a time when it was more widespread and active than at present, and he predicted great things for the business. He recalled the days when rebating, misrepresentation and other evils marked the work of competing insurance men.

"There are three great factors in efficiency," he said. "First of all it is supremely important to figure out how to eliminate waste. The three factors in which this must be developed are time, labor and skill. And the man who will make good as an insurance man is he who combines the three elements of personality—intelligence, will and sensibilities, the man with the heart for his fellow men."

Mr. Pickell said that friendship enters more into the insurance business than into any other, and told some interesting anecdotes along that line. He closed with an earnest plea for brotherhood of the right kind.

On motion of Comptroller William G. Justice, the insurance men voted thanks to Mr. Pickell, and Frank W. Tracy, president of the association, spoke briefly in the name of the organization. Charles W. Fielder, who was a delegate to the Underwriters' National Convention at Atlantic City, gave a report on the convention.

Capital District.

The Capital District association started off this season by holding its October meeting at Albany on the 20th of that month. The principal speakers were C. R. Tripp, who presented a résumé of efficiency methods as discussed at the Atlantic City convention; R. W. Goslin took for his subject "Local Associations," which subject was one of the five minute topics at Atlantic City. Secretary William B. Phelps was another speaker and his subject was "Kernels from the National Convention."

One of the most interesting features of the meeting was a demonstration sale by H. H. Bennit, Mutual Life, for $25,000 Ordinary Life plan to Jacob Herzog, assistant cashier of the National Commercial Bank of Albany, and the demonstration sale of a policy with income at age of 65, by C. C. De Rouville, Penn Mutual, with Harry Appleton, Deputy Superintendent of Insurance of the State of New York, as the prospect. President Henry H. Kohn was the last speaker and he made brief but striking references to the Atlantic City convention.

Chicago.

Twenty-nine members were admitted to the Chicago association at its October meeting and an aggressive campaign is being made to secure one hundred more members prior to the next meeting. The meeting was held at the City Club on the evening of Oct. 23.

There was a committee appointed at the April meeting to prepare amendments to the Constitution and By-Laws and this committee made its report recommending certain amendments which recommendations were adopted. Under these amendments the Executive Committee pass upon new members instead of electing them individually by means of a ballot box. The latter plan worked satisfactorily years ago when it was an unusual occurrence to have more than five of six names voted on at one time, but in view of the large number of members now being taken in at the various meetings, it was deemed inexpedient.

An ovation was given Hervey S. Dale when the announcement was made of his election as treasurer of the National Association.

Jules Girardin discussed the Atlantic City convention, giving particular attention to the plans of the Committee on Education and Conservation, of which committee he is a member. Mr. Girardin was optimistic in his views as to the success of the project and in the course of his remarks said that the company which he represented was prepared to refuse a license to an agent who had not become a member of a local association.

P. J. Krause also spoke on the annual convention and urged aggressive plans for increasing the membership to one thousand.

Rufus N. Potts recently elected Superintendent of Insurance of the State of Illinois, was the principal speaker and his address was largely devoted to the necessity of teaching life insurance in the public schools. Mr. Potts was unalterably opposed to State insurance and gave strenuous reasons in support of his views.

F. W. Potter, the former State Superintendent of Insurance, was the next speaker and reviewed the improvements which had been made in field practices during the last few years.

President Isaac Miller Hamilton, of the Federal Life, represented the American Life Convention in the absence of Secretary Henry Abels, of the Franklin Life, who is president of the American Life Convention.

Darby A. Day, Chicago manager of the Mutual Life of N. Y., was the last speaker on the program and urged a greater degree of good fellowship and a more sincere belief in the principles of the association movement.

Cincinnati.

Members of the Cincinnati association and guests to the number of fifty recently heard Henry Moir, actuary of the Home Life of New York, on "What Is the Source of Success?" The address was delivered at dinner at the Business Men's Club, on Oct. 28, and was considerable of a revelation of the psychology of salesmanship and especially of the salesmanship of life insurance.

Mr. Moir was in the city to give a lecture at McMicken Hall, University of Cincinnati, in the course of study of the principles of life insurance worked up by W. A. R. Bruehl, Jr., of W. A. R. Bruehl & Son.

Mr. Moir laid down the principles of success in the business which will apply also to all business and success in other pursuit and in all walks of life. The principles of the one are complimentary to the principles of the other. The underlying principles of success in general were stated to be personal magnetism, confidence, persistence and stubbornness and honesty.

Under the head of magnetism Mr. Moir gave some credence to the Christian Science teaching of "malevolent or malicious magnetism," and said that there might be some scientific basis for such a permeation of bad thinking and malicious spirit. The matter of magnetism was likened to the operation of electricity in wireless telegraphy and influenced kindred spirits wherever they might be reached by the personality. In no other way, the speaker believed, could the success of great salesmen and great promoters be explained.

Confidence of the salesman in his goods, confidence of the prospective buyers in the salesman, confidence in the company behind him, confidence in the value of the product, and general confidence, he maintained, was the great factor in salesmanship which could be created at will in many ways.

The greater the amount of confidence that can be created in the mind of the salesman and reflected from his mind to the mind of the prospective buyer, the greater the chances for selling the goods. Confidence was described as the cornerstone of all business and the engine by which business is carried on. It is necessary first to gain the confidence of the buyer, in fact, in order to get a hearing on the merits of the goods. Without confidence personal magnetism would be powerful only when subject and operator would be in contact.

As an aid to the above mentioned factors the speaker gave persistence a high place. He called it "stubbornness" and could have called it "positiveness," "determination" and "indomitable will" as well. He said that persistence as often won the day as any other factor in the game. As a closing and clinching factor he gave strictest honesty, to the point of fastidiousness, as a keystone to the entire salesmanship quality. So honest should the salesman be that he should not even allow his prospective buyer to deceive himself, but he should be given light on every point. This was dwelt on with great force.

Mr. Moir illustrated his points with many anecdotes and stories which kept the crowd in a good humor the entire session.

At the close of the address the underwriters held a business session. W. J. Williams, president of the Western Southern Life Insurance Company, was elected to honorary membership. E. P. Marshall, vice-president of the Union

Central Life Insurance Company, was a visitor to the meeting. Provision was discussed and will be made for the admission of members outside of Cincinnati, within a radius of 100 miles, in Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky and West Virginia.

W. A. R. Bruehl, Cincinnati agent of the Home Life Insurance Company, entertained Mr. Moir while in the city.

Mr. Moir spoke at the university the previous night to the students, explaining the history and theory of insurance.

Cleveland.

The last regular meeting of the Cleveland association was held on the evening of Oct. 29 at the Cleveland Athletic Club, with a fair attendance. Considerable time was given for a discussion of the Atlantic City convention and a report of the advertising committee was presented with regard to establishing a department on life insurance in the Cleveland Plain Dealer and in the Cleveland Leader. J. J. Jackson spoke on "Institutional Advertising." Winslow Russell, agency manager of the Phoenix Mutual, will be the principal speaker at the next meeting, which will be held at the Statler Hotel, on the evening of the 28th inst.

Columbus.

The October meeting of the Columbus association was held at the Hotel Chittenden. Reports of the Atlantic City convention were the principal features of the meeting. Among those who spoke were President B. L. Lewis, B. P. Clement, Joseph I. Behling, Fritz Lichtenberg and H. H. Steiner. Two new members were admitted and the association will attempt to work out some practical plan to minimize the switching of business.

Connecticut.

The Connecticut association held its November meeting at New London on the 7th inst. Four new members were admitted and the principal speaker was F. A. Griswold, whose topic was "Income Insurance." A general discussion of this particular plan of insurance followed.

Delaware.

The Delaware association on the evening of Oct. 29 gave a reception at Hanna's Cafe in Wilmington in honor of National President Ernest J. Clark. Mr. Clark was introduced by City Treasurer James F. Price, president of the Delaware association, who presided. "Arrangements have been made," said Mr. Clark, "to prepare a text book on life insurance for use in the schools and colleges. In the meantime the National Association will introduce courses of lectures on life insurance in colleges and high schools. There are now 43 colleges which have these courses. In Baltimore, Md., recently plans were made for lecture courses in three educational institutions, while the Y. M. C. A. has asked for a course. He asked the Delaware association to appoint a committee on education and publicity. The committee to confer with Delaware College, and, if possible, persuade the faculty to introduce a course of lectures there, to educate the public as to the meaning of life insurance. Up to the present time there has been no concerted action in that direction, because the association did not have the machinery, but now it has the machinery and proposes using it with a vengeance.

Conservation was next discussed. Mr. Clark spoke of the elimination of everything which pertains to the tearing down of the business. He said many lapses could be prevented with an aggressive effort to take care of it. Conservation depends upon educational work. He said the insurance agents can also do a great deal toward the conservation of human life. He said the average age 400 years ago was 18 years. Now the average is 40 years.

Taxation, he claimed, is one of the most important features of the business. In 1860 the tax amounted to 70 cents per $100; now it is $2. In Germany there is compulsory insurance, the government contributing $12,000,000 a year, while here the government takes the $12,000,000. In England the government exempts from taxation insurance up to one-sixth of a man's income. He thought there should be work done in the Congress; with the individual members. The elimination of this tax would mean 8 per cent. to the policyholders. He said the last Congress saved the policyholders $700,000 a year, due to the efforts of the National Association.

He also spoke of the Delaware association, referring to the constitutional amendment admitting non-residents to membership; he urged Delaware to take advantage of the opportunity. This membership carries with it the LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS. He advocated the formation of a "Cincinnati" club, or, rather, a convention club, which will result in a large representation at the Cincinnati convention next year. He said no man in the business could well afford not to attend.

President Price said that in Delaware last year insurance interests in that State paid a tax to the State of $40,090.20, while it cost the State to look after this business $4,012, leaving a difference of $35,978.08.

City Solicitor Hastings said he had known many life insurance agents and had formed his own opinions of those men; some of those opinions were good and some were not good. He recalled the first time life insurance was taken up with him. He got a bad impression from a misrepresentation made to him, which he afterward found to be untrue. Though it may have been due to ignorance it demonstrated the necessity for being truthful. Mr. Hastings said he first took insurance at the age of 24 and since then he has taken more. He said he was in a number of insurance companies, but he had never dropped one that he had gone into.

Frank Sheppard reviewed the life insurance methods in his experience, which began in 1884. William W. Knox made a brief speech, in which he spoke against the taxation of life insurance.

Detroit.

The November meeting of the Detroit association was held on the 1st inst. at the Elliott-Taylor-Woolfenden Cafe. There was a short business session, after which William B. Marshutz, supervisor of the Michigan Mutual Life, traced the growth of life insurance ethics as related to the field. Mr. Marshutz spoke on the early days of life insurance when there was only one good company in the opinion of a soliciting agent. He referred to the fact that in the days gone by there were practically few laws governing the conduct of the business, and as a result twisting, rebating and other reprehensible practices prevailed. He then outlined the gradual growth of the cleaner methods and paid high tribute to the field solicitor of to-day.

Dr. Andrew B. Biddle, a leading authority on blood and skin affections, delivered an interesting address in which he pointed out clearly the important bearing certain diseases have upon the character of the risk.

C. H. Williamson, Michigan manager of the ordinary department of the Prudential, was elected a member and ten applications for new members were received.

Erie.

As a result of the meeting on the evening of Oct. 20 at the Reed House of the Erie association, the various companies in that city feel drawn more closely in unison. The session was a success from every standpoint. Twenty members attended and the underwriters' work was discussed from start to finish.

The meeting was a regular monthly affair, but being at this time of the year was in the nature of an autumnal reunion. Judge Walling was the principal speaker. He urged closer co-operation. If the many axioms he placed before the association are followed, they will tend to improve the business of life underwriting and will raise it to higher planes.

Addresses also were made by Judge Benson and the Rev. Thomas P. Byrnes, honorary members of the association. Their talks were along the same lines as was that of Judge Walling.

William H. Riley, president of the association, was chairman of the meeting. In a preliminary talk he spoke of the bonds which bind life underwriting in this city and surrounding counties, which have been strongly cemented recently.

"The various company representatives feel drawn together very much closer and the Erie association will be in a position in succeeding months to carry out the high purpose of the association," he said.

"This purpose," continued Mr. Riley, "is to elevate life underwriting to a higher plane and to make it of true service to the policyholder, assuring him that no misrepresentations will be tolerated and also that he can be assured of the best possible service."

One of the interesting reports of the meeting was that of James M. Dickey, who told of the Atlantic City convention.

Fort Dodge.

The Fort Dodge association met in the regular October meeting in the office of the president, Burton H. Saxton. This meeting was very well attended, though some of the members who had planned to be present, were compelled to be out of the city at the time of the meeting.

The principal feature of the meeting was a paper read by A. E. Wilder, of the Equitable of New York, on the subject, "The Present and Future Status of the Part-time Agent." Mr. Wilder said in part: "The part-time man is no doubt going to furnish one of the big problems of life insurance organization in the future. This subject has most significant bearing on the future status of the full-time man, the interests of the policyholders and of the company itself. The general tendency of the age is specialization in every line. The professional lines have been drawn very fine. The higher the standing of the profession or business (and I personally believe that life insurance deserves to be called a profession), the higher type of the specialist is demanded. There is no business that requires a greater knowledge and a fuller understanding of fundamentals than the business of life underwriting which so vitally effects the individual and the future of his loved ones."

Mr. Wilder stated that there is some question of it being safe to trust the part-time man with the responsibility of advising in so serious a matter as the selection of a life insurance contract. He also claimed that there would naturally be a tendency on the part of a young man who is casting about for the selection of a profession or life-time vocation, to avoid the choosing of a business when he realized that at the same time a license might be obtained by any man, permitting him to follow the same line of work as a side issue and for the sole purpose of making a few extra dollars occasionally. The special question is asked, "Does not the many mistakes and misrepresentations and misunderstandings made through the unintelligence and unreliable part-time man have a tendency to lower the plan of the business?"

From the standpoint of the policyholder, Mr. Wilder called attention to the fact that there is as great a necessity on the part of the policyholder for his exercising of care in the selection of the man on whose advice he relies in the matter of placing his life insurance as there is on the part of the patient in the selection of a physician.

Grand Rapids.

With twenty-three of its members present, the Grand Rapids association held a meeting on the 1st inst. in the Association of Commerce Rooms. H. D. Jewell, former Judge of the Probate Court of Grand Rapids, was the first speaker, and his talk was listened to with close attention. C. H. De Young, of the Prudential Home Office, spoke on "Organization." The association resolved to hold regular monthly meetings the first Saturday of each month. The new officers of the association are as follows: President, S. M. Wright, Equitable Life of Iowa; vice-presidents, A. H. Bennett, Providence Life and Trust, and P. A. Geldhoff, Canada Life; secretary-treasurer, R. E. Billings.

Indiana.

National Vice-president Edward A. Woods, of Pittsburgh, was the principal speaker at the October meeting of the Indiana association, which was held on the 31st of that month. Mr. Woods discussed "Taxation," and set forth in a convincing and concrete manner the reasons why agents and policyholders should become thoroughly informed on this important subject. He showed the injustice of such a tax, in that it taxed the prudent for their prudence and the conservative for their conservatism and took from them a tax to pay for the ill-spent life of the profligate to inter his remains, support his widow and feed his orphans. On motion of Dr. E. E. Flickinger, Mr. Woods was given a rising vote of thanks. Four new members were admitted.

Iowa.

According to Glover S. Hastings, superintendent of agencies of the New England Mutual, life insurance agents of the future will be more or less handicapped in their profession unless they are college graduates with a solid and scientific education of the principles of life insurance. Mr. Hastings so expressed himself at the November meeting of the Iowa association, which was held on the 8th inst. at the Grant Club in Des Moines.

John C. Clapp, manager of the Prudential, presided as toastmaster. In the course of his remarks Mr. Hastings stated, in part, as follows:

"One of the greatest things to be desired is the opportunity and capacity to do well something of vital significance and value to mankind. We have that opportunity. It is the man behind the rate book and application blank that is responsible for the stupendous growth of the life insurance business. In the last five years the assets of the American life insurance companies have increased $1,500,000,000. The assets of the savings banks of the country have increased $725,000,000 in the same time. It shows that life insurance has become the favorite method of saving.

"No field presents greater opportunities for success. Nowhere are there larger fields for progress. But success in our business means preparation. Efficiency is the result of knowledge. The future underwriter will have a college degree and will be trained in the university and the college. A man may have the personality and the magnetism to sell gold bricks, but it takes a well-informed and quick-witted man to be a success as an underwriter. Knowledge is power.

"Imagination rules the world. It is the man who has the imagination to illustrate his point and fit the situation that interests his prospect. One of the unfortunate things of our business is the terms we have come to use. A policy should be termed a contract. Policy suggests a gamble. Arouse the curiosity of your prospects. In the north they hang a lantern on a pole to arouse the curiosity of the deer. The human animal is as curious as the four-footed one. Arouse your subject's curiosity and you can interest him in a policy."

Kansas.

George Godfrey Moore and H. H. Hall reported upon the Atlantic City convention at the October meeting of the Kansas association. This association is still making an active canvass in order to increase its membership. Among other plans discussed were a proposed system of publicity to be carried on through a local news bureau, by means of which news and educational matter will be sent to daily and weekly papers in the State. It is claimed that the Kansas City Fire Prevention Association met with more or less success in working out a similar scheme and the Kansas association will probably give this plan a trial.

Kansas City.

The Kansas City association held its October meeting at Morledge's Fish House, with forty members in attendance. There was a discussion as to the Missouri brokerage law. It was announced that Joseph Goldman, representing the Missouri Insurance Department, reported to Secretary Somerville that many Kansas City life, fire and casualty agents had failed to comply with the law by taking out brokerage licenses. While several hundred agents in St. Louis have complied with this law, few of the Kansas City agents have done so. A discussion of the situation resulted in a decision to take no action, largely because of an unsatisfactory interpretation of the law.

Several new members were admitted and it was decided to plan a number of large meetings during the winter season. Edward A. Woods, Darby A. Day and Warren M. Horner will be invited to address the association at different times.

Knoxville.

In the private dining rooms of the Cumberland Club in Knoxville on Oct. 25, the Knoxville association held its regular monthly meeting. Delegates to the Atlantic City convention reported individually upon the features of the convention which impressed them most, and the life income policy was the subject of considerable discussion.

A resolution was adopted discouraging all forms of field irregularities and calling attention to the laws on the subject. An agreement was made by all agents present to furnish the president of the local body with a complete list of all agents employed by them to aid in any manner whatsoever in securing new business. This was done in order that such agents, some of which are unknown, might not obtain any undue advantage by seeing or hearing a regular agent working with a prospect; also to prevent the employment of agents not regularly licensed by some company or holding proper certificate from the State authorities.

A committee was appointed to devise ways and means for introducing a course of popular lectures on life insurance in the university and public schools.

President J. E. Lutz fired the opening gun for a large attendance at next year's convention in Cincinnati. An effort will be made to enroll every life insurance agent in Knoxville on the membership register.

Lima.

With the largest attendance since its organization, less than two years ago, the Lima association held, on Oct. 14, at the Lima Club its first meeting of the winter season. Thirty members sat down to luncheon.

I. F. Hoffman, Columbus, vice-president of the Ohio State Life Insurance Company, was the principal speaker. He talked upon life insurance from the standpoint of the company. Rill T. Baker, Dayton, general agent of the Union Central, discussed the effect of new legislation. A. D. Hildreth, superintendent of the Lima district for the Prudential, spoke upon the advantages of membership in the Lima association, which covers both Lima and the district for 50 miles around.

Los Angeles.

The October meeting of the Los Angeles association was held at the Sierra Madre Club, and the principal feature was an address made by Martin Kallman, an efficiency expert. National Vice-President John N. Russell, Jr., gave a résumé of the Atlantic City convention and announced that William L. Hathaway, of San Francisco; Hubert H. Ward, of Portland; W. D. Mead, of Seattle, and himself had arranged to offer a loving cup to be competed for by the Pacific Coast associations for an increase of membership.

On Oct. 17 George T. Wilson, vice-president of the Equitable of New York, and Gerald R. Brown, controller of that company, were the guests of the association. President Frank E. McMullen acted as toastmaster.

Mr. Wilson is considered to be one of the brightest after-dinner speakers in the country, and he was in particularly good form on this occasion.

"I have been asked if I am glad to be back in California," said Mr. Wilson. "My answer is 'Do ducks like to swim and do corks like to pop?' And then Mr. Wilson delayed his remarks long enough to repeat the chorus of 'I Love You, California,' and the insurance agents and their wives followed by singing the song for the third time during the evening.

"California," said Mr. Wilson, "is not only blessed by nature but she is shoved along by man. Take that last line in the song, for instance, 'I love your rugged shores.' I like that sentiment, and I practice it whenever possible.

"But speaking seriously of the work in which you insurance men are engaged, I want to say the results of your efforts have more to do with the happiness of the world than many realize. But for the life insurance policies, thousands tonight would be hungry, half clothed and uneducated. This not only means comfort and enlightenment to those living today, but that influence for good will be passed on to generations still unborn. There is satisfaction in taking up a line of work where every time you land a customer you know absolutely that you are doing him a friendly turn in addition to making a commission. In many lines of business your ability to talk a man into signing a paper may or may not be for his best interests, but in life insurance you always know that the insured will be benefited."

Roger M. Andrews, president of the Rotary Club, and the Rev. Charles Edward Locke also made addresses.

Louisiana.

With a large attendance the Louisiana association held its October meeting on the 28th of the month at Kolb's German Tavern in New Orleans. President Frank L. Levy presided. Wilson Williams, chairman of the Executive Committee, reported upon the work of that committee. The matters of special interest during the year were the action on the proposed income tax on dividends in the tariff under consideration by Congress, Dr. Dowling's plan to secure vital statistics in the State, and the attempt to stimulate interest in the prize essay contest for the cup offered by President Levy.

Secretary-Treasurer T. D. Wharton stated that although there had been a number of resignations, the association had made a gain of two members over the preceding year, now having a membership of thirty-eight active and one honorary member. The financial standing of the association was good.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Crawford H. Ellis; vice-president, Wilson Williams; secretary-treasurer, T. D. Wharton, and the following new members were elected to the executive committee: Edward S. Maunsell, W. E. Millsaps, T. P. Thompson and James W. Smither.

Messrs. Williams, Simmons and Wharton gave brief reports of the Atlantic City convention. Mr. Smither urged a concerted effort to increase the membership and suggested that a committee of five be appointed to secure new members. Dr. E. J. Simmons agreed with Mr. Smither and suggested that the association should begin to make an effort to secure the 1916 convention of the National Association for New Orleans. The following committee on membership was then appointed: James W. Smither, chairman; E. G. Simmons, Robert G. Crump, T. P. Thompson and W. J. Hannon. On motion of Edward S. Maunsell a vote of thanks was tendered to retiring President Frank L. Levy for his conscientious and faithful services in behalf of the association.

Louisville.

Prominent members of the Louisville association will cooperate with the Y. M. C. A. of that city in arranging for a course of lectures during the winter on the subject of life insurance. W. W. Dennis and Kilbourne Dennis, both representing the Mutual Benefit, will deliver addresses on "Contract forms, etc.," and Clinton Davis, of the same agency, will discuss "Salesmanship." Former National President Henry J. Powell will also assist by delivering a lecture.

Central Massachusetts.

The Life Underwriters of Central Massachusetts held an enthusiastic meeting on the evening of Oct. 28 at the Tatnuck Country Club, and several new members were added to the membership list.

Henry E. Townsend, Worcester manager for the Massachusetts Mutual, gave a talk on income insurance, summarizing the addresses at the Atlantic City convention. He gave examples of how money left in bulk sum to beneficiaries frequently got away from the beneficiaries and failed to accomplish the object for which men had made sacrifices in their premium payments. If this was true of life insurance it took away from its value and made it a little better than the leaving of an estate in railroad stocks and other so-called "gilt-edged" securities that failed to pan out or pay the income for which they were purchased. All this uncertainty could be done away with by the taking of proper income insurance, and that was the new mission of life insurance men to call to the attention of the insuring public the possibility and the wisdom of providing for their wives and children a yearly maintenance fund that could be counted upon to be paid to them as surely as the years come round.

Eli Bouchard, special agent for the Equitable Life, gave inspiring illustrations of successful salesmanship on his part, which were well received.

Henry A. Macgowan, general agent of the Mutual Benefit, by special request, delivered an address describing in detail an agency management and field efficiency scheme, which his office had been using with marked success. Mr. Macgowan calls his field scheme "The Life Insurance Solicitors' Record and Reporting System." He gave many illustrations of records and reports and how efficiency and production have been increased, and also spoke of the enthusiasm which the solicitors had manifested in trying the scheme and in renewing their pledges for a continuance of the system. Mr. Macgowan said he would not care to try the system with solicitors unless they were convinced of its helpfulness, and resolved to adopt heartily the generous co-operative spirit the system called for. He also said the best results could be obtained where frequent spirited agency meetings were held. He said further that his hearers were free to adopt his system as a whole or in part or change it over to meet their own needs, or his office would be glad to furnish outfits at a reasonable price. The address was cordially received and the methods will probably be adopted by other offices.

A press committee was elected, consisting of Henry A. Macgowan and the secretary and the president of the association.

Western Massachusetts.

A score of the members of the Western Massachusetts association gathered in the evening of Oct. 17 at the Nelson-Haynes Hotel at Springfield for their monthly meeting and dinner. The following companies were represented: Massachusetts Mutual, State Mutual of Worcester, Berkshire Mutual of Pittsfield, New York Life, Mutual Life of New York, Connecticut Mutual, Northwestern Mutual, Provident Life and Trust, Travelers and Home Life of New York. The chief subject of discussion was the reports on the Atlantic City convention. The speakers were E. M. Allis, of Springfield, general agent for the Massachusetts Mutual, and Harry Chittum, of Easthampton, special agent for the Mutual Life.

Mr. Chittum brought out in detail the advantages of the life income policy, which is now coming into general favor, solving as it does the problem of reinvestment. Particular stress was laid upon this question at the Atlantic City convention. Other speakers were Charles H. Jordan, of Springfield; L. V. Clifford, of Springfield, and J. F. Moran, of Greenfield. E. B. Ranshousen, president of the association and general agent of the State Mutual for Western Massachusetts, presided and introduced the speakers. Five new members were taken into the organization.

Memphis.

"Resolved, that the Limited Payment Life Plan of Life Insurance is more attractive and more beneficial to the insuring public than the Ordinary Life Plan." This was the subject of debate at the October meeting of the Memphis association and was participated in by two members for the affirmative and two for the negative. A general discussion followed. Vice-President J. E. Lippitt was responsible for the subject chosen, as he had been selected to arrange he programs for the meetings up to the first of the year. Former National Secretary Bolling Sibley was to have given an account of the Atlantic City convention, but was unavoidably detained, so that it was necessary to postpone that portion of the program until the November meeting.

Plans are being made to insure a large attendance at the Cincinnati convention in 1914.

Minneapolis.

Steps were taken at the October meeting of the Minneapolis association to formulate plans for making the regular monthly meetings more interesting and instructive. With that object in view a committee consisting of Messrs. Tift, Ahern and F. C. Butts were appointed to take the matter up and report at the next meeting. Miss Annie Kirkwood and B. E. Ellis gave reports of the Atlantic City convention.

Mobile.

At the regular October meeting of the Mobile association, Leon Schwarz was elected to represent that association on the National Executive Committee. The Committee on Legislation was directed to investigate and to report upon the Florida rebate laws, with a view to advocating similar laws in Alabama.

Nebraska.

The Life Underwriters' Association of Nebraska had as their guest of honor at their monthly meeting at the Commercial Club Saturday noon, November 8, M. A. Hall, a leading attorney of the city.

Mr. Hall is a believer in the institution of life insurance to the extent of a large amount, which he began taking out at an early age. Mr. Hall stated that in his estimation there was no class of men doing so much good for the community as the life insurance men. Continuing, he said that the primary object is always protection, and no difference how meagre an income is, it is the bounden duty of every man to provide for dependents now or those who may be dependent in the future, even though he has to skimp in the early years of his life on living expenses.

Mr. Hall said: "If there is one thing more than anything else which has given me peace of mind and satisfaction in life it is that I had life insurance sufficient to provide for my wife and children in case of my premature death." In his profession he daily sees the destitution of widows, which is a direct result of some improvident man, who, while living, did not sufficiently appreciate the uncertainty of life to "put his house in order."

New York.

With an unusually large attendance, probably due to the inspiration derived from the Atlantic City convention, the New York association opened up the campaign of the season by holding its regular October meeting at Murray's restaurant on the evening of Oct. 28. In a few brief remarks President Edward W. Allen emphasized the necessity of constant vigilance on the part of the members in order to stamp out rebating and other reprehensible practices. It was his opinion that the greatest good in this direction could be accomplished by making an example of an agent who rebated, by imposing the full penalty of the law upon him.

George W. Johnston, who, at the Atlantic City convention, was for the third time awarded the Calef Cup, was introduced by Mr. Allen. Mr. Johnston then read his essay, "Creative Soliciting, Rather Than Competitive." In a few preliminary remarks he explained that the limitations imposed by the conditions surrounding the award of the Calef Cup did not permit of a polished literary style. All that it was possible to do, he said, was to state the facts with little color or grace.

Lawrence Priddy, of the New York Life, was scheduled to give his impressions of the Atlantic City convention, but was unavoidably detained and upon the request of President Allen, Chas. Jerome Edwards spoke in his stead. Mr. Edwards' remarks, though brief, were full of characteristic energy and optimism. In the opinion of the speaker the top note of optimism was embraced by the twentieth century idea of service. He referred to the address of Royal S. Goldsburly, of Pittsburgh, at the convention and laid stress upon the technical education of solicitors. He called attention to the time spent in fruitless effort and urged upon his audience the necessity of a system of efficiency and the scientific handling of the producing agents time.

Mention was made of the education and conservation movement, and the plans of the National Association's committee which has this phase of association work in hand were explained. Mr. Edwards' remarks constituted a fitting introduction to Winslow Russell, agency manager of the Phoenix Mutual, who was the next speaker.

Mr. Russell's address followed closely the lines of his address at the convention, with the exception that many of the charts used in explaining his methods had been elaborated and included the results of nine months' business instead of six months. The speaker was followed with close attention and expressed himself as perfectly willing to answer any questions which might be asked. His audience was by no means slow in taking him at his word, all of which evidenced the interest taken in his remarks. It developed from one question asked that it was the consensus of opinion that the year 1913 had not been as good a year for business as the preceding year. On motion of Conrad V. Dykeman Mr. Russell was given a rising vote of thanks.

Early in the year the association had made plans for a daily luncheon club, but during the vacation season it was decided advisable to hold this matter in abeyance until activities were resumed in the Fall. At this meeting it was announced that the club was in full operation and had commenced its daily sessions at Haan's Rathskeller at 21 Park Row. The club is meeting with remarkable success and has a membership of forty, with a splendid daily average attendance. A circular was distributed calling attention to the matter and stated in part as follows:

"Getting acquainted" without the loss of time is one of the things that the club accomplishes. A member takes as much or as little time as he likes for lunch; he orders what he wants and pays for it; gives the waiter a "tip" and is off about his business. In the meantime he has had a friendly talk with two or three or half a dozen life insurance agents, and he has probably become acquainted with some one in the business whom he did not know before. Also, he has found him a much better fellow than he thought he was. If life insurance agents will "get acquainted," a whole lot of good to the life insurance business will result.

Members of the Life Underwriters' Association are especially invited to join, but any life insurance agent who is a good fellow will be welcome as a member. No pledge is required except to attend once a week, or pay twenty-five cents for non-attendance. This is done so that the attendance may be somewhat regular. Attendance is appreciated much more than fines.

Life insurance men who are desirous of joining this club should apply to President Allen, whose address is 220 Broadway.

Norfolk.

At the regular October meeting of the Norfolk association, J. R. Coupland, of the Union Central; R. R. Richardson, of the Equitable, and R. E. Williamson, of the Life Insurance Company of Virginia, gave interesting talks on the Atlantic City convention. Samuel B. Love, manager of the Richmond agency of the Mutual Life, was present as a guest of the association, and his address, though brief, was enthusiastically received. It was decided to conduct an aggressive campaign for new members, and Mr. Richardson offered two prizes to the two members who will be first to bring in three new members each.

Oklahoma.

Forty members were in attendance at the October meeting of the Oklahoma association, at which President J. Henry Johnson reported upon the Atlantic City convention and presented the association with the Chas. Jerome Edwards trophy and the Whittington trophy awarded at that gathering. The trophies were received by Milas Lasater, who

Oregon.

President Hubert H. Ward was the principal speaker at the October meeting of the Oregon association. He discussed the Atlantic City convention, giving particular attention to the educational and conservation movement. F. J. Steinbrey, of the Home Office of the Pacific Mutual, also delivered a brief address. At the November meeting, which will be held on the 17th inst., members will be expected to give an account of their observations of various insurance advertisements and a critical study of the article by Peter McFarlane entitled "His House in Order," which appeared in Collier's some months ago, and which was reproduced in LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS, will be a part of the program.

Philadelphia.

Shortly after the death of I. Layton Register, a former President of the National Association and a man who has always been actively identified with the association movement, the Philadelphia association appointed a committee to prepare suitable resolutions. The committee recently presented the following memorial:

I. LAYTON REGISTER,

Died Sept. 29, 1913.

With sincere regret and loving remembrance we place this minute upon our records.

I. LAYTON REGISTER,

whose loss we mourn, exemplified in his career the highest type of the life insurance agent. As a member of the Philadelphia Association of Life Underwriters, of which he was one of its founders and repeatedly honored by the highest offices within its gift, he distinguished himself by his intellectual attainments, his probity and the zeal which characterized his every thought and deed.

In his chosen sphere his intercourse with all was graced by an engaging charm, a simplicity, a purity of sentiment, a moral loftiness and undaunted courage that armed him with a power few could resist. Endowed by nature with marked religious tendencies and gifted with noble and generous instincts, he naturally took interest in everything which contributed to the uplifting of humanity and the betterment of their social and moral welfare.

In the business of life insurance he was foremost in upholding right methods and practices and stood firmly and courageously for the highest ideals. The pages of life insurance history are replete with his lofty, ennobling sentiments, and what he imparted from time to time contributed largely to the success of the life association movement, inspired his associates to earnest endeavor and gave to the representatives of the business everywhere a clearer and nobler idea of duty and right.

In his death the Philadelphia Association of Life Underwriters has lost one of its most valued and devoted members and life insurance one of its ablest and honored advocates. As individuals we part with one whom we loved and we sorrow because in his death we have lost one of the worthiest of our elect.

I. Layton Register died as he lived, a faithful, sincere Christian man; an honor to his church, to his business, to the city and to the community in which he lived, and as we bow to the will of Him who doeth all things well, we reverently say—"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. They rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

Rochester.

Five minute talks on the Atlantic City convention, by delegates who were present at that meeting, was the principal feature of the October meeting of the Rochester association. This was followed by a discussion of life income insurance. Thomas Wood and A. E. Bridgen urged the members to take some action toward raising a fund for advertising life insurance in a general way in Rochester, also to favor the proposed country-wide campaign of the National Association.

St. Louis.

The guest of honor of the St. Louis association at its meeting held on Oct. 28 at the Mercantile Club was National Vice-President Edward A. Woods, of Pittsburgh. Mr. Woods discussed the matter of unjust taxation by the States and Federal Government, closely following his recent address at the Inaugural Meeting at Pittsburgh. Another speaker was W. F. Gephart, Ph.D., of Washington University, author of a number of insurance text books. Professor Gephart's subject was "The Principles of Life Insurance." Vice-President William C. Johnson, of the Columbian National of Boston, was a welcome guest of the association. His address on "The Home Office and the Field" was enthusiastically received.

St. Paul.

"No policyholder in a legal reserve company has lost a cent since 1887," said J. A. O. Preus, Commissioner of Insurance of Minnesota, at the regular monthly meeting of the St. Paul association. The meeting was held at the Commercial Club on the evening of the 3d inst., and while Mr. Preus was the principal speaker, an interesting address was delivered by Assistant Attorney-General Clifton L. Hilton.

Mr. Preus claimed that fraternal insurance in Minnesota had decreased to the extent of $17,000,000 in the last year, and he then contrasted this with the growth of legal reserve insurance.

Mr. Hilton referred to the time when he was in the insurance business and interpolated some humorous experiences, which were greatly enjoyed by his audience.

This was the first meeting of the season of the St. Paul association, which was recently re-organized and admitted to the National Association at the Atlantic City convention. The following officers were elected: George W. Harrison, president, re-elected; P. W. Fahey, first vice-president; W. H. Locker, second vice-president; Charles E. Learned, secretary; F. W. Hauenstein, treasurer. These officers, with D. R. Schuler, J. K. Robinson, J. J. Bullis and M. L. Griffiths, will constitute the executive committee.

Savannah.

At the quarterly meeting of the Savannah association at Bannon Lodge Oct. 21 the delegates to the National Convention made their reports. The delegates were W. J. Harty, E. S. Stoddard and S. J. Wheaton, Jr. The convention, they reported, was the best they have ever attended.

A. S. Holcombe, who is connected with the Fidelity Mutual, was the association's guest. He made a short talk, in which he praised Savannah as being one of the best cities he ever visited. Mr. Holcombe said that he was seriously considering locating in Savannah.

E. H. O'Connor presided over the meeting and acted as toastmaster. The meeting began at 6.30 o'clock, being followed by a shore dinner. Those present were: Julian Schley, Andrew Doyle, E. S. Stoddard, S. J. Wheaton, Jr., Stiles Burroughs, Tracy Hunter, A. S. Holcombe, W. J. Harty, Harold Ferst, Aaron Ferst and E. H. O'Connor.

South Carolina.

The annual meeting of the South Carolina association was held at noon on Oct. 29 in the city council chamber at Columbia, W. J. Roddey, of Rock Hill, president of the association, presiding.

From reports made, the association was found to be in a flourishing condition, 43 of the representative life insurance men of the State holding membership, and 20 of the legal reserve companies licensed in South Carolina being represented.

Mr. Roddey has served the association as president for three terms and he declined re-election for another year. He has been active for the association movement and its present satisfactory condition is largely due to the personal attention he has given the work. Mr. Roddey was given a rising vote of thanks by the members for the splendid services rendered the life insurance interests of the State. He is well known throughout the State as manager for the Equitable Life and president of the National Union Bank of Rock Hill.

The committee on nominations, R. Sam Cox, R. J. Blalock, E. D. Pearce and D. H. Ellis, reported the nominations of the following officers for the ensuing year, who were unanimously elected: President, F. H. Hyatt, Columbia. Vice-presidents, C. C. Edwards, Chester; J. C. Dillingham, Charleston. Executive committee, Carroll H. Jones, Columbia, chairman; T. W. Bethea, Charleston; Fred J. Parham, Columbia; W. J. Roddey, Rock Hill, and Ellison Capers, Summerton. Secretary-treasurer, W. S. Hendley, Columbia.

The association considered propositions made for a plan of co-operative advertising and this matter was referred to the committee on press and publications.

F. H. Hyatt, president of the association for the ensuing year, is well known as South Carolina manager for the Mutual Life of New York. He announced that members of the committees on field practices, legislation, membership and press and publications would be announced at a later date.

The annual banquet of the association will be given during January or February and the present membership of the association will make an effort to obtain a large number of new members prior to that event.

South Dakota.

With the idea of extending the benefits of the association movement throughout the State of South Dakota, the Executive Committee of the Sioux Falls association recently presented an amendment changing the name of that association to the South Dakota Association of Life Underwriters. This amendment was adopted at the October meeting of the association, which was held at the Carpenter Hotel at Sioux Falls. It was also decided at this meeting that the election of officers should be held the first meeting in January.

Syracuse.

An enthusiastic get-together meeting of the Syracuse association was held on Oct. 18. Six of the eight delegates to the Atlantic City convention were present at the meeting and gave interesting talks. A new Committee on Education and Conservation was appointed, which committee will look after another lecture course at Syracuse University during the coming season.

Tacoma.

Twenty-seven members of the Tacoma association had their monthly dinner at the Commercial Club on the evening of Oct. 25, and listened to an address by Herbert Hunt, editor of the Tacoma Daily News, on "The Psychology of Life Insurance." Mr. Hunt traced the history of life insurance back to several hundred years before Christ, and sought to show the basis of the business which, he claimed, was love. Mr. Hunt is a man of forceful personality and a keen student, and his talk was enthusiastically received.

W. D. Mead, of Seattle, who was one of the delegates to the Atlantic City convention, delivered a report of that meeting. Mr. Mead is described by a Tacoma life insurance man as a "1914 model, six-cylinder hustler," and Tacoma men are always glad to have him as a speaker at their meetings.

Samuel McDowell was elected as a representative on the National Executive Committee. Three new members were admitted.

Four lectures are to be given at the Stadium High School of Tacoma during the winter months under the auspices of the local association. The subjects are as follows: "History of Life Insurance," to be given by Harry Pelletier; "Surplus, Reserve and Dividends," by M. C. Arvidson; "Physical, Financial and Moral Risk," by Tallmage Hamilton; and "Different Forms of Policies," by Carl Widmann.

Texas.

The Texas association held its October meeting at the Oriental Hotel in Dallas and eight new members were admitted. Several of the delegates to the Atlantic City convention gave brief talks relative to that meeting.

The Toledo association held its October meeting and dinner at the Commerce Club. An address was delivered by E. L. Briggs, whose theme was "The Life Insurance Agent's Service to Society." Mr. Briggs was given a rising vote of thanks. J. W. Crook gave the members a talk descriptive of his trip and the convention of the National Association in Atlantic City.

Utica.

The opening meeting of the fall season was held by the Utica association on the evening of Oct. 20 in Bagg's Hotel. Walter S. The association will arrange for a series of addresses by prominent life insurance men, and these affairs will be helpful and valuable.

Announcement was made that James P. Mulhall, president of the Utical local, has been appointed by National President E. J. Clark as one of the five members of the press committee of the National Association.

Two new members were admitted to the West Virginia association at its October meeting, Charles S. Schlesinger, of the Travelers, and J. E. Frayser, of the Life Insurance Company of Virginia. Graham C. Wells, general agent of the Provident Life and Trust at Pittsburgh, was the principal speaker.

TAXATION OF ORGANIZED BENEFICENCE.

THE GREAT PROBLEM OF EDUCATING THE PEOPLE TO UNDERSTAND THAT LIFE INSURANCE IS A SUCCESSFUL EXPRESSION OF DEMOCRATIC PRINCIPLES AT WORK.

Twelve States Within Seven Years Have Reduced Taxation, But Thirteen States Have Increased the Burden, and in Knowledge of the Economic Value of the Institution, United States is Far Behind Many other Countries.

By Darwin P. Kingsley, President, New York Life Insurance Company.

Mr. Kingsley delivered this address to the executive officers, staff and guests of the Union Central Life Insurance Company at the opening of its new home office building. Certain introductory felicitations are not reproduced, but the portion herewith should be carefully studied by every man identified with the life insurance profession. Mr. Kingsley never deals in superficialities. His opinion is the last word in life insurance.—Editor's Note.

How shall we make the people understand that a life insurance company is a pure democracy; that it is the most successful expression of democratic principles actually at work; that in it there is the justice which democracy aims to accomplish and otherwise largely fails to achieve; that it is a brother to all those who, from the beginning of time, have sought to assert the divinity that dwells in man, who have sought some process by which the sovereignty of the individual could be established and at the same time the immeasurable strength of men working together could be realized?

That this is what life insurance really means, society at large does not begin to comprehend. Indignant over their exploitation by the strong and the rich, men are disposed to classify the successful life insurance company along with the great trust, and to view it with the suspicion and fear with which they view—and view not altogether unjustly—accumulated wealth and great business success. I do not claim that life insurance is entirely without fault. It has made some serious mistakes which have given some color of justification to such public opinion. But the real causes which have led to the misconceptions which exist are to be found in the imperfections of human nature and in some of those weaknesses which always have and always will be inherent in a democratic society.

One great weakness of a democratic society is that its beneficent forces are unorganized. Selfishness is organized, politics is organized, business is organized, even crime is organized. But the people, through lack of organization, frequently are unable to know when and how and where they have really achieved a triumph. The politician easily fools them; business not infrequently fools them. For this reason they sometimes find that the fruits of an apparent victory are at the last merely Apples of Sodom. On the other hand, and for the same reason, they sometimes fail to recognize a really democratic movement, a really democratic achievement.

That life insurance is organized beneficence, that it is democratic, that its money is the money of the people, that its extent is so great as to make any existing private fortune a matter of relative unimportance, that its billions of accumulations are more potent than any other money assembled for any purpose because of the social efficiency with which they are impressed—in short, that it answers to a large degree the longings of the individual for a definite place in the wealth of the world, and for definite power against the organized selfishness of the world—all these seem to be truths that the people comprehend with great difficulty. Indeed, comprehension comes so slowly that the people themselves, through their accredited representatives, unwittingly harass and handicap and burden what are really their own best and dearest achievements.

I can at this time touch only upon one or two of the forms which this lack of understanding takes with regard to life insurance. One form is taxation.

We have, as a nation, recently been re-examining the bases and the principles of taxation in the matter of imported goods and of incomes. Congress has proclaimed its intention to strike the shackles from trade and industry and to lift the burden of the high cost of living from the consumer, or at least from the poor. There are shackles which bind life insurance and there is a high cost to the consumer in this field which is the direct product of unwise legislation, which in turn is a direct product of misconception by the insured themselves. Whatever life insurance costs beyond what it should be chiefly chargeable now to unwise legislation.

I shall not stop to review what may be called the shackles pure and simple which still exist in life insurance regulation. As a matter of fact, such shackles do not exist outside of the States of New York and Texas, and as originally forged they have been mostly broken. In New York they remain to-day in only two particulars: Limitation on the volume of business which a company may legally produce annually; and limitation on a company's margins of safety.

But as re-examination of processes of taxation is in order let us review concretely some facts with regard to the processes by which life insurance is now taxed: The legal reserve life insurance companies of the United States paid in 1912, in addition to taxes on real estate, nearly $13,000,000 on a total premium income of over $666,000,000. That is to say, for every $1,000 of capital which the insured paid in 1912 for the protection of their families through life insurance, the State took, in one form or another, about $20. This is a heavier tax than the property tax in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston or San Francisco. Every dollar's worth of property upon the security of which the companies had invested their funds paid taxes where it was situated; but, in addition to that, for the mere privilege of existing and doing business, the States first and last took this fearful toll.

This is not only taxation of capital but excessive taxation from any point of view. It can perhaps be made more impressive if, for purposes of illustration, we apply the burden to some other phases of the business.

The Ultimate Purpose.

The ultimate purpose of life insurance, of course, is protection, and that finds expression in the money that is finally paid to the insured or to their beneficiaries.

If now we assume that the policyholder was taxed upon what he received rather than upon what he paid, we find that for every $1,000 paid to policyholders in 1912 the State exacted in taxes almost $29.

Again, if we assume that the chief benefit of life insurance is the amount paid in death claims, then we find that for every $1,000 so paid the State exacted death duties to the amount of over $63.

If it be said that expenses of life insurance are too high, managements may very well retort that the item of State taxes in every $1,000 expenses amounts to $72, and unlike ordinary expenses is a factor entirely beyond their control.

If people complain that dividends are too small, that condition is in part at least explained by taxes, because for every $1,000 paid in dividends in 1912 the companies were obliged to pay in taxes $140; in other words, dividends on the average would have been 14 per cent. higher but for the moneys taken by the States for the privilege of doing business.

The latest development in our various forms of taxation in the country at large is the Income Tax. This tax reaches life insurance, as it did in the corporation tax which it supersedes, by levying 1 per cent. upon net income. If the company which I have the honor to serve had paid to the Federal Government in 1912 as a tax on its net income what it paid to the States, the rate of taxation on that income would have been four and four-tenths per cent. This rate approximates the rate levied by the Income Tax on so much of private incomes as exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $500,000; in other words, it equals the rate applied by the existing law to those whom some people call "the criminal rich."

Size of the Burden.

The indictment against such taxation is not complete when I recite merely the size of the burden. Another clause of the indictment must tell how the States destroy equity as between policyholders. Neither in the rate, in the amounts paid, nor in the principle underlying the system of taxation, do the States agree.

Twenty-seven States levy a tax upon gross premiums without deductions.

In one State the rate is six-tenths of 1 per cent.;

In two States it is 1 per cent.;

In one State it is 1.44 per cent.;

In one it is 1.75 per cent.;

In two it is 1½ per cent.;

In eleven it is 2 per cent.;

In one it is 2½ per cent. on the first $5,000 and 2 per cent. on the excess;

In one it is 2¾ per cent.;

In six it is 2½ per cent.;

And in one it is 3 per cent.

Nineteen States and the District of Columbia levy a tax upon premiums after certain deductions:

In four States and in the District of Columbia the basis of the tax is premiums less dividends;

In nine States it is premiums less annual dividends;

In one State it is premiums less death losses;

In one State it is premiums less death losses not to exceed 25 per cent. of the premiums;

In two States it is premiums less policy claims;

In one State it is premiums less death losses, endowments and commissions;

In one State it is premiums less re-insurance premiums paid to domestic companies.

In two States only are premiums not taxed—Nevada and Massachusetts; but Massachusetts levies a tax upon the reserves of Massachusetts policyholders, which is the most indefensible of all forms of life insurance taxation.

Among the lesser taxes imposed are some of the following in every State: State license tax, State fees, State and county license fees, city and county taxes, personal property tax.

Nineteen Different Rates.

Here are nineteen different rates of taxation, even if licenses and fees were the same in every State—which they are not. And yet the United States are supposed to be a nation in which the citizens of each State are "entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States," where commercial intercourse between the citizens of the different States is free and untrammelled.

If any one of these rates of taxation is right, then eighteen of them are wrong.

The absurdity and injustice of the present situation will be illustrated if we assume that Congress were legislating upon the subject and that nineteen different rates of taxation were presented by representatives of nineteen different States, and, as the sponsors of each plan insisted upon their own, Congress should enact them all!

All this, notwithstanding the frequently repeated statute which forbids any company to "make or permit any discrimination between individuals of the same class or of equal expectation of life, in the amount or payment or return of premiums or rates charged for policies of insurance, or in the dividends or other benefits payable thereon, or in any of the terms and conditions of the policy." The first to violate these statutes are the States that have passed them. The companies could hardly have any object in violating them, and, so far as I know, no company ever voluntarily did. It would be difficult, however, to conceive of a greater travesty on justice in the matter of taxation than a program by which the States in one statute prohibit discriminations and in another enforce a program which compels discriminations.

Most Heavily Taxed.

We are, in a word, faced by this anomalous condition: Life insurance, using words in their ordinary significance, is not an investment at all. The money that provides it represents, substantially in its entirety, unselfish sacrifice; and yet, no capital going into any ordinary business enterprise is anywhere in this country taxed as heavily as life insurance premiums are taxed.

Taxation is one of the oldest problems of government. Indeed it lies at the foundation of all government. The disposition on the part of the representatives of the people to get money for governmental purposes in the easiest, rather than in the right, way is in part at least a product of their resentment against the encroachment of organized wealth, against the inhumanity of organized ability. Responsible life insurance companies have money; they must have it. But the people as a whole do not understand that necessity, they do not appreciate its significance, and they do not realize that that money is their money, that it is beneficent and not malevolent in character, that it is really the fine product of an ideal democracy. It is even difficult for them to understand that the project itself should be encouraged; but that much they do faintly admit. Broadly speaking, the man in the street will generally say that life insurance is a good thing. Concretely speaking, when he comes face to face with the fact that it has great accumulations of money, he acts as though he thought it were a bad thing.

And yet, I thoroughly believe that we are making progress. There are two principal reasons why I think so; the first is that the day of strike legislation is gone and gone forever. This dates from the moral upheaval which perhaps found its most definite form in the insurance investigation in the State of New York in 1905-6. It is easy to be wise after the event, easy now to condemn the men who, in most instances at least, dickered with the blackmailing legislator from the best of motives and from a desire to protect the interests of their policyholders; but that condition has passed, passed not only for life insurance, but, as I see it, for all corporations. The second reason is that when the Income Tax was under discussion in Congress, genuine progress was made. The case was presented as it probably was never presented before to any legislative body in this country. The result is that the tax exacted from life insurance companies under the Corporation Tax law will be materially reduced under the existing Income Tax law. That is progress; but no inconsiderable progress has been made by the several States as well.

Taxation on the Increase.

Twelve States, within seven years, have reduced taxation on life insurance by percentages varying from one-tenth of one per cent. in Colorado, to one per cent. in Rhode Island. In the same period thirteen States have increased taxation. While, therefore, the States, as a whole, appear not to have made progress, as a matter of fact they have, because prior to seven years ago no State ever made any reduction under any circumstances. That within seven years twelve States should have made reductions is significant, and is rendered more significant by the recent action of the Federal Congress.

But the misunderstanding still exists. That Congressmen and Senators fail to understand the part that life insurance plays in the economy of the State is shown in the text of the Income Tax law as it now stands, and was strikingly shown by the measure in its first draft. It is hardly worth while now to discuss the provisions of the bill as originally presented; it is enough to say that into that first draft some enemy of responsible life insurance had injected an unusual amount of venom. Who that enemy was I do not know, although he probably was not a member of either House. But even now the bill clearly shows this lack of understanding, this fear of accumulated money, this disposition to put a penalty upon success.

The Irresponsible Go Untaxed.

The bill, for example, exempts all fraternal, beneficial and religious orders. Why? Ostensibly because they are mutual. But is that the real reason? They are no more mutual than certain well-known life companies, and broadly speaking no more mutual than the so-called stock companies. But they accumulate little money, they present the plea of poverty; the successful companies accumulate money and do not present the plea of poverty. It is true that these orders are unscientifically founded, that they are to a large degree irresponsible, that their contracts cannot be depended on, that their record through a period of time is one of failure and financial default, social inefficiency and general incompetence; but they have the seeming virtue of poverty. On the other hand, it is true that the responsible life companies are dependable, that their contracts are as certain as anything in human society, that what they agree to do they do, and the extent of what they beneficently do is almost beyond calculation; but in doing it and in order that they may do it, they commit the offence—or what is seemingly an offence—of having large accumulations of money. Moreover, they never make the plea of poverty. So the inefficient and the irresponsible go untaxed; the efficient and the responsible are taxed. The feeble attempt at democracy is encouraged; the effective achievement of real democracy is discouraged.

And yet I insist that we have progressed. During the recent discussion of the Income Tax law Congress really responded to the plea of the companies. Most of us presented arguments; which arguments went home it is not easy to say. That some of them went home is certain. It may not be out of order for me to repeat in substance some of the arguments which I used with the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, and, so far as I was allowed, with the sub-committee of that body.

Socially Inefficient.

I called the committee's attention to the socially inefficient, what we call the dependent class, and reviewed some of the causes which constantly swell the ranks of that class. That one of the great problems confronting every statesman is how to provide through taxation for the support of this class was a matter that I did not need to emphasize. My plea for life insurance was that beyond every other organized force in human society it helps the State and aids the statesman by keeping people out of the dependent class; and if we can successfully establish a social program which keeps people from becoming dependent, a great problem in statecraft will speedily become simplified. We pay to war pensioners over $165,000,000 a year, every dollar of which is raised by taxation. The life companies pay twice that sum annually in cash to beneficiaries and policyholders, every dollar of which is raised by private taxation. Pensions are remedial. Life insurance is preventive. Pensions are the price the people pay in order to soften the pitiful after effects of a conflict too hideous to be ameliorated when in progress. The proceeds of life insurance are provided by the people to protect the defenceless, to educate the young, to open the door of opportunity. But it is a tax, and to tax it is to commit the economic barbarism of levying a tax on a tax.

This was the argument which I sought to drive home. It seems to me it is the consideration which must appeal to every intelligent statesman. If that be a fact, if life insurance in the great interplay of the forces involved in our sociology is direct, powerful and efficient in keeping people out of the dependent class, should it, beyond the cost of administration, be taxed at all? Should it not rather be encouraged—encouraged as an enterprise which in the long run solves the problem of taxation by reducing the burdens on society which ultimately find expression in terms of taxation?

Far Behind Other Countries.

In knowledge of the economic meaning and value of life insurance, we are far behind most of the enlightened countries of the world. I happen to be associated with a company which does business with substantially all the civilized countries of the globe. In only a few are we taxed in the same way that we are taxed in the United States. I refrain from naming those countries because the catalogue might appear invidious. In most of the great countries of Europe, whenever a tax is laid upon premiums it is assessed directly against the policyholder and turned over to the government. This has at least the virtue of directness and the policyholder knows what the government is doing. A great objection to our system is its indirection. Few policyholders know that they are being mulcted by the government. In France, Spain, Denmark, Germany and Russia, the premium tax is for the maintenance of the Insurance Department and substantially nothing more. In Great Britain the tax that the company pays is about one-fourteenth of the average rate in the United States. In Germany the rate is about one-twentieth of the rate exacted in the United States.

But that is not the whole story. In Great Britain and Germany the government not only refrains from laying more than a nominal tax upon life insurance when voluntarily taken, but they compel certain classes to insure against death, accidents and sickness, and provide at the public charge for old age pensions. The cost of this is assessed partly on the insured, partly upon the employer and partly upon public funds. The attitude of these governments toward the idea of life insurance is so far in advance of the attitude maintained by our various legislatures that the contrast is painful. They have learned what we must learn; they have learned under autocratic forms of government what we are learning very slowly under a democratic form of government.

I have said that we are making progress. I wish I could say that we shall ultimately get justice under the supervision to which all insurance is now subjected. What would the attainment of justice in taxation involve? It would mean that forty-eight separate State legislatures and the legislatures of all the Territories, as well as the Congress of the United States, must reduce taxation on insurance of all kinds to a basis which would represent merely the cost of efficient State administration. It would mean the surrender of over $16,000,000 in annual revenue. Some of you may believe that can be done; I am frank to say that I do not.

One Great Authority.

And yet I believe we shall ultimately get justice. Europe has learned the lesson; but the people did not learn the lesson and then enforce it; the lesson was first learned by authority. The value of life insurance was first appreciated in Europe and is being imposed on the people, by authority. The one great authority in the United States which can enforce justice is the Federal Supreme Court.

That court went wrong economically in 1869 in the case of Paul vs. Virginia. It has generally been assumed, in that case, and in some subsequent cases where the doctrine of that case was reaffirmed, that the court irrevocably declared insurance in all its forms and however practised not to be commerce. The language used in some later decisions, however, implies that the decision then made applied only to insurance as ordinarily practised, and later writers have repeatedly intimated that in the case of Paul vs. Virginia the Supreme Court has not disposed of the whole subject of insurance nor settled the question as to whether or not it is commerce as practised now, especially in life insurance. The practical effect of that decision, however, was to leave the whole matter to the tender mercies of the States and they are taking out of insurance as a whole annually about $17,500,000. To expect the States voluntarily to give that up is to expect too much. You might as well expect the beneficiary of a monopoly voluntarily to come forward and renounce his privileges. Human nature is not made that way.

Paul vs. Virginia.

What the Supreme Court of the United States may do when insurance and especially life insurance as it is now practised is fully presented and discussed, is another matter. Good lawyers believe that if the Supreme Court should enter a decree declaring that insurance and especially life insurance as now practised is commerce, it would simply be recognizing what has always been true, and would not be reversing the controlling case of Paul vs. Virginia. The effect of such an opinion would be magical. I firmly believe that sooner or later such an opinion must be rendered.

When that time comes not only will the great body of this taxation fall away, but an opportunity will be created for the expansion of a great democratic idea, one which applies the principles of democracy to labor and the products of labor, to society and the problems of society, as effectively as manhood suffrage, in theory at least, enforces the rights of humanity in the processes of a democratic government. Through the expansion of that idea, under the control of one central authority as against some fifty authorities which now control, we shall hasten enormously the time when the people will understand that a life insurance company is indeed a pure democracy, that it is a brother to all who have long sought some process by which the sovereignty of the individual may be established, and at the same time the immeasurable strength of men working together realized.

A BUSINESS MAN'S VIEWS UPON LIFE INSURANCE.

Captain of Industry Declares That Life Insurance Is Essentially an Act of Intelligence, Love and Self-Sacrifice.

By Alba B. Johnson, President, Baldwin Locomotive Works, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. Johnson delivered this address at the December meeting of the Philadelphia association. He is not only president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, but is a strong believer in life insurance. Mr. Johnson carries nearly $1,000,000 insurance on his own life, and his reasons why other men should insure their lives in proportion to their incomes are not only interesting, but are based upon Mr. Johnson's personal observation and experience.—Editor's Note.

By Alba B. Johnson.

Life insurance is made possible only by the general prevalence of peace and by the homogeneity of interest among men which results from modern civilization. It is a recognition of men's mutual dependence and is a symbol of the brotherhood of man. Who could conceive of men in a savage state, exposed to cold, hunger and disease, uniting to bear jointly the losses and suffering caused by death. Life insurance upon a scale large enough to be practicable, was, furthermore, out of the question so long as people were divided up into small nations constantly at war with each other. Life insurance becomes possible only when men have so awakened to their duty to the dear ones who may survive them, to be willing to make sacrifices for benefits in which they cannot themselves hope to share. Life insurance is essentially an act of intelligence, love and self-sacrifice.

The subject which has been suggested to me is, "Life Insurance in its Relation to Business." I fear this is rather a pretentious subject, and that it would be nearer correct for me merely to give one business man's views upon life insurance. I am a strong believer in life insurance. I advise every young man of my acquaintance to purchase all the insurance he can afford to carry, and to increase it from time to time as circumstances make possible.

Matrimony and Life Insurance.

A young fellow without inherited means and having only his own brains and good health as his guarantee of success in life, has no right to ask a girl to marry him unless he shall make some effective provision against death or misfortune. Insurance offers such a provision. Therefore, it is the duty of every man contemplating matrimony to insure his life, and this should be done before marriage. With each advance in position and compensation he should add to his insurance, so that in case of death his wife and children will be enabled to live in the style to which his income, while living, has accustomed them. A man achieving great business success should simultaneously therewith be a large insurer.

Never, except as a last resource, should a man use his insurance policies as the basis for borrowing. It should be a source of joy and satisfaction that this sacred investment is kept clear of encumbrance. Whatever advantageous financial operations may offer with reference to other investments, sums set aside for insurance should be regarded as of a different class, to be maintained unimpaired. It is a satisfaction to know that the gradually increasing cash value offers, however, a resource always available and unquestionable. It is a stout anchor to windward holding firm against any storm of family or business misfortune that may arise.

In the autumn of 1907, there was a panic, during which there was a practical suspension both of currency payments and of credits. Rates of interest advanced to prohibitory figures, but notwithstanding the enhanced rates, loans were practically impossible to obtain. Three or four years before, one of my partners and I had taken out life insurance policies for considerable amounts. These gave the right to borrow from the insurance company at the fixed rate of five per cent. We were, therefore, enabled to place this credit at the disposal of the partnership of which we were members, and something like $100,000 of cash was instantly available in a time of great need. Of course these loans were repaid to the insurance company immediately upon the restoration of normal conditions. Such a privilege must in many cases mean the avoidance of actual disaster.

Some years ago I was giving much thought to the preparation of a will. My children were quite young, my boys being something like 15 and 12 years of age, respectively. There was also a younger daughter. It was impossible for me then to form any idea of the business character and judgment of my two sons. Should I leave to their unlimited discretion upon coming to their inheritances, the management of their properties, or should I put them in trust. The first would, in the event of their proving improvident or incapable, make them liable to be deprived of the support which I was desirous of providing. The second would make my lack of confidence in my sons a matter of record, the stigma of which might attach to them all their lives.

A Good Plan Suggested.

In this perplexity it occurred to me that I might take sufficient insurance, to be held in trust, the proceeds of the trust to be paid them so long as they should live, and the principal be available for them to dispose of by will upon their deaths. Then I could make a will, clear of restrictions which should contain no suggestion of doubt as to my children's capacity. I accordingly took out four policies, creating four trusts, one for my wife and one for each of my children. This transaction has always been a source of gratification to me and I have commended the same plan to many others.

Most men engaged in active business have much of their capital locked up in their business enterprises in such a way that it cannot be quickly withdrawn. They may also have investments of a more or less speculative character, which may not be ripe for realization and could only be liquidated at a loss. The more actively a man is interested in private and public affairs, the wider are his sympathies, and most men dying, leave private legacies as well as bequests to charitable and public causes. How important an advantage it must be to the executors to have immediately available, insurance funds free from every business entanglement, and available for immediate distribution to legatees. How satisfactory it must be to the surviving business associates, as well as to the beneficiaries, that such funds are at hand to use for any consistent purpose.

Endowment Insurance.

In endowment insurance the man of fixed or limited income has a means of providing a certain income during old age. Where two or more men join their fortunes and abilities in a business enterprise, to which each contributes a different kind of ability, the loss of either by death might prove disastrous to the survivor, not necessarily because of the loss of his skill, but also because of the withdrawal of his share of the capital. Partnership insurance offers a certain safeguard against such a contingency, and if a blanket arrangement is effected for the sole advantage of the business, it forms a reasonable and desirable business expense.

The possession of a fair amount of unencumbered insurance is one of the best tests of character for a borrower seeking credit. It is not only a tangible asset, but if maintained without incumbrance it is an indication of a reasonable surplus of other assets. As such, it is an evidence which no banker could ignore. It is not an asset which figures in the commercial agency reports, and it is not susceptible of being attached for debt.

At present the public mind is much troubled with the subjects of the taxation of life insurance and State insurance. Taxation is predicted largely upon the necessities of the State, and frequently only secondary consideration is given to the justness of the tax. The only reason why I can perceive for taxation of life insurance, is that the Government needs the money, and having the power to do so, levies taxation irrespective of the weighty and valid reasons against it.

In a recent pamphlet entitled "Taxation of Organized Beneficence," Darwin P. Kingsley, president of the New York Life Insurance Company, pointed out that during 1912 for every $1,000 which the insured paid for protection of their families through life insurance, the State took, in one form or another, about $20. This is a tax heavier than the property tax in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston and San Francisco. If the amount of taxation paid were based upon the amount paid in death claims, then for every $1,000 so paid the State exacts death duties to the amount of over $63. In fact, the item of taxation amounts to 7.2 per cent. of the entire cost of management of the business of life insurance. It must be recognized not only that taxation of life insurance is taxation upon thrift, but that it is a burden added to the cost of performing that which is a sacred duty upon the part of every citizen—the setting aside of a part of his income while living, to prevent any risk of his surviving dependents becoming charges upon the community. The State could, with as great propriety, assess the same rate of taxation upon the contributions of the charitable for the support of hospitals, orphan asylums and other institutions of benevolence, as upon the benevolent provision which men make for those dependent upon them.

William Pitt's Example.

During the early part of the last century, when England was striving with every resource to combat the overwhelming power of Napoleon throughout the continent of Europe, insurance became an object of taxation, although the amount to which it was taxed was less than that now collected in many of our States. William Pitt perceived the folly of this form of taxation and removed it. May we not earnestly hope that a more profound study of the lessons of the past may lead our statesmen to follow Pitt's example and enable them to recognize the peculiar claims of life insurance to exemption from taxation.

There is a disposition to believe that government can do many things better than can be done by private enterprise. The idea that life insurance should be a function of government is an old one. Recently Germany and England have enacted measures for insurance of working people against sickness and old age, and whatever inconveniences there may have been at the outset in becoming accustomed to the operation of these laws, there can now be no question of the beneficence of their operation. So strong is the expectation of life in every man, that all believe in death for others but not for themselves. Therefore, it is difficult to prevail upon men to realize their own mortality, and the condition in which their families may be left after their death.

The Necessary Urge.

In this, as in other respects, men must be urged to do their duty. For this reason no State system of voluntary insurance would be successful, and to be practicable any system of State insurance must be compulsory and must have relation also to the circumstances and income of the individual. Where State insurance has been attempted, only small numbers have taken advantage of it. Without a compulsory feature, State insurance would necessarily be a failure. Insurance is most widely bought where the field is most thoroughly canvassed. Far as we have wandered from the old-time standards, that they govern best who govern least, I believe that the day is fortunately far distant when any system of compulsory State insurance would be acceptable to the American people.

INTERDEPENDENCE BETWEEN AGENTS AND POLICYHOLDERS.

Lack of Knowledge on the Part of the Uninsured as to Real Meaning of Life Insurance Emphasizes Necessity of Agents Capable of Performing Expert and Honorable Service.

By Ernest J. Clark, President, National Association of Life Underwriters.

In this article, which is the address delivered by Mr. Clark at the recent meeting of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, will be found much food for thought. The responsibilities of the agent are many and of great importance. Mr. Clark outlines the situation very clearly, showing how public sentiment is created and moulded by the agent.—Editor's Note.

It gives me much pleasure as president of the National Association of Life Underwriters to respond this afternoon to a subject on which the life insurance men of this country, and especially the members of the great national body which I have the honor of representing, are concentrating their thought and energies as never before.

Life insurance, once classed as purely a business, has during recent years been acquiring those elements both in its conduct at our home offices, and the educational requirements, training, ethical standards and character of service rendered by its field men, which have made it unquestionably one of the four leading professions. The really successful life insurance agent of to-day has become an insurance counsellor in the fullest sense of the term—one whom any prospective insurer or policyholder may consult with perfect confidence that he will receive intelligent, conscientious and absolutely reliable advice and service. This is not simply idealism, gentlemen, but an accomplished fact dictated by the very nature and function of life insurance, the greatest institution outside of Church and State ever devised by the mind of man, an institution with such far-reaching material and spiritual force, underlying principles and humanitarian objects to be accomplished, that in its evolution only those men actuated by the higher motives in life and a desire to serve their fellowmen to the limit of their ability can become truly successful.

No Marvel in It.

The late Rev. Dr. Sylvester Scovel referred to the parallelism between the urgency of the minister of the Gospel and that of the life insurance agent in the following language: "There is no marvel in it. It grows from the same roots in both cases and in each it is genuinely beneficent. The objections and difficulties to be met are the same. The outlying facts fully sustain the same sincere appeals to judgment and reason and affection. The persuasives to instant action against the ever present inertia which pleads for delay are of the same nature. Both agents seek to determine the will by informing the mind and arousing feeling. Both mingle warnings and attractions."

Service, therefore, and professional service in the fullest sense of the term, is the keynote to real success and efficiency in this great profession of life insurance, and by serving the policyholder best the company is served most. Aside from the technical requirements and the inspirational influence of life insurance on the life and work of the conscientious and carefully trained agent, what are some of the chief reasons responsible for this ever-increasing interdependence growing out of the policyholders' interests and necessities?

(1) The gradual and yet certain awakening of every self-respecting man to the benefits and necessities of life insurance protection: that it is no longer a luxury to be acquired when every other wish has been gratified, but that he has a life value which is to be destroyed by death and that it is his duty to protect his dependent ones against this ultimate destruction of that life value, or provides a definite income for his own old age and declining years.

(2) The multiplicity of contract forms now required in order to properly serve the insuring public render it necessary that the applicant or policyholder depend absolutely on the agent for guidance and advice.

Consequently, in view of this lack of knowledge on the part of the uninsured regarding life insurance and the proper form of contract adapted to his particular needs or those of his family or business, he must secure the services of an insurance agent or counsellor who is capable of giving to him the exact form of protection which the circumstances involved require.

Some time ago I heard an address delivered by a prominent Western lawyer and legislator before a body of insurance men on "The Policyholder's Point of View," and I am going to take the liberty of repeating the following paragraphs from this policyholder's address, owing to their direct bearing on the subject under discussion:

Misunderstanding of the Public.

"The average policyholder, himself, and certainly the uninsured to a greater degree, has a very faint idea of what a life insurance company is and who constitute the company. They understand that there is a home office, an indefinable sort of a thing, a corporation without soul, located in some city, which has a habit of reaching out over the country and taking in the money or contributions, and that any attempt we might make by court proceedings or legislation to stifle that monster is a service of value. They do not realize that the life insurance company of to-day is made up of the units of the insured, and I believe that the greatest work of education that you gentlemen can enter upon is to educate the people of this broad land to a realizing sense of the fact that the insured, the policyholder, is the unit out of which the structure is built. Make him understand that when he contributes to your company's assets he is, as in fact he is to-day, a shareholder, and that you are his faithful trustee of an expressed trust, and that you intend to carry it out faithfully as you have in the past. Then you will get rid of some of these delusions.

"The uniform solvency and success of legitimate life insurance ought to have taught our people their error, but they do not know it and do not understand it. Give us to know what is being done, for you need not be ashamed of it. The great and magnificent business will bear the searchlight of public scrutiny turned upon it every hour of the day and night. When such a record can be presented to me as the record of the life insurance companies of the United States, I feel more and more like dealing with my fellowman on his honor and feel that I never will be betrayed. And I want to say for the policyholders of this country that they will all feel that way if you will make an appeal to us and educate us on the subject. And so we ask you to assist us by giving us full knowledge of what is being done. We need your assistance in the education of our friends and our neighbors as to the difference between true and false insurance.

Vicious Substitutes.

"The frauds that are being perpetuated, the wrong that is coming to the so-called policyholders, is coming from those vicious substitutes for true insurance. It has no doubt appealed to you as agents and managers that there is a great injustice in imposing unwarrantable burdens upon this magnificent business. It comes to you with no more force than it does to me and my fellow policyholders who are trying to learn something of the intricacies of this business that produces such wonderful results for all of us. We ask that these burdens be taken off. Some of these burdens may seem to you trifling, but to one like myself, who has been paying on more insurance than he could conveniently carry ever since he entered business life, it is a burden to know that the State is attempting to make a source of profit out of this provision and foresight and care for his family and for his dependent ones.

"Taxation of insurance is an unjust burden. I care not in what State it is collected nor by what Legislature it is imposed. There is no more reason why I should be taxed on every premium that I pay annually in my attempt to lay up a little estate that will care for my dependent ones if I am carried off, than there is that you should tax any other charitable or eleemosynary institution within the bounds of my State."

Responsibility of Agent.

From the above, therefore, you will readily observe the natural interdependence between agent and policyholder, because of the growing disposition throughout the entire country to harass, annoy and burden life insurance policyholders with vexatious and expensive legislation. In the majority of cases the most powerful and effective weapon to fight with is public opinion, and the policyholder must look to the agent for enlightenment on these questions, and the agent must, in turn, work through the policyholder, using the public sentiment thus aroused to defeat obnoxious legislation and bring about a reduction in the existing onerous and unjust taxation imposed on the policyholders of this country by the several States.

This cannot be successfully accomplished by the officers of our companies unaided by the local influence of State constituents, and the agent thus acting as middle man between the officers of the company and the policyholder with whom he comes into personal touch can perform a much needed service, and especially with the co-operation of the officers of our companies or of their representatives in the Association of Life Insurance Presidents.

Along with this, and as a means to the end is keeping the fundamental purpose and underlying principles of life insurance clearly before the public, by dispelling the idea that life insurance companies are privately owned institutions, conducted with vast profits for the few, that the assets and even the surplus are unnecessary accretions of money held in distant money centers, and invested outside of the State from which the money comes, as well as the vague suspicion on the part of many that it is invested for the benefit of the officers or stockholders of the company.

Important Work.

Intelligence as to what life insurance really means; as to what a life insurance company really is; of its relationship to the life value; of its purpose in compensating loss by banding together persons from all sections in a common cause, and of promoting thrift, decreasing poverty with all that this usually means in its effect on disease, vice, illiteracy and even crime, disseminating the knowledge that investments of all life insurance companies are nation wide and not local, is a most important part of the work of the agent.

In the light of experience and observation, the leading life insurance men of this country are convinced that the National Association of Life Underwriters, through its 84 local associations, with a combined membership of over 4,000 agents, including, as it does, a majority of the general agents and managers of the United States, is the logical organization through which an active and systematic campaign of life insurance education, conservation and anti-taxation should be conducted for the benefit of policyholders and the insuring public. To this end our association is now at work—a most carefully chosen committee having been selected to supervise the education and conservation movement with the co-operation of the Executive Council of the National Association.

In this connection there is to be prepared during the coming year, under the editorial direction of a prominent life insurance educator and the supervision of the Executive Council, a standard text-book on life insurance, for use in the high schools, colleges, universities and other educational institutions of the United States and Canada, also for agency instruction. The book is to be of such scope and so written and compiled as to render it thoroughly adaptable to the various needs indicated. Its publication will be completed by September, 1914, in time for use in next year's semesters.

If our student classes were taught in the various institutions of learning throughout the country the functions of life insurance, its fundamental principles, benefits and necessities, there would develop unconsciously an increasing appreciation of the moral obligation on the part of young men to provide adequate protection for their dependent ones and their estates against the ultimate destruction of their life values, and at the same time banish forever the misunderstandings and ignorance which now prevail on the part of a vast majority of the public regarding life insurance. If life insurance were thus understood by student classes, its effect would soon be reflected through the medium of an increased volume of insurance written, reduced lapsation, fewer loans made against policies, a less number of foolish and vicious laws introduced in the several States, and a material reduction in taxation, if not the entire elimination of taxes by the several States against life insurance, save for supervision only.

Question of Conservation.

The question of conservation is also one in which there is an ever increasing interdependence between agents and policyholders, and in which the agent can be of the greatest assistance to the companies and to the Association of Life Insurance Presidents in rendering more effective their efforts toward the reduction of preventable waste and loss affecting both policyholder and company. I refer especially to conservation in its relationship to the laws of health, the enormous waste from unnecessary lapsation and surrender of insurance, and the borrowing on policies, with all of its attendant evils.

Excellent work has already been done by many of our home offices and this magnificent organization which I am addressing to-day along these several lines, but I am convinced that much additional can be done by the agents throughout the country to aid in this most important line of activity, because of their personal touch and influence with the policyholders and the insuring public.

The lapsation and surrender of insurance constitutes an appalling waste, much of which could be saved through the medium of systematic effort and education of the public, as previously outlined. The greatest contributing factor to this enormous loss and waste is undoubtedly the securing of loans on policies, which practise has increased so materially during recent years. The average loan, as we all know, is rarely liquidated by the insured prior to the maturity of the policy or its surrender, thereby resulting in decreased protection, increased cost and a constant menace to the life of the policy.

Thus I have endeavored to present briefly some of the many points involved in this ever-increasing interdependent relationship between agents and policyholders. Because of the subject's great breadth and latitude for amplification it has been impossible, however, for me to do more than refer to its principal features on this occasion.

Has Anybody Here Seen Fern?

F. O. Bristol, general agent of the New England Mutual at Los Angeles, desires to call the attention of the life insurance fraternity to a certain A. M. Fern, whom he employed some time ago as district manager for San Diego County. Mr. Bristol states that Mr. Fern has embezzled funds and that it would be to the advantage of life underwriters not to have any dealings with the individual in question. Mr. Fern sometimes writes his name A. M. Fernback, claims to be a lecturer on life insurance economics, a graduate of Heidelberg and a member of the German-British Underwriters' Association.

THE PROFESSION OF LIFE UNDERWRITER.

The Great Advantage to Be Gained by Organization Exemplified by the Strength of Numbers, Strength of Knowledge and Strength of Wisdom—A Word Picture of an Ideal Life Underwriter.

By Stewart Anderson, Editor, Literature Department, Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company.

"May his pernicious soul rot half a grain a day in hell!" This outburst is not in reference to Mr. Anderson; it is merely a quotation which he employs to express his sentiments with regard to the TWISTER. One would naturally imagine that Mr. Anderson is opinionated. He is—but in the right direction. DO NOT READ THIS ARTICLE if you want to cheat yourself.—Editor's Note.

It is obvious that he who discusses the profession of life underwriter must also speak of the life underwriter's association. And as this is the first annual banquet of the Providence association I will use a few minutes in reviewing some of the benefits that accrue to the individual underwriter and to the business through organization.

First, let me speak of the material side. Union shall be my text. In your union is strength. And strength is of three kinds—the strength of numbers, the strength of knowledge, the strength of wisdom.

The strength of numbers is obvious, and is felt in Home Offices, in the offices of insurance commissioners and in legislatures. Home Office officials are not omniscient, and they realize that you of the field, because you daily mingle with the people and discuss with them their life insurance needs, have first hand, accurate knowledge of conditions that the Home Offices have no means of acquiring except as you transmit it to them.

Progress Traced in Three Steps.

First, there is the people and their complex affairs into which life insurance is woven. Second, there are the field men, continuously mingling with the people and noting their needs. Third, there are the Home Offices, adapting life insurance contracts and rules of business to popular needs as they are described to the officials by the field men. Progress in life insurance has almost invariably traced these steps. There has been a need. Field men have discerned and reported it. And, at length, when the pressure became so strong that Home Offices were convinced that the demand came from the very life of the people, the desired extension of service or the new service was granted. Progress has not always been due, of course, to life underwriters' organizations. Sometimes it has come through individual representations made to the Home Office of a single company by a number of its representatives sufficient to indicate that they were reflecting the popular wish.

But, far more often, the agency organization of a single company has been the force which, through its company, has brought forth some new instrumentality of widespread and lasting service, which later was generally adopted. In union there was strength. And now all over the land we have the life associations, and the National Association, strong with their combined strength, discussing, debating, resolving and speaking with voice so authoritative with conscience, and knowledge, and deliberated and representative judgment, that the Home Offices are glad to listen and to accord to your organizations the status of co-operators.

This strength of numbers is respected by the commissioners also. The decision of your National Association, reached by delegates from local associations, have weight with these men who have so much power in prescribing the laws and conditions under which we work. Of very different quality are to-day's commissioners from those of a dozen years ago.

Then many of them were political spoilsmen solely. To-day they are, in the main, honest, earnest, able officials, zealous to serve the public faithfully and to treat company, solicitor and policyholder fairly. Their duties are perplexing, and their environment sometimes is maddening. Welcome to them is the influence of your National Association, for they know that it represents sanity, intelligence, soundness and breadth of view, and that it may safely be availed of in many of their legislative recommendations.

Numerical Strength Powerful.

Strength of numbers has weight in the Legislature. No one has ever credited the average legislator with life insurance knowledge so profound as to astonish the silent spirits of the vasty deep. Nor has anyone often noticed in him an attitude of sweet reasonableness. On the contrary, he will thrust his finger into the intricacies of actuarial science and defy every law of mathematics; he will valiantly frame a bill, that if enacted would demolish the whole institution of life insurance; he will ignorantly and hotly dispute propositions based upon the irrefutable evidence of unalterable conditions. The opinion of no mere individual can budge him—he is suspicious, pigheaded, cocksure. But when the influence of such a body as your National Association begins to play upon him, and the strength of united numbers of earnest, forceful, indisputably honest and evidently able men assails him and his similar comrades, he pauses and withholds his hand. In union there is strength that even a Legislature is compelled to heed.

And so I account the fruits of the strength of numbers as one of the important benefits derived from organization.

The strength of knowledge is chiefly an individual benefit, although, of course, as knowledge becomes more full in the individual it rises higher in the organization. Let me explain. When a life underwriters' association is formed there are necessarily afforded means of spreading and broadening knowledge that usually are not available to the individual. These means are chiefly two. The first is, discussion by members, at the stated meetings, of various features and problems of salesmanship and agency management and of life insurance principles and contracts and legislation. Two men may talk upon a subject, and many of its phases be untouched because not known or not thought of.

But fifty or a hundred minds simultaneously and collectively probing the same subject are likely to hold up all of its angles and faces and phases. If, however, there is no way of bringing these minds together their knowledge cannot become common property, and the several unit minds cannot become as rich in knowledge as organization would enable them to become.

Strength of Knowledge.

The strength of knowledge comes through organization in another way. When a life underwriters' association has been formed plans are made for meetings or dinners at which experts are to be the speakers. The knowledge which they bring would not always be available to the individual underwriter—it comes to him only through organization. And it is not alone the set speech or paper of the expert that is profitable, for frequently there is opportunity to publicly or privately question him.

And so, through the meeting of many minds, and through the coming of experts, the strength of knowledge is increased both in the individual underwriter and in the association as a whole, and, as a direct consequence, salesmanship is more fruitful and the public is more widely served.

The strength of wisdom is different from the strength of knowledge. You or I or any one of us may become possessed of an opinion, and we may hold to it persistently and even pugnaciously. We may have become certain that unless our view prevails in Home Offices and in legislatures ruin will befall the business. And it may not occur to us that possibly there are elements or aspects unknown to us which cause those in authority to turn a deaf ear to our representations.

But if an association exists the members will discuss the question, and in the judgment of the organization wisdom is quite apt to be found. To wisdom is accorded respect. And an organization that is respected is strong.

Organization can give you, as its fruits, strength of numbers, strength of knowledge, strength of wisdom.

Barren or Fruitful.

Please note that I say can give these fruits. I do not say that every life underwriters' association does give them. If an association is more dead than alive, because it is without leaders who lead, or because the attitude of its members is "What do I get out of it?" rather than "What can I put into it?"—if they are self men rather than serving men—if there is suspicion that the daily underwriting life of some of the members does not square with association principles and disunion results—these rich fruits will never grow upon their barren tree. Your president demanded punch of me. Here it is. I know little about your organization, but in naked English I put to you this question: "Is this association barren or is it fruitful?" If it is barren, it is because one or more essential elements of vitality are lacking. If, however, it is fruitful, and I hope and believe it is, it is because the spirit of mutual trust and service actuates a preponderant portion of your membership, both official and lay, and you give of your time and your enthusiasm and put your very souls into that giving. A price must be paid for worthwhile things, and a flourishing life underwriters' association is worth-while.

Gentlemen, Providence is a splendid city, and its name is mentioned with respect the country over. Wherefore, for the honor of your city, as well as for the honor of the great cause of life insurance, it is your duty and it should be your pride to nurture this association with work and loyalty and fraternal confidence, so that every ear shall listen and every eye become intent when the name of Providence is called in the annual convention of the National Association—Providence, the gateway of southern New England.

And now, gentlemen, we bid farewell to the life association, and I ask you to come with me and bend the knee before our high ideal. I occasionally hear a man say, "Oh, all your life agent cares for is his commission." The charge is false! For the life underwriter is an average man, and the soul of the average man is the temple of the ideal. He may almost never talk about it, he may not often think about it, he may seldom worship it. But always it holds its throne, and at times, with still small voice or shining countenance, it exacts obeisance and homage.

The Underwriter's Ideal.

We stand before the life underwriter's ideal, and in gleaming characters we see one word—Faithfulness! No ordinary faithfulness is this, but faithfulness of a peculiarly exalted type. And why exalted, why peculiarly exalted? Because men blindly entrust to our honor the welfare of the dearest things in their lives. Why do men work, why do they slave, why do they often wear out and die before their time? For the sake of a woman and little children.

The man at the carpenter's bench and the president of the great corporation alike go forth in the morning from the presence of a woman and from the divine kisses of little children. They are ministers of the holiest emotion of the human heart—love! And, commanded by their love, each blindly trusts the life underwriter to give him a life insurance contract that shall be the most effective instrument for guarding this dear woman and those little ones, after his death, from want and hardship and misery. Each blindly trusts the life underwriter. Blindly trusts him because comparatively few purchasers really understand a life insurance policy, with its various complex conditions and the many elements that enter into judgment of its quality and adaptability to a specific need.

A man is put upon honor when he is trusted with an ordinary task. When he is blindly trusted with an unusual task, honor demands of him faithfulness of a peculiar type. But when he, the life underwriter, is blindly trusted to guard the helpless, sacred wards of a life that death may overthrow, a peculiarly exalted type of faithfulness is honor's clear command.

If the life underwriter holds to his ideal, what will be his course? He will deal truly with his customers. He will compete fairly with his brother-workers. He will be honest with his company. Just for a handful of silver he will not smutch his own soul. He will not knowingly sell a life policy to a man who ought to have an endowment. He will not place a life or an endowment policy with a man who he knows full well cannot pay the next premium—he will not so defraud the man, he will not so defraud the company, he will not so wrong his own integrity.

Twisting Policies.

Holding to his high ideal, he will not like a parasitic leech, or, rather, like a plain thief, twist a policy that ought not to have been touched—he will not thus wrong the insured, he will not thus filch from, pilfer from and rob his competitor of renewals that had been fairly earned. (I never think of a twister but I think also of Emilia's wish concerning Iago—"May his pernicious soul rot half a grain a day in hell!")

He will not rebate. He will obey the law of his State. He will respect his company's rule. He will not shame the name of underwriter and heap contempt upon a principle of every life underwriters' association, by giving away his wage in order that a brother worker shall be prevented from earning the reasonable wage of honest labor. The rebater is a traitor in the field and a destroyer of that free and equal competition without which the talk of "brotherly co-operation" and "noble calling" and "sacred trust" is the hypocritical piffle of the whited sepulcher.

He will not lie about his competitor's policy or company practices. He will not give false meanings to statements in his competitor's literature. He will not scheme to fasten a shady risk upon his own or any other company.

In brief, with his ideal dominant in him, he cannot defraud the man whose trust he asks; he cannot wrong his fellow-worker; he cannot be false to his company; he cannot later, when claim-paying comes, "dig a pit for the widow and fatherless."

Trusted Once; Trusted Always.

I have described some of the things that he who exemplifies the life underwriter's ideal of a peculiarly exalted type of faithfulness will not, cannot do. And now, in closing, let me exhibit the portrait of such a man. His countenance is so stamped with indubitable honor that men who have trusted him once trust him always. He becomes their life insurance counsellor, held in as high esteem as their legal adviser, physician, minister or priest. They tell him their family circumstances; they confide in him their business hopes and fears and plans and ambitions. His word is a life insurance lamp unto their feet, and false lights cannot lure them from him.

His company's confidence in him is never shaken, and to new and younger agents he is pointed out as an example. He is a busy man, but his work is directed by educated intelligence—it is not "mere sound and fury, signifying nothing." His heart is warm, because he believes that in this world the good is supreme, and that the life of service is the only profitable life.

He uses the language of courtesy, of kindness, of praise, when speaking of other honorable men who, like himself, are earning an honorable living. His motto is, "Live, and let live." He obeys the law. He does all that is in his power to advance the honor and the prestige of his profession, both by his private and professional conduct and by co-operating with his fellow-agents. In fine, if you look upon him for but a moment you will be compelled to see that brains, heart, and conscience, have conjoined to make of him the ideal life underwriter, and you will instantly discern that he has heeded the immortal declarations: "To thine own self be true, and it must follow, as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man."

Not in idolatry do we bow the knees to worthy ideals. If it be true that in this universe there is but one source of good, then when we as life underwriters invite into our secret hearts, or publicly set up in our associational life an ideal which followed would widen far the sway of trust and truth and love among men, we become consecrated instruments of the progress of mankind toward that One, far-off, divine event, to which the whole creation moves.

PLANS OF NATIONAL COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND CONSERVATION TAKE DEFINITE FORM.

General Agents and Managers to Be Requested to Contribute to Fund, and Text-book to Be Published with Dr. S. S. Huebner as Editor.

While little has been given out for publication lately with regard to the plans of the National Committee on Education and Conservation, quiet but nevertheless effective work has been done. A conference was held on the 17th of last month and on the 4th inst. representatives from the Executive Council and Committee on Education and Conservation met at the Bellevue-Stratford in Philadelphia. At this meeting final and definite action was taken with regard to the form of preliminary letter and pledge as submitted by Warren M. Horner, chairman of the Committee on Education and Conservation.

In accordance with a resolution passed at the meeting of the Executive Council in Pittsburgh, this letter and pledge will be mailed in a few days to managers, superintendents and general agents who are members of local associations. Prominent solicitors who are large personal producers will also be included. The letter and pledge will be issued from the office of the National Association at 56 Pine street, New York City, but the pledges are to be returned to Mr. Horner.

It was decided at this meeting that Dr. S. Huebner, professor of life insurance of the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce of the University of Pennsylvania, be selected by the National Association as editor of its proposed textbook on life insurance. D. Appleton & Co., of New York, will be awarded the contract for publication. It is announced that highly satisfactory arrangements have been made with Dr. Huebner and the Appleton Company.

Entire financial responsibility for the publication of the book will be assumed by the Appleton Company. The volume will approximate 200,000 words, or about 550 pages, and will be prepared in the same form as Dr. Huebner's recent book on Property Insurance. In order to have the book off the press by the latter part of September, 1914, Dr. Huebner will spend the entire summer of 1914 on the work. This will naturally be in addition to the correspondence and preliminary work which will be necessary this winter.

THE PACIFIC COAST MEMBERSHIP TROPHY.

Four Prominent Life Underwriters Donate Cup to Stimulate Increase in Membership of Pacific Coast Local Associations.

When William L. Hathaway, of San Francisco; Hubert H. Ward, of Portland, Ore.; National Vice-President John N. Russell, Jr., of Los Angeles, and William D. Mead, of Seattle, went back to the Pacific Coast from the Atlantic City convention, they collaborated on the best means to increase the membership of the five local associations located in the Far West, with headquarters, respectively, in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Tacoma and Seattle.

It was finally decided to purchase a trophy to be awarded on the basis of the greatest increase in membership. C. I. D. Moore, secretary of the Pacific Mutual at Los Angeles; George B. Scott, assistant secretary of the Metropolitan Life at San Francisco, and S. P. Lockwood, vice-president of the Columbia Life & Trust Company at Portland, Ore., consented to serve upon the committee which would formulate rules governing the award. The terms of the contest have not as yet been formally announced, but in all probability they will provide for the winning of the trophy by that Pacific Coast association making the greatest increase in membership in a six months' period, with permanent possession of the trophy as a result of three consecutive awards. The first period of the contest is to consist of the months of November and December, 1913.

The cup was first on exhibition at the November meeting of the Los Angeles association, and was then sent on for inspection to the other Coast associations.

SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ASSOCIATION OF LIFE INSURANCE PRESIDENTS.

Company Executives Discuss Important Problems in Connection with the Response of Life Insurance to Present Economic Needs—The Field Represented by Ernest J. Clark, President of the National Association—L. Goldman, Managing Director, North American Life, Springs Surprise at Final Session.

That life insurance responds to various economic needs of the present day was fully demonstrated by a score of brilliant and authoritative speakers at the seventh annual meeting of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents. Indeed, this theme and the interdependence existing between the many phases of the business were the two general subjects which sounded the dominant notes of the gathering.

It developed with apparent unconscious intention on the part of the speakers, that life insurance is equipped to furnish an adequate and satisfying response to many economic, social and moral ailments of the twentieth century, but while as an institution, its potentialities were almost omnipotent, it served but a limited sphere when its remedial administrations were considered with regard to the ratio of policyholders to the population of the country.

The potentialities of the institution have of late years seldom been questioned, but its development and the application of its powers have depended upon the activity of its field representatives. Therefore, it was a happy thought, although in the nature of a complete surprise, when L. Goldman, managing director of the North American Life of Toronto, furnished the connecting link between a scholarly discussion of causes and effects and the practical application of resultant benefits directed to the policyholder.

The Barb to the Shaft.

Thus at the conclusion of an illuminating and exhaustive symposium of principles and possibilities as viewed from the Home Office, Mr. Goldman offered an immeasurably valuable suggestion pointing the way to make effective all that had preceded, by urging the company officials to support the proposed campaign of education and conservation of the National Association of Life Underwriters.

Much to our regret space limitations will not permit a full account of the meeting. Therefore, will follow but a brief review of the salient points brought out in the addresses and discussions. The meeting was held on the 11th and 12th insts., at the Hotel Astor, New York City, with George E. Ide, president of the Home Life of New York, presiding as chairman. Mr. Ide referred to the constructive work of the association and the necessity of devoting much time and labor in restraining unwise action and checking legislation inimicable to the policyholder. He claimed that it was practically impossible for each company acting independently to create a sound and friendly attitude of the public mind toward Life Insurance and laid considerable stress on the necessity of breaking down local prejudice and sectional jealousy.

Mr. Ide then introduced Hon. William A. Day, president of the Equitable Life Assurance Society. Mr. Day spoke on "Group Insurance—Its Aims and Its Field." The speaker brought out many interesting points and as to the safety of the plan said, in part:

"It has frequently been stated that a company could afford to accept any one thousand persons that pass a given street corner in the business center of any of our large cities on a working day and obtain from these lives a favorable mortality experience. It is reasoned that a thousand lives engaged actively in daily pursuits should give a fair average and naturally would not include many seriously impaired lives, if any. There would be an absence of moral hazard, as it is reasonable to assume that such a selection would be free of fraud and speculation.

"Sufficient time has not elapsed since the inauguration of group insurance on which to predicate final judgment on all details, but it can be said that up to the present the theory indicated has been substantiated in practice; namely, that the mortality in group insurance is a superstandard mortality. Thus, in insuring the employes of one establishment, an excellent selection is obtained without medical examination. The expense of soliciting the individuals and of medical reports is eliminated. Administrative economies also are effected, such as the issuance of one group policy instead of individual policies; savings in premium notices and postage, and by the use of the negative system of accounting."

The next speaker was Sylvester C. Dunham, president of the Travelers Insurance Company. Mr. Dunham's subject was "Conservation of Policy Proceeds." Reference was made to the fact that millions of persons, many of whom are beneficiaries of life insurance policies, are tempted by means of circulars sent through the mails to invest in "land enterprises in the desert or under water, oil wells and mines in regions where there is neither oil nor minerals within a hundred miles." Continuing, he said:

Fraudulent Schemes.

"The extent of the mischief that should be prevented must be a matter of estimate because the only available statistics are those based upon the prosecution of parties making fraudulent use of the mails. From a recent department publication it appears that in one year 529 persons were indicted; 497 arrested; 184 convicted; 12 acquitted; 177 awaiting trial; that 46 are fugitives from justice, and that 3 died before trial. It has been further ascertained by the postoffice authorities that the proprietors of fraudulent schemes, put out of business during the year, have obtained from the public no less than $77,000,000.

"But this does not begin to set forth the extent of the evil. It covers only those cases that come to the attention of the department, presumably upon the complaint of victims, and of those only such as presented evidence that furnished hope of conviction. Many more were not detected and a still greater number carry on their trade so adroitly and under such advice, purchased from unscrupulous lawyers, that they escape the clutches of the law. It would be moderate, I presume, to multiply by ten the losses of $77,000,000 traced by the Postoffice Department."

As a solution to the problem, Mr. Dunham called the attention of his audience to the forms of insurance payable at stated intervals for the life of the beneficiary.

Borrowing Dangerous.

Arthur E. Childs, president of the Columbian National Life Insurance Company, delivered a scholarly address on "The Ultimate Effect of an Unrestricted Right to Borrow on Life Insurance Policies." He considered his subject from three standpoints—from the legal standpoint, from the moral standpoint and from the standpoint of the best interests of the insuring public. According to the speaker, the law at the present time substantiates the present view of insurance and the fact that the law is the result of the present public viewpoint impressed him as an encouraging feature, in that if the public views on the subject should be changed then company officials can have hope of a modification of the legal status of the matter. In the course of the speaker's remarks it developed that out of every one hundred people who borrow on their policies less than ten ever repay the loan. Mr. Childs scored a strong point when he made the following declaration:

"Most of our companies are comparatively young, but the time will come when we will be old, when the percentage of new business to old business will of necessity be comparatively small. If a company when this time comes finds itself with a large proportion of its assets invested in policy loans

The Local Associations.

At the Atlantic City Convention there was a discussion on "Local Associations." In the symposium which resulted under this general subject the speakers took into consideration the reason for local bodies, individual responsibility of membership, the most effective forms of programs and the question of a non-resident class of members. This particular feature of the Conventions' program was wonderfully prolific with sound advice based on extended experience. Many excellent suggestions as to the practical management of local associations were put forth. But because of two other discussions, both of which were of tremendous and vital importance, the discussion to which we have made specific reference, was to a considerable degree overshadowed.

If the family is the foundation of the nation, certainly the local association bears a similar relation to the National Association. The conditions of local bodies are always reflected in the deliberations of, and consequent actions proposed by the National organization. It is unfortunate, but nevertheless true, that not all local associations are progressive, and some are not even fairly active. At every National Convention there are always a number of associations which have not a single representative on the floor.

If it is true that the spirit displayed in a local association not only makes Life Insurance history, so far as its particular locality is concerned, but either assists or embarrasses the National Association, it behooves us to give our attention to two practical aspects of association activity which frequently are "the root of all evil."

The history of the National Association proves that it sometimes requires years of arduous missionary work to build up a local association so that its individual members will be inculcated with a proper and just appreciation of what the association movement represents. Generally this is the work of a few stalwart spirits who, for a time at least, are ethically in advance of prevailing opinions and practises. And in the work of these pioneers lies a great secret as to the ultimate results which will accrue.

An efficient local association does not spring into existence in a day or a year. The true association spirit is not engendered by spontaneous combustion, but comes as a result of careful and painstaking education as to the ethics of the profession. Most men, at first, see "nothing in it," and it takes time and a great amount of personal effort on the part of a faithful few to convince these men to the contrary. But in this respect the association spirit is generally cumulative, and the largest and most successful local associations of this day are those in which the founders and charter members have not lost interest, but, on the other hand, stand by ready to assist in every manner possible.

A reversal of these conditions is nearly always fatal to the life of an association. Show us an association where a president serves out his term and then steps to the rear ranks, apparently losing all active interest in the organization, never encouraging, but frequently criticizing his successor, and we will show you an association headed for the rocks. There are such associations as these, and the general rule seems to be, if we might put in words the attitude of former presidents and other officers to the present president and other officers: "I have had a hard time during my administration, but I'm through now. Let this poor fellow fight it out alone." Such conditions exist, although they are fundamentally opposed to the true association spirit.

To build up a local association to its maximum strength it is absolutely necessary for former officers to take an active interest in the affairs of the organization. A tactful suggestion or hint to your successor or your successors's successor may be more valuable than you would think possible. Certainly you learned some things during your administration which the present administration should know, and it is your duty to make your experience valuable by passing it on to one who will doubtless thank you for it. Team work often works out well in the actual solicitation of business, and it is safe to assert that no association can flourish without it.

There is another situation which occasionally arises in connection with local associations; one which has doubtless caused more dissatisfaction and internal dissension than any other; an unwise selection of officers and members of the executive committee. One might compare a life underwriters' association with a local branch of a labor union. It is not always the efficient workman who is elected as an officer of a labor union. Perhaps more often than we know a proclivity to politics, or just a plain "gift of gab," has been responsible for the elevation of an illiterate bricklayer to a walking delegate of a labor union. Just so it is not always the most efficient life underwriter who is elected to fill the responsible offices of the association. Politics are sometimes permitted to enter, and the standing of the local body with the National Association, as well as the standing of the local body with the insuring public of the locality in which it is situated is vicariously sacrificed.

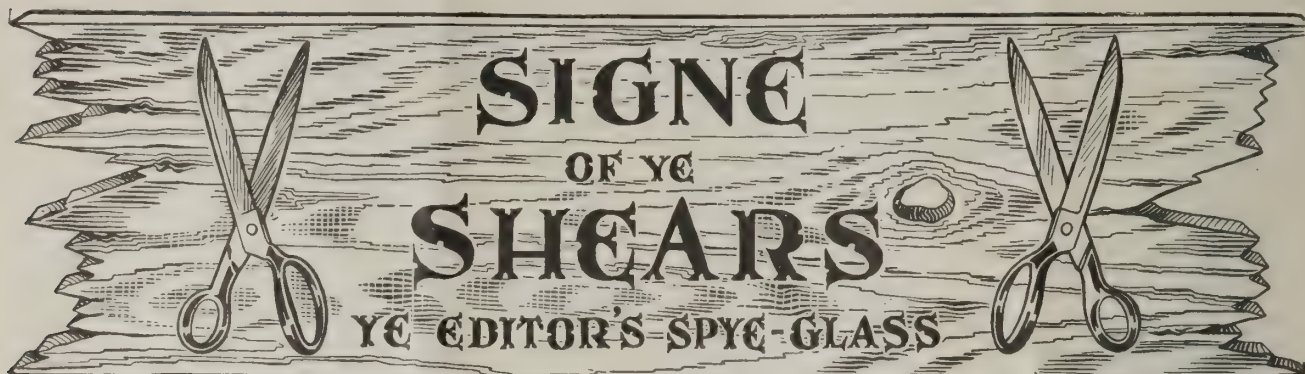

It is natural that an officer of a local association—particularly a president—will, through the medium of the daily press, receive more or less gratuitous and favorable publicity, but the publicity which will be given to the association will be tempered by the reputation of its president as it is observed by the people of the city in which the local body is located. Members of organizations affiliated with the National Association should, in justice to themselves and to their associations, eliminate from official recognition the aspiring member whose object is personal aggrandizement through the capitalization of newspaper publicity. Thoroughly unselfish effort is the solution of the problem of maintaining a live, aggressive association.

All things considered, local bodies in electing officers, would do well to take into account whether or not a candidate's company is willing to endorse him as to his business principles and as to the volume and quality of the business he places on the books.

The State Life Fund of Wisconsin.

State life insurance is now in operation in Wisconsin, the first policies being issued on Oct. 20. The scheme is known as the State Life Fund of Wisconsin. J. W. Ferguson, Insurance Commissioner of Oregon, is strenuously advocating a similar plan for his home State, and recently the Ohio Federation of Labor adopted a resolution in favor of the establishment of a life insurance department by the State, where all kinds of insurance contracts might be secured.

The principle facts in connection with the Life Fund of Wisconsin are these: Seven forms of policies are at present issued, and of the 200 applications received, one-half were made by the class of 1913 of the University of Wisconsin to establish a loan fund. No policies for more than $1,000 are at present issued, and the premiums are no lower than those of old line companies, except on a few forms. No paid agents will be employed, but applications will be received by the officials of towns and cities, officers of banks which receive State deposits, and by State factory inspectors. However, the law permits the person transmitting the applications to retain 25 cents for each application and a fee of one per cent. on the amount of the premium. Persons submitting applications are not required to take out a license.

And Herman L. Ekern, Insurance Commissioner of Wisconsin, is responsible for the travesty.

An editorial in the Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin declares: "Those responsible for the State life insurance had have engrafted an excrescence on the body of government."

To the life underwriters the working of the Wisconsin scheme will be a matter of deep interest, not from fear that it or any analogous schemes which may be tried by other States will make serious inroads on the business of private companies immediately, but rather to note if, with all the power at its command, and with all the available facilities at its back, the State can devise improvements on present methods and carry life insurance development along a higher plane than that on which private enterprise has placed it.

Life underwriters will also look keenly, as will company officials, at what sort of administration the State will give its own insurance affairs. From the viewpoints of efficiency and economy any State administration starts under a cloud of suspicion from the very nature of our political system, and our habit of choosing our administrators by the test of "pull" rather than by the gauge of ability for the specific work to be done. That there are plenty of brainy men in officialdom will be readily admitted, but the vast majority of those selected for public duties are not the best to be had, nor even fairly competent to meet the demands of the positions they manage to push themselves into. We have evidence of this all over the country, and unless in State insurance there is radical departure from present political practise it will be maladministered.

The application of the science of insurance is a peculiarly delicate work and calls for the trained adept, the man born with the particular faculties needed and with those faculties trained to a nicety. We can scarcely look for such men to be employed under a political system where efficiency is possible to secure, but is not made the prime and ultimate test.

It is useless to take data from the administration of public utilities in Europe, where selections of men for governmental work is differently conducted and where conditions are as foreign to us as the countries themselves. Such data are inapplicable. Accepting affairs as we have them, and there are no indications of any coming change, the widening of the scope of government service for the people gives no promise of either added efficiency or economy. The indications are all the other way.

There is this consolation, however, that here an unwise extension of the government control of public utilities is after all subject to popular judgment, and an experiment which proves wasteful or is allowed to lapse into a refuge for the political parasite may be abandoned and allowed to revert to the management of those who know how to operate it to the best advantage generally.

Fraternal Insurance and the Proposed Campaign of Education and Conservation.

"What will the leaders and managers of fraternal insurance societies in this country think—when from the pages of their morning paper and their magazines there suddenly confronts them a series of bold, ingeniously worded, peculiarly alluring advertisements aggressively setting forth all of the benefits of old-line insurance, and belittling the fraternal system by insinuation and innuendo?"

What is the answer? W. G. Critchlow, Supreme Commander-General, The International Liberty Union of the World, has propounded this question in a communication appearing in a recent number of The Fraternal Monitor.

Mr. Critchlow has many good ideas—good in that they furnish us with a score of excellent arguments as to the benefits which would accrue to legal reserve life insurance in the proposed country-wide campaign of institutional advertising. He is, of course, needlessly apprehensive as to the purpose of the educational and conservation plans now under consideration by the National Association, as they relate to the fraternal system of insurance. The project is not to KNOCK fraternal insurance, but to BOOST legal reserve life insurance. Legal reserve life insurance will be perfectly willing to let the public—the enlightened public—decide as to the relative merits of the two plans of insurance.

"They (the fraternal insurance societies) will be prompt to act and defend their interests," says Mr. Critchlow. "But then it will be too late. For it will have taken much time and expense to have developed this system of advertising old-line insurance to that present condition, and the campaign will then be in progress, properly financed and officered. Before its effect could be in any way nullified the fraternal system of insurance would be blackened and vilified by crafty managers throughout the length and breadth of this land.

"Hundreds of thousands of fraternalists use Uneeda Biscuits—Why? Because of the great power of continual attractive advertising."

"It floats—99 and 44.100% pure"—Why do we use Ivory Soap? Why not any one of a dozen more kinds for sale in every grocery and drug store? Because of the great power of advertising conducted by brainy men with plenty of money, who know the science of making the people believe what they themselves believe.

"Why is Mennen's Talcum better than twenty-five or thirty other kinds? I say it isn't—yet this man Mennen has, within a comparatively few years, risen from a poor, obscure druggist to that of a millionaire many times. All through the power of advertising, by keen, brainy advertising men who know the HOW and WHY, and WHEN to so conduct their advertising as to make the people believe what they want them to believe.

"I could go on with these illustrations indefinitely, but it is not necessary. The same basic process and science that advertising has used in other fields of endeavor is NOW GOING TO BE APPLIED TO THE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

"The old-line insurance forces are this very minute marshalling their power, organizing it into a cohesive organization for the purpose of financing and conducting a nation-wide advertising campaign of old-line insurance. I am in a position to say that enough power is now behind the movement to warrant the assumption that the campaign will be carried out in its entirety and on a gigantic scale."

Now, here is where Mr. Critchlow gets down to brass tacks, for in the following paragraph is found the gist of the entire subject:

"And mark well this: Once the life insurance business is put into advertising in the proper way, backed by the right amount of money, handled by the keenest and brainiest advertising salesmen in the country—IT WILL BE THERE "FOR KEEPS." Any product to be sold to the people, when properly advertised and handled, is at once so successful that the plan of presenting it through advertising is permanently adhered to."

Life Insurance and the Public Schools.

Early in the present year four members of the Richmond association delivered lectures on Life Insurance before the students of the Richmond High School, and there is considerable evidence to prove that the course was not without its benefits. A few days ago one of the solicitors of former National President Neil D. Sills came in and told that gentleman that he had been interviewing a certain man as to the advisability of taking out some life insurance. After the solicitor had finished his conversation, a boy of about sixteen years of age, who was employed in the office, began to question him about life insurance. To the surprise of the solicitor, the youth possessed more knowledge concerning the business than would be reasonable to expect.

The agent, who was quite unaccustomed to meeting anyone even of more advanced years so well informed on the business, asked the lad where he had obtained his information, and he replied: "I attended High School last session and we had some talks up there on Life Insurance."

Mr. Sills considers this simple incident a strong endorsement of the benefits of educational work, particularly in high schools. Vocational training in the public schools of this country will undoubtedly in time to come be given greater consideration than at present. Although many of the local associations have established courses of lectures in High Schools, there is a wide field open for a concerted and systematic campaign along these lines.

Surprising results have been obtained in courses of vocational training which have not included Life Insurance. An interesting example of what may be accomplished, and one, too, which will impress members of the National Association interested in the education and conservation movement, will be found in the movement on the part of many prominent department store owners in various parts of the country to have courses in vocational training, including salesmanship, instituted in the public schools.

This was recently brought to light in a report submitted to the Board of Directors of the National Retail Dry Goods Association. The report was made by Miss Elizabeth Gannon and was in connection with the Union School of Salesmanship in Boston.

This school was founded in 1905 by Mrs. Lucinda W. Prince, and is now carried on jointly by the Women's Educational and Industrial Union and Simmons College. The success of the school is indicated by the fact that store officials testify frequently that the girls who attend the courses sell more goods in their afternoon at the store than do the others during the entire day. Last winter a canvas was made to ascertain whether or not the school was of benefit to those who attended and 145 of the 195 girls questioned stated that they had received advances within the year. Fourteen of them held executive positions paying from nine to twenty-five dollars a week.

We have been informed that through this school, and the teachers it trains in its normal course, the general teaching of salesmanship in the public schools seems to be in sight. At the present time such courses are offered in Buffalo, Cincinnati, Los Angeles and in Boston. All of which demonstrates beyond the possibility of doubt that vocational training in Life Insurance in the public schools is far from being an impossibility and that the opportunities for developing such courses are many.

What the Magazines and Newspapers Are Doing.

One would imagine in glancing through the daily newspapers and magazines issued prior to the holiday season that the people of the country had suddenly gone book mad. Mountains of volumes in the department stores lend additional support to your belief. Many thousand books are sold yearly, but the number of people who buy books other than novels is comparatively small. Assure a publishing house of a positive disposal of even five thousand copies of a book selling at $1.50 and the publishers will gladly take the contract.

Therefore, it is reasonable to assume that the appearance of a number of books within a year on any given subject does not necessarily prove a popular interest in the subject discussed. According to Algernon Lee, Educational Director of the Rand School of Social Science, the contents of the fifteen-cent monthly magazines is perhaps the best barometer of public opinion in the United States. Mr. Lee values the influence of the monthly magazines very highly, for he said recently:

Everybody buys daily newspapers, and no one reads more than a small part of what is in them. The daily editor's rule must be that, if a subject commands the attention of even a small fraction of his local public, it deserves at least a little space. But the monthly magazine is neither a necessity of life for all nor a luxury for the few. In order to live, the magazine must sell in the hundreds of thousands. In order to sell, it must be "live" from cover to cover. Each month's contents determine the next month's sales. The reader wants the full value of his fifteen cents, and something more. He is a capacious critic. Like Marie Bashkirtseff, "he dislikes the things that he dislikes more than he likes the things that he likes." The magazine editor, accordingly, eager as he is to have positively attractive "features," is still more intensely fearful of putting in a single article that will offend or fail to interest even a minority of his readers.

Keeping this expert opinion in mind, the members of the National Association have every reason to congratulate themselves on the attitude of several of the well-known monthly and weekly magazines. Collier's has for some time past devoted considerably space to valuable matter on Life Insurance. McClure's, Harper's, The Independent, The Outlook, Leslie's and System have all taken up various phases of the business under intelligent and sympathetic direction. Indeed, it is possible now to look forward to the day when Life Insurance will be one of the real problems of popular discussion.

The daily and Sunday newspapers are also doing the cause an inestimable amount of good. The Philadelphia Evening Telegraph has been publishing an excellent series of articles, calling attention to the necessity of life insurance, forcefully pointing its stories with apt and practical illustrations. The St. Louis Republic, in its financial department, is weekly publishing educational articles, written by William King, secretary of the St. Louis Association. Mr. King's stories are for the layman, and he has successfully endeavored to tell certain fundamental truths simply and without confusing technicalities.

Among the other newspapers which are evidently willing to give space to news stories and to make editorial reference to Life Insurance are: The Pittsburgh Dispatch, The Chattanooga News, Harrisburgh Telegraph, New York Times, Omaha Bee, Chicago Daily News, Gardner (Mass.) News and Merrill (Wis.) Herald.

and there is added to this the least suspicion against the integrity of the institution itself, it would have to face an exceedingly difficult and embarrassing situation."

In concluding his remarks, Mr. Childs said in part:

"How then are we to thus educate the public?"

"In the first place we can do this by making the loan a real loan, a promise to pay at a definite time. Such an obligation will impress upon the borrower the necessity of repaying his loan.

"The experience in my company with premium notes, which are personal obligations, has been very satisfactory, and I feel that we can get the same result by making policy loans personal obligations.

"In the second place, these personal obligations should be made with a promise to pay at a definite time and thus take their place in the financial world with other personal obligations adequately secured. Let the rate charged depend upon the price of money in the particular locality and for the definite time the loan has to run. The ever-present economic play of money finding its level will prevent such a method from working any hardship upon the borrowing policyholders.

"In the third place we should improve the character of the service which we are furnishing the public through our agents."

Life Insurance and Business.

George I. Cochran, president of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, followed Mr. Childs and discussed "Life Insurance as an Aid to Business." The speaker deplored the socialistic tendency which existed to a greater or less degree in various communities and based his hopes on the prosperity of the country on the American business man. He advocated the doctrine of developing a hard working, saving and industrious people. He praised the gospel of thrift and claimed that an attitude other than this would mean inevitable ruin and universal poverty. "The theory of insurance," said Mr. Cochran, "is to so spread the risk that in case of loss by any one individual a very small contribution from all the others (in fact, so small that it does not materially affect them) makes good the loss sustained by the aforesaid individual. This is the same theory which civilization is trying to apply to all the affairs of life, with the hope that in due time all of the ills and misery of the whole world will thus be alleviated."

His address was to a large extent devoted to life insurance as a protection for business interests rather than a protection to the family.

Henry Moir, actuary of the Home Life Insurance Company of New York, was the last speaker at the morning session, his subject being, "Disability Benefits—Insuring Insurance." In elucidating disability benefits, Mr. Moir claimed that it was just as sensible a provision in a life insurance policy that premiums should cease with a loss of activity as it is that premiums cease after a fixed and limited sum of years. Basing his arguments on this premise, the speaker developed his theme with a keen insight of the business. He took exception to the statement which is made by some companies that no extra premium is charged for disability benefits, and called attention to the fact that 110 out of 161 companies reported that no extra premium is charged. "The premiums in common use," said Mr. Moir, "for participating life policies generally contain a sufficient margin to cover the cost of this disability feature; and it may be legitimate to treat the cost as a deduction from the dividends which may be earned; but it is clearly and grossly wrong to try to impose upon the public the idea that something is being given for nothing."

Federal Supervision.

Hon. Burton Mansfield, Insurance Commissioner of Connecticut, was the first speaker at the afternoon session. He made a remarkably strong plea for federal supervision and told what this would mean to policyholders. In tracing the growth of opinion in favor of national supervision, the speaker, of course, found it necessary to frequently refer to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Paul vs. Virginia, in which decision the Supreme Court refused to construe insurance as commerce. Reference was made to the fact that when the State of Massachusetts established its insurance department and placed it in care of Elizur Wright, that gentleman declared himself to be an advocate of federal supervision. The Insurance Commissioner of Connecticut in his report of 1865 also advocated the organization of a National Bureau. Coming nearer the present time, Mr. Mansfield said that in 1905 President Roosevelt suggested an inquiry into the constitutional right of Congress to regulate the matter, and the American Bar Association and other organizations of trade had declared themselves strongly in favor of federal supervision.

As to the future possibilities, the speaker made two suggestions. One was an amendment to the constitution and the other was that the Supreme Court might part from its previous decision.

Mr. Mansfield's opinion as to what would constitute ideal supervision was in part as follows:

Ideal Supervision.

"The ideal method of supervision, it seems to me, would be a system organized and controlled by the general government, with one superintendent at its head and with as large a force of assistants as would be necessary to supervise thoroughly and well all insurance companies, corporations and associations, doing business in the United States, outside of the State of their incorporation. Such a system should be on a larger and more efficient foundation than the supervision of the national banks is to-day. If necessary, subordinate offices should be opened and operated in important cities, such as Boston (I would prefer Hartford), New York, New Orleans, Chicago, Denver and San Francisco."

Chairman Ide, at the conclusion of Mr. Mansfield's address, introduced Hon. William P. White, Canadian Minister of Finance, who extended felicitations and spoke briefly of insurance conditions in Canada.

Dr. Rupert Blue, Surgeon General, United States Public Health Service, was one of the speakers at this session and discussed "Conservation of Lives—Essential Health Reforms Needed by the Average Community." The medical fraternity was also represented by Dr. Victor C. Vaughan, dean Department of Medicine and Surgery, University of Michigan, and president of the American Medical Association. In summing up his remarks Dr. Blue stated that the most needed reforms in public health administration were a higher degree of co-operation between public officials, the employment of full time workers, the establishment of laboratories, the accurate collection of vital statistics and the appropriation of sufficient funds for the accomplishment of these things.

Dr. Vaughan's address bore the caption "The Doctor's Dream" and aside from the information conveyed it was interesting because of its novel treatment.

The star feature of the afternoon session was the address of Hon. William H. Taft, ex-President of the United States. Mr. Taft's remarks were informal in character. Having overheard a portion of Commissioner Mansfield's address, Mr. Taft took occasion to give his opinion as to the possibilities of federal supervision, saying in part:

Hon. William H. Taft Speaks.

"The Supreme Court says you are not engaged in interstate commerce—negotiations which go on between your agents and the gentlemen who contribute to your capital are not across State lines; they are conducted right in his office; at least that is my experience. It may be we could have an office like the Agricultural Department or like the Educational Department, an office of research and of suggestion and for the making of standards and if your companies would like to have the agents of the federal government examine you all and report their judgment on that subject, I don't know that there is any reason why, if Congress is willing to appropriate the money, it should not be done. That is the proper office of the Educational Bureau in Washington, but up to this time they have not had the money with which to make the necessary examinations as to education in each State and to introduce a standard to give the people of the State some knowledge as to how their money is being expended, and therefore the Bureau of Education is not fulfilling all the functions that it might fulfil under the federal government. Of course, there can be no direct control by the federal government of education any more than there can be of insurance; but I doubt not that an office of that sort—we have no control—excuse me—the habit of getting into the first person, plural or singular, has not left me as yet. I was about to say that in the Agricultural Department there is no real jurisdiction of a direct character over the farmers of the country, but the information which the Agricultural Department furnishes is so valuable that it does exercise a very considerable control; but it is only, properly speaking, a department of research and of the giving of information."

The Medical Fraternity.

At the morning session of the second day, William T. Sedgwick, professor of biology and public health, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, gave further emphasis to the movement for the conservation of health, by delivering an address on "The Public Health Movement—To-day and To-morrow." In concluding his remarks he claimed that in all probability many a company had been saved from ruin by the increase in longevity brought about through the public health movement of to-day.

Frederic W. Jenkins, president of the Security Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Binghamton, N. Y., then delivered his report as chairman of the Health Committee of the association, after which the session was thrown open to a general discussion with the understanding that no speech should exceed a ten minute limit. Chairman Ide invited those present to discuss policy loans, group insurance, business insurance, disability benefits, or any other question which had been discussed at previous sessions. The Home Office was well represented, and Julian S. Myrick, chairman of the Executive Committee of the Life Underwriters Association of New York, represented the field by discussing life insurance as an aid to business, making particular reference to the small individual employer who runs a moderately large business.

At the afternoon session, Hon. James R. Young, president of the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners, and Commissioner of Insurance for North Carolina, took up the question of the interdependence between Life Insurance and the State. Mr. Young was followed by Henry Abels, secretary of the Franklin Life Insurance Company and president of the American Life Convention, who discussed the interdependent relationship existing between life insurance companies.

The third speaker in the trilogy of interdependent relationship was Ernest J. Clark, president of the National Association of Life Underwriters. Mr. Clark's subject was "The Relationship Between the Agents and Policyholders." The full text of Mr. Clark's speech will be found elsewhere in this number.

L. Goldman Springs Surprise.

As stated in our introductory paragraphs, L. Goldman at the conclusion of the meeting expressed his views of the proposed campaign of education and conservation of the National Association of Life Underwriters. Mr. Goldman said in part:

"I was very much interested in the gentlemen who were talking about educational propaganda among the young people. That is very important, but I think also that the insurance companies can do something in that direction themselves. The National Association of Life Underwriters, also the Association of Life Underwriters of Canada, have brought this subject to the attention of the executive officers. I fear they have not received very much encouragement from the powers that be on this side of the line. They have received some little encouragement from the powers that be in Canada; it is with regard to the advertising propaganda. The opinion is felt and has been expressed, and I agree with it, that there is an immense amount of money wasted by life insurance companies in the form of advertising that has been carried on for a number of years. A company will advertise its name, or one or two of its executive officers. Also the enormous assets they have, a large surplus—that conveys nothing to the ordinary reader. It would not to me, if I was not an insurance man, and I think if the companies seriously consider the subject and joined together in an educational propaganda to bring before the people in some form, as one or two companies have endeavored to do, the importance of this subject, I believe it would be of great assistance to our agents."

Favorable Consideration Suggested.

"Take for instance, in some distant parts of the country, where the people have a newspaper once a week. They read that through from beginning to end, even the patent medicines, hair restorers, and all that sort of thing. Now, if you had good reading matter, good common sense reading matter, some important thing that occurred lately, and we have them repeatedly, to bring before the people, I believe they would read it, and when the insurance agent came along, the ground will be prepared for him. It would have been sown and he would have had a chance to reap the crop. Now, the agent, the man behind the gun, the men who are being worked on the ground, know the evils that agitate the people, and I should be very glad if the executive officers of the company would give it their favorable consideration, as I have done."

At the executive session, held on the afternoon of Dec. 11, officers were re-elected for the ensuing year as follows:

Robert Lynn Cox, general counsel and manager; Alfred Hurrell, attorney; John J. Brinkerhoff, actuary.

The following executive committee was re-elected:

Robert Lynn Cox, chairman; Jesse R. Clark, of Cincinnati, O.; Forrest F. Dryden, of Newark, N. J.; Sylvester C. Dunham, of Hartford, Conn.; Alfred D. Foster, of Boston; L. G. Fouse, of Philadelphia, and W. A. Day, Haley Fiske, George E. Ide and Charles A. Peabody, of New York.

What the Local Associations Are Doing

Life Association News has no paid correspondents. We depend entirely upon the secretaries of local associations to send us stories of all meetings of their respective associations. If an account of the last meeting of your association does not appear in this department, ask the secretary of your organization why he did not send us the particulars.

Immediately after each meeting, on the same day if possible, secretaries of local bodies should send us a full account of the business transacted, including copies of all speeches, or extracts from the most important of them.

Akron.

The November meeting of the Akron association was held in the Chamber of Commerce rooms, and consideration was given to a communication from National President Clark on the necessity of appointing a committee on Education and Conservation. Another communication from the National Committee on Taxation was taken up for discussion. A Committee on Taxation was appointed and they will endeavor to have a prominent speaker discuss taxation at the December meeting of the association.

Several communications were read describing a man who is persistently working insurance men in the State of Ohio. He has been at work in Akron, Youngstown, Lima, Wapakoneta and Massillon. He is described as about 45 to 50 years old, 5 feet 10 inches tall, weight about 190, light hair, slightly bald, blue eyes, smooth face, very pleasing appearance and wears eye glasses at least part of the time.

His system is to secure applications from agents, saying he is going to write some acquaintance, and then after writing and effecting settlement he leaves for other fields. If in need of immediate money he may persuade the agent to advance him $5 or $10 against his brokerage commission. He has never been known to produce the goods to the agent who fell for his line of talk.

Boston.

Henry A. Macgowan, general agent of the Mutual Benefit at Worcester, Mass., addressed the Boston association at a smoke talk at the City Club on the 10th inst. Mr. Macgowan discussed "Devices for Securing Office and Field Efficiency." He explained the strong points of a card system in use in his office by means of a chart and in explaining the use of the cards said, in part, as follows:

"In advocating the establishment of such a system, I assume that means have first been found for obtaining and maintaining a goodly list of prospects worth soliciting. I believe it is very important that a solicitor should make accurate records of the important data secured in interviews with all persons he regards as prospects. The data should include the full name, address, occupation, age at last birthday and date thereof and what life insurance the prospect has already secured, with amounts and character, dates of maturity or dates of issue, and if possible, amounts of premiums. Other facts about family history, circumstances, plans for future, etc., will be of value for later reference.

"My record card provides for age at last birthday. Most men can give this information, while many do not readily recall the year of birth, and it has seemed to me that the effort to recall the year of birth often switches the attention of the interviewed from the interviews and the subject, in which his undivided interest is sought.

"The record should also tell whether the prospect is married or not and who is dependent on him.

"My card also calls for the ages of wife, daughters and of sons.

"This information is not usually sought by solicitors. This provision is made because we have entered a new era in life insurance, where the great central thought is the insuring of the insurance, which means the guarantee of not so much life insurance in bulk sum, which has all too often failed of its purpose, but rather, the guarantee of a sure yearly income for wife and children. This was the unmistakable note in the ringing message that went out from the Atlantic City Convention of Life Underwriters to the army of life insurance solicitors throughout the land, and the message is the most inspiring ever delivered to life insurance men."

Buffalo.

Twenty-two new members were admitted to the Buffalo association at its November meeting. President Frank W. Tracy delivered a stirring talk in which he denounced twisting, rebating and the use of defamatory literature.

Chattanooga.

The December meeting of the Chattanooga association was held at the Hotel Patten. T. R. Preston, president of the Hamilton National Bank, was the guest of honor and principal speaker. Mr. Preston strongly emphasized the advantages of the monthly income policy and also spoke on the great advance that had been made in Germany to educate the people of that country to the benefits of insurance.

Chicago.

There were many features to make the twenty-fifth anniversary dinner of the Chicago association a memorable occasion. The meeting was held at the Auditorium Hotel on the evening of Nov. 24, and from a point of attendance it was probably the largest gathering of life insurance men in Chicago since the twenty-second annual convention of the National Association. Eighty new members were admitted, and this eclipses all records of members admitted to any local association at one time. A committee was appointed on taxation and legislation, and another committee on education and conservation. Both committees will co-operate with similar committees of the National body.

A collection was taken up for the benefit of the two homes for crippled children, and this in the aggregate proved to be the largest donation ever secured.

With the addition of eighty new members, Chicago is now the largest association in the country, with a roster of 361 members. In order to stimulate activity in securing new members three prizes were offered, and P. J. Kraus, of the Metropolitan, won the first, with R. C. Moore, of the Equitable, second, and Hervey S. Dale a close third.

The committee appointed on taxation was as follows: Isaac Miller Hamilton, chairman; Courtenay Barber, E. H. Carmack, Darby A. Day, E. H. Ferguson, J. F. Oates and Fred W. Potter.

Jules Girardin referred to National President Clark's communication regarding publicity in the daily press, and announced that two popular publications, McClure's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, had recently instituted insurance departments. The following members compose the committee on education and conservation: Jules Girardin, chairman;

Fred B. Mason, W. W. Mack, John R. McFee and Lawrence H. Whiting.

Former National President L. Brackett Bishop offered a resolution in honor of James W. Janney, the first president of the local association. The resolution expressed appreciation not only for Mr. Janney's services to the association but for the undeviating conduct of his agency according to the highest ethics of the business.

Winslow Russell, superintendent of agencies for the Phoenix Mutual, delivered his address on "Efficiency." His remarks were along the same lines as his Atlantic City address, and the points brought out were illustrated by charts in similar fashion as at the National convention.

L. H. Whiting, assistant to the vice-president of the Illinois Life, gave some interesting points on the training of agents. In the course of his remarks, he mentioned that Dean Marshall, of the School of Commerce of the University of Chicago, had planned an enlargement of the insurance course in that institution. The speaker mentioned a system which he put into operation with three men at Joliet, which city has the reputation of being one of the difficult towns in the State in which to sell insurance. He first secured three men who knew practically nothing about life insurance—a barber, a switch engineer and a young man of nineteen, who had spent all his life on a ranch. He then drilled these men in the fundamentals of the business and in the principles of salesmanship, after which he compiled a list from the directory of names by streets and secured the credit ratings of all residents from the Commercial Club. The men were then instructed to make twenty-five calls a day, and succeeded on an average of seeing about twenty wives. From these twenty they picked five and arranged for calls when the husband could be interviewed. The result was these three men wrote twenty-nine applications for $45,000 for the first month, $31,000 for the second month, and $56,000 for the third month.

Cincinnati.

J. A. Jackson, head of the literary bureau of the Mutual Life of New York, was the principal speaker and the guest of honor of the Cincinnati association at its monthly meeting and luncheon on December 9, at the Business Men's Club. During the business session, announcement was made of the course of lectures to be delivered monthly at the Cincinnati University.

Mr. Jackson dwelt principally upon the benefits of life insurance education. C. Burgess Taylor, general agent for West Virginia of the Northwestern Mutual Life, spoke briefly upon the necessity of full knowledge of the business by solicitors.

Cleveland.

Winslow Russell, agency manager of the Phoenix Mutual, delivered his lecture on "Efficiency" at the last meeting of the Cleveland association, which was held at the Hotel Statler on the 2d inst. Attendance was unusually large, with approximately 150 members and guests present.

Mr. Russell, as usual, illustrated his talk with charts. E. R. Putnam, former president of the Pittsburgh association, made a few remarks in which he referred to the local body as a formidable rival of the Pittsburgh association.

Henry Farmer, of Detroit, who was last year president of the Detroit association, was one of the guests of honor, and told of the good work local associations had done in eliminating twisting, rebating, abstracting and other evils.

Col. Will A. Waite, who was secretary of the National Association for several years, spoke briefly and suggested that the association make an effort to win the attendance trophy which is the subject of annual competition between local associations. Miss Whitney entertained with two recitations. Several new members were elected.

It was the opinion of W. H. Whitney, chairman of the Executive Committee, that a bill exempting insurance premiums from taxation might meet with some degree of favor, but at the present time he was not optimistic over the outcome, because of the material reduction in taxes due to such a large number of saloons going out of business under a law passed by the last Legislature.

Herman Moss, as chairman of the Publicity Committee, told how the newspapers and magazines were beginning to publish educational matter on life insurance. He recommended the use of display advertising in such papers, and a resolution was adopted asking for subscriptions to a fund to promote this work.

Columbus.

Seventy members of the Columbus association dined at the Chittenden Hotel on the evening of Nov. 14 and heard Charles W. Scovel, Pittsburgh, former president of the National Association. The speaker's subject was "The New Family Service of Life Insurance." Mr. Scovel developed the theme on lines parallel to his address on the same subject at the Atlantic City convention.

The association voted to send flowers and best wishes for the speedy recovery of its former president, Fritz A. Lichtenberg, who is ill with rheumatism.

Connecticut.

At the December meeting of the Connecticut association, held at Hartford on the 5th inst., a motion was made by E. R. Ransenhousen, of the Western Massachusetts association, suggesting a meeting once a year of all the local associations in New England, the place to be decided upon by representatives from the various local bodies. This matter was discussed, and Secretary Stein was authorized to correspond with the secretaries of the other associations, requesting each association to elect a representative to discuss the matter at a conference in Hartford. Griffin M. Lovelace, superintendent of agencies of the Connecticut Mutual, delivered an address, which was enthusiastically received.

Delaware.

A regular meeting of the Delaware association was held on Nov. 25 at Hanna's restaurant, in Wilmington. The minutes of Sept. 30 and Oct. 28 and of the executive committee of Oct. 24 were approved.

On motion of Charles B. Palmer the association adopted a vote of thanks to the Every Evening, Evening Journal and Morning News for the excellent reports of the meeting of Oct. 28, when National President Clark was the guest of the association. The secretary announced that he had been appointed a member of the membership committee of the National Executive Committee.

A letter was read from National President Clark urging the co-operation of the association in the matter of education and conservation, and on motion of Mr. Palmer the chair was directed to appoint a committee of three, the same committee to have charge of giving news to the press. The president appointed Messrs. Palmer, Sheppard and McDonagh as the committee, it being understood that the president is a member ex officio of the committee.

A letter was read from Edward A. Woods, Darby A. Day and John Dolph, the committee on taxation of the National Association, asking our co-operation in the movement, and on motion of Mr. Sheppard a committee of three was authorized to co-operate with the National Committee. The president appointed Messrs. Knox, Alberti and Price as the committee on taxation.

President Price reported that he had interview with Professor Twitmyre, of the public schools, towards the presentation of the subject of Life Insurance before the pupils of the High School, and stated that Professor Twitmyre said that the matter would be passed upon by the teachers' committee of the High School.

Detroit.

C. Leidich, a well-known steamship agent, delivered an illustrated lecture on German cities before the Detroit association at its regular monthly meeting, held on the evening of the 1st inst. at the Elliott, Taylor & Woelfenden Cafe. Under the subject of "Efficiency in Soliciting Life Insurance," A. C. Utter, general agent of the New England Mutual, gave a practical talk based upon his own personal experience in the field. He claimed that the field methods of life insurance were far behind the times as compared with other lines of business, and told of the need of intensive cultivation. He also urged the necessity of systematic work, regular hours and a strict report of the solicitor's time.

M. H. Zacharias, general agent of the Connecticut Mutual, was one of the speakers, and stated that approximately 66 per cent. of new business written in his agency was upon old policyholders or members of their family.

M. E. O'Brien, president of the Detroit Life, made a plea for co-operation and a greater degree of tolerance of the younger companies. Several new members were elected.

Lawrence C. Hull, chairman of the Lecture Committee, stated that arrangements had been made with the school authorities for a lecture on life insurance at the Eastern High School by Franklin B. Mead, secretary and actuary of the Lincoln National.

Erie.

The Erie association at its November meeting adopted the suggestion of the National Committee on Taxation to set aside one meeting a year to be entirely devoted to the subject of Taxation, and a committee on Education and Conservation to co-operate with the National Committee having that matter in hand was appointed, after James M. Dickey had explained the importance of the matter. There were no formal talks, but the gathering proved to be one of the best held this season.

Fort Dodge.

The regular December meeting of the Fort Dodge association was held on Dec. 6 in the office of C. A. Peterson. The principal feature of the meeting was a paper read by Mr. Peterson on the subject of "The Life Insurance Agent's Relation to His Company and the Policyholder." Mr. Peterson stated that this subject was one of the most important ones in the life insurance business, as it deals with a two-fold responsibility of the agent.

Following the reading of Mr. Peterson's paper the members considered a campaign of education in the form of a series of three lectures to be delivered during the winter months at each of the business colleges and at the high school. The committee on publicity selected the following members of the association to take up this work: First lecture, "The History and Scope of the Old Line Life Insurance Business," by M. V. Keith; second lecture, "The Actuarial Department of Life Insurance Companies," by Burton H. Saxton; third lecture, "Policy Forms and Conditions," by J. O. Broleen.

Indiana.

The Indiana association held its December meeting on the first of this month at the Chamber of Commerce in Indianapolis. On motion of George R. Wilson the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

That this body of Life Insurance men in the State of Indiana sends its felicitations, congratulations and all that it has of good and true wishes to Dr. Henry C. Martin, in this the 80th year of his life, and the 35th year of Rough Notes, the product of his masterful mind and prolific pen;

That this body of men, as a unit, acknowledge its debt of gratitude to the founder of Rough Notes for his mighty efforts in advocating all that is upright and honorable in life insurance work, and for his wisdom and foresight as exemplified in his editorials, his daily walk in life and the good that he has done;

That we wish him many years of continued prosperity and happiness, and all that his heart might desire.

G. S. BREWSTER, President.

Attest: GEORGE R. WILSON, Secretary.

Dated Indianapolis, Ind.,

Dec. 1, 1913.

Warren C. Flynn made a report for the press committee and Messrs. Young, Flickinger and Wilson were appointed his assistants for two months.

President Gary S. Brewster then introduced Lyndon D. Woods, president of the Pension Mutual Life Insurance Company of Pittsburgh. Mr. Woods states that the life insurance business was the best business on earth, and claimed that it had gained more during the year just about to close than any other one business. He stated that a prospect judges a company by its agents, and that out of 4,000 men he found that the majority of those who failed did so through wine, women and cards. Those who won attained their success by means of high ideals.

William E. Osborn was the next speaker and gave an excellent talk on "The Ethics of Soliciting." Mr. Osborn touched on a large number of subjects and it was his opinion that the past should be forgotten. He urged his audience not to misrepresent their competitors' contracts nor to misrepresent their own contracts. He claimed that part-time men cheapened the profession and discouraged new men, and that insurance commissions should be for insurance men. At the conclusion of Mr. Osborn's address, Isaac Pinkus endorsed Mr. Osborn's remarks, particularly with regard to conditions in Marion County. E. F. Folson said that he was not entirely opposed to part-time men, holding that they may develop to full time men. He also spoke on the ethics of converting term insurance.

On motion of Edward H. Young a general business session will be held on Dec. 27, subject to such changes as the chairman of the entertainment committee may find necessary. At this meeting converting term insurance is to be fully discussed. Ford B. Woods, of the Phoenix Mutual, was admitted to membership.

Kansas.

Glover S. Hastings, superintendent of agencies of the New England Mutual, was the principal speaker at the regular November meeting of the Kansas association. The meeting was held at Topeka on the 17th of that month.

Mr. Hastings put particular emphasis on the comprehensive scope of the life insurance field and dwelt to a great extent upon the remarkable development of life insurance in the last five years and the great possibilities for field work.

"The tendency now is to get away from figures and to use illustrations," the speaker said. "You must remember that though your prospect may be a king in his own business, he is probably a mere child in life insurance, and kindergarten methods of instruction ought to be given him."

Knoxville.

The resolution adopted by the National Committee at Atlantic City in regard to excessive taxation was adopted by the Knoxville Association at its last meeting, which was held on Nov. 29 at the Cumberland Club. The principal business was the appointment of the following standing committee to look after this subject: J. N. Ellis, W. J. Anderson and J. V. Rymer. It was agreed to hold a public meeting in the near future, to which the public would be invited as well as local representatives in Congress and the Legislature. The association will now receive non-resident agents as members upon payment of $2 as annual dues. Such members will have full privileges, except the voting power, and will, of course, be entitled to a subscription to LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS. Six new members were admitted.

C. A. Bray, special traveling agent of the Vounteer State Life, was a guest and delivered a talk reciting some of his early experiences. Prof. C. M. Himel, representing the Aetna Life, spoke upon the advantages of the association movement.

Lansing.

A new local association was recently organized at Lansing, Mich., and the following officers were elected: C. J. Burnet, president; Charles Van Keuren, vice-president; Arthur Pino, secretary; S. S. Stouffer, treasurer; Executive Committee, Fred C. Holbeck, A. O. Bement and L. B. Hall. Forty-one life insurance men were present, among them being President Henry Farmer and H. Wibirt Spence, of the Detroit association, and N. E. Degen, former president of the Grand Rapids association. The principal speaker was Commissioner John T. Winship. Commissioner Winship declared in the course of his remarks that his department would not permit any estimates whatever by agents of participating companies on their dividends, and that agents would not be permitted to compare the policies of their companies with those of other companies, unless such comparisons should be complete in every detail. The speaker called attention to the law covering both of these points, which went into effect last August.

Brief addresses were made by the three other guests, Mr. Farmer, Mr. Spence and Mr. Degen. Mr. Farmer talked on the good fellowship features of the association, Mr. Spence on the value of the association movement, and Mr. Degen took for his subject the question of taxation of life insurance funds.

Lima.

It was decided at the December meeting of the Lima association to arrange for an open meeting during the latter part of January. On that occasion there will be some prominent out-of-town speaker. The meeting was held in the Elks' Club private dining room, and Harry L. Bentley, a prominent lawyer and ex-exalted ruler of the Elks' Club, was the principal speaker.

Los Angeles.

At the last meeting of the Los Angeles association a monster loving cup, loaded to the gunwales with California champagne, was passed around the tables. This was the first appearance of the handsome trophy which is to be the object of competition between the Pacific Coast associations. Each of these organizations has a large and active membership. The cup is designed to create a friendly rivalry that will work to the benefit of all the associations interested. These are five in number, situated respectively at Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Tacoma and Seattle.

The trophy has been presented by the following life insurance managers jointly: National Vice-President John Newton Russell, Jr., Hubert H. Ward, W. D. Mead, Pacific Mutual Life, and W. L. Hathaway, Mutual Life of New York. The conditions of the contest are under the control of a committee consisting of C. I. D. Moore, secretary Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, Los Angeles; Geo. B. Scott, assistant secretary (Pacific Coast) Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, San Francisco; S. P. Lockwood, vice-president Columbia Life and Trust Company, Portland Oregon.

The terms of the contest have not been formally announced, but it is probable that they will provide for the winning of the trophy by the Pacific Coast association making the greatest increase of membership in a six months' period, with permanent possession as the award for three successive wins. The first period of the contest is to consist of the months of November and December, 1913.

The cup has been sent on a visit of inspection to the several associations interested in the contest. The Los Angeles body is determined to secure the custody of it for the former half of next year. At the last meeting of the local association ten or more new men were admitted, and the individual members were urged to exert themselves to the utmost in a general effort to increase the roll.

The success of the National convention, which will be held in San Francisco in 1915, must depend very largely on the attendance from the coast associations. The effect, if not the chief object, of this trophy contest will be to stimulate enrollment in the local organizations with a view to insuring a creditable representation of Pacific Coast life underwriters at the convention.

At the annual meeting of the association the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, A. P. Chipron, Equitable; first vice-president, B. P. Rouse, Mutual Benefit; second vice-president, W. C. Shaw, Metropolitan; secretar-treasurer, W. McClelland, Equitable.

Executive Committee, J. N. Russell, Jr., Pacific Mutual, chairman; F. E. McMullen, Massachusetts Mutual; I. J. Muma, Aetna; G. L. Dickinson, Connecticut General; W. H. Moir, Home.

Louisiana.

The regular November meeting of the Louisiana association was held at New Orleans on Nov. 25 and was preceded by a luncheon. Fourteen new members were admitted. The principal speakers were Wilson Williams, James W. Smithers, T. B. Thompson and Dr. E. G. Simmons.

The executive committee was instructed to consider the advisability of holding regular meetings in the evening instead of at noon, and also the preparation of a program by each company alternately. This meeting was the largest ever held by this association, and an increase of 30 per cent. was shown in the membership since October.

It was resolved to endeavor to institute a series of lectures on "Life Insurance" at Tulane University. It was also decided to make a special effort to increase the membership, and for the present at least to suspend the $2 initiation fee.

Louisville.

Several members were admitted to the Louisville association at its regular monthly meeting held on the evening of Dec. 8 at the Tyler Hotel. Hon. Wm. Marshall Bullitt was down on the program for an address, but was unable to attend. A special meeting was therefore called for the 15th inst., at noon, when Mr. Bullitt will deliver his address. It was announced that at the February meeting of the Association Winslow Russell, agency superintendent of the Phoenix Mutual, will deliver an address on "Agency Efficiency."

Central Massachusetts.

The Central Massachusetts association held its regular monthly meeting on the 10th inst. at the Automobile Club, in Worcester. Regular routine business was transacted and Otis D. Arnold was elected as a delegate to attend a conference to be held in Hartford, for the purpose of arranging a congress of local associations throughout New England.

Western Massachusetts.

"Life Insurance as a Profession" was the topic considered by the members of the Western Massachusetts association at a meeting held on the evening of the 11th inst., at the Nelson Haynes Hotel, in Springfield. Two addresses were delivered on that general subject, one by Stewart Anderson, of the Massachusetts Mutual, and the other by Griffin M. Lovelace, superintendent of agencies of the Connecticut Mutual.

Mr. Anderson spoke of the newer ideals that had arisen in the life insurance business in the last few years and reviewed the qualities that the man who is true to these ideals should have.

Mr. Lovelace claimed that life insurance is coming to have more the attributes of a profession and that those who make it their life work are coming more and more to feel a professional responsibility. He spoke of some of the necessary attributes for success and emphasized the necessity of experience as well as theoretical knowledge.

Henry S. Waldron was appointed from the local association to confer with other delegates from the New England associations with regard to having a congress of New England associations.

Minneapolis.

The principal feature of business of the November meeting of the Minneapolis association was the adoption of certain recommendations of a special committee appointed some time ago to suggest plans for the betterment of the association. After the report of this committee the association decided to adopt the following features of the report: That the prominent feature of the meetings be instruction, and that the time spent in eating be shortened by having a less elaborate lunch and by having the same served as quickly as possible, thus giving more time for the real purpose of the meeting. It was further decided that the purpose of the association be made known to the insurance public by such advertising methods as the members thought best, and that each member be required to pay his proper share of such expense based on the amount of paid-for insurance written by him. That the high standard of the association be kept up, and that, by making known the purpose and nature of the association, the public may learn to recognize that membership in it stands for what is right and proper in the profession.

Additional recommendations were to the effect that each general agent be urged to propose eligible solicitors for membership and that each member be made to feel that he should contribute something to make the meetings interesting and profitably practical. A committee of the following gentlemen was appointed to discuss the advisability of starting a local advertising campaign: J. Edward Meyers, F. M. Flory, G. W. Taylor and R. G. Butts.

Nebraska.

At the Omaha Commercial Club on the 6th inst., the Nebraska association held its December meeting. Edwin R. Jewell, a former insurance man and now manager of the City National Bank Building, delivered an address on "What Made Life Insurance Necessary."

New York.

The November meeting of the New York association was held at noon on Nov. 25, in the Assembly Room of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, and was purely a business session. Julian S. Myrick, chairman of the Executive Committee, delivered a brief report as to several matters which had been brought before the attention of that committee.

T. Reid Fell spoke on the Luncheon Club, which meets at Haan's Rathskeller daily. Mr. Fell was optimistic and believed that the membership of the club would eventually be increased to 200 members.

President Edward W. Allen read a communication from National President Clark asking the local association to appoint a Committee on Education and Conservation to co-operate with the National Committee on Education and Conservation. This communication was the cause of a warm discussion, in which D. G. C. Sinclair was the first speaker. Mr. Sinclair did not believe that the plan of institutional advertising, as he understood it, would be of any special benefit to life underwriters in New York City, although he admitted that it would be of some advantage in other points of the country. "Asking the companies to contribute," he said, "is all rot and all wrong."

At the request of President Edward W. Allen, Charles Jerome Edwards spoke upon the subject under discussion and moved that a committee be appointed as suggested by National President Clark. Mr. Edwards went into the subject to considerable length, and called attention to the gratuitous publicity which had been given life insurance by editorials and news articles in McClure's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, System and the Philadelphia Evening Telegram. He told how the American Bankers' Association had advertised the advantages of their individual institutions by a systematic campaign of articles in various publications on the subject of thrift.

Secretary William F. Atkinson agreed with much that had been said by the previous speakers, but did not believe that it was possible to secure proper publicity without paying for it. He said that in his opinion the advertising which life insurance received because of the Armstrong Investigation made for lasting success in the insurance business.

Perez F. Huff claimed that he did not understand the plans of the National Committee on Education and Conservation, and therefore requested that if the committee be appointed it be instructed to report to the Executive Committee in writing.

Walter Travers Daniel agreed with Mr. Huff in many particulars, but said that he thought it would be well to know the exact avenue along which it was intended to work out the plans of the National Committee.

President Allen appointed the following Committee on Education and Conservation: Avia S. Rogers, Frank C. Stamland and Perez F. Huff.

On motion of T. Reid Fell it was resolved to send out to every member who had not already signed one, a pledge not to rebate.

Perez F. Huff stated that there should be some law, or some understanding at least, as to who are entitled to be licensed to solicit life insurance, and claimed that many men who were in the business to-day were not qualified to act as solicitors. He suggested a special meeting, when the matter could be taken up in all its aspects. After a brief but spirited tilt, due to a misunderstanding between Mr. Edwards and Mr. Huff, it was decided to take this matter up in the Executive Committee.

Oregon.

J. W. Ferguson, Commissioner of Insurance of Oregon, after a conference with Commissioner Ekern, of Wisconsin, strongly advocates the enactment of a law providing for State life insurance in his own State. This was the cause of an animated discussion at the November meeting of the Oregon association. The following Committee on Taxation was appointed: S. P. Lockwood, T. H. McAllis and A. D. Katz. President Ward also appointed the following Committee on Education and Conservation: J. A. Hood, Frank Bradley and William Goldman. It was decided to arrange for a public meeting, at which the taxation problems will be discussed and on which occasion addresses will be delivered by some prominent citizens.

Certain life insurance stories written by Rex White were discussed, and consideration was also given to the best means of competing for the Pacific Coast trophy.

Philadelphia.

The Philadelphia association held its monthly meeting at the Continental Hotel on the evening of the 4th inst. with an excellent attendance. Alba B. Johnson, president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, was the principal speaker. Mr. Johnson's address was a remarkably strong endorsement of life insurance as viewed from the standpoint of a business man and is given in full elsewhere in this number.

Edward A. Woode, general agent of the Equitable Life at Pittsburgh and vice-president of the National Association, discussed the injustice of life insurance taxation. He presented a strong argument supported with indisputable facts and statistics.

Another speaker was Dr. D. S. Huebner, professor of life insurance of the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce of the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Huebner's remarks were largely upon the question of life insurance taxation and were enthusiastically received.

Hon. George Wharton Pepper was scheduled to speak, but as the hour was late he requested that he be excused.

Pittsburgh.

President Royal S. Goldsburly, of the Pittsburgh association, took up the matter of the Anti-Taxation Campaign of the National Association at the December meeting of the Pittsburgh body, held on the evening of the 5th inst. at the Fort Pitt Hotel. Mr. Goldsburly called attention to a letter received from the National Committee on Taxation, and pointed out the fact that banks and building loan associations are not taxed, whereas the State tax on life insurance in Pennsylvania is approximately 2 per cent. A meeting will be held at some future date to give this matter further consideration. Fifty-two new members were elected.

Leading members of the association took part in a discussion on practical questions, one of which embraced the following points: "How do you answer the man who says: 'I can't afford it.' 'See me after the first of the year.' 'Have too much now—going to drop some.' 'My wife is richer than I.' 'Absolutely not interested.' 'Haven't the cash.' 'Won't sign a note.' 'Don't need it.' 'I am single.' 'I can invest my own money better than an insurance company.'" Another general topic of interest was "How to Use the Income Tax to Sell More Insurance."

Puget Sound.

"At the first regular monthly meeting of the Puget Sound association, which was held in the banquet room of the Rathskeller, the Seattle delegates to the National convention were the guests of honor. Of the eight delegates who represented the Pacific Coast at the National convention, Seattle had five.

The programme of the evening consisted of talks from the delegates concerning their experiences at the National gathering. The delegates were: H. H. Ward, former president of the National Association, and W. Dwight Mead, of the Pacific Mutual; Patrick Duran, of the Union Mutual; Harry Calohan, of the Fidelity Mutual, and E. L. Webster and R. C. Stuart, of the New York Life.

Mr. Mead, in his address, announced that the National convention of 1915 would be held in some city of the Pacific Coast, and stated that a larger membership among the associations of the Pacific Coast would be required to make the gathering a complete success.

For the furtherance of this idea a trophy, the donors of which were W. L. Hathaway, H. H. Ward, John Newton Russell and himself, was to be awarded to the association which had the greatest percentage of new membership within the next two months. The cup was to be held for six months by the winning association, and then another two months' contest was to be held.

Mr. Ward spoke briefly concerning institutional advertising of life insurance and outlined the plans of the Committee on Education and Conservation of the National Association.

Rhode Island.

Active steps to do away with the practise of rebating in securing life insurance business in the State of Rhode Island were taken on the evening of Nov. 18 by the Rhode Island association, when the members adopted a resolution offering $100 reward for information leading to the conviction of any person violating the law governing such practise.

William H. Griswold offered the resolution and, as he finished it, all of those present burst out in applause and the motion was carried unanimously.

The annual dinner of the association was held at the West Side Club. Officers were elected for the ensuing year, by-laws were adopted and other business was transacted. The members listened to speeches on the insurance business.

C. C. Blanchard, the retiring president, presided over the business meeting and the reports, with the reading of the new bylaws, were first taken up. Then the nominating committee made its report and the officers elected as follows: President, Maurice H. Stearns, of the John Hancock; vice-president, S. M. Power, Metropolitan; treasurer, H. M. Wheaton, Connecticut Mutual; secretary, Brockholst M. Smith, New York Life. Executive committee, George H. Collett, State Mutual, chairman; George M. Parks, Massachusetts Mutual; C. C. Blanchard, Northwestern Mutual; C. C. White, Puritan; F. M. Donnelly, Columbian National, and H. Augustus Kendall, Mutual Life of New York.

At the very close of the business session Mr. Griswold arose and said that he had been asked to present a resolution which he considered of vital importance to every agent present. He then read the following:

"Whereas, Unfair practises have been known to exist in connection with the sale of life insurance, which are not only in violation of law, but reflect adversely upon all agents and companies; and

"Whereas, The persistence of such practises tends to demoralize the great work of life insurance and the principles of this association; and

"Whereas, There is reasonable assurance and belief that such practises continue in this State; therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the undersigned members of the Life Underwriters' Association of Rhode Island, do hereby subscribe to a fund of $100, the same to be deposited with the Rhode Island Hospital Trust Company of Providence, and payable to an informant producing evidence sufficient to convict in a court of law any person or persons violating Chapter 714

After the dinner had been served, Mr. Blanchard, who was the toastmaster, introduced the speakers.

Stewart Anderson, editor of the Literature Department of the Massachusetts Life Insurance Company, was the first speaker, and he told of "The Profession of Life Underwriter." He dwelt upon the different points which go to make the work successful, but spoke particularly of rebating, and declared that no man who was honorable in his business dealings would stoop to such practices.

He was followed by Franklin W. Ganse, of the Columbian National Life Insurance Company of Boston, the general agent there, who spoke on "The Life Underwriters' Work," and J. F. Murray, of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, who spoke on "Field Work."

Richmond.

The December meeting of the Richmond association was held on the 12th inst. and was in the nature of a farewell luncheon given in honor of G. W. Bahlke, superintendent of the Metropolitan, who was leaving Richmond for Baltimore. Many tributes were made to Mr. Bahlke's worth and good influence in the community. Mr. Bahlke responded with a few appropriate remarks.

Salina.

With nearly a score of charter members a new local association was organized at Salina, Kansas, on the evening of Nov. 15. This organization was effected through the efforts of a committee from the Kansas association composed of the following members: H. O. Garvey, E. W. Thompson, F. B. Parker and C. A. Moore. After the banquet tendered by the local association Mr. Thompson entertained those present with several readings in French-Canadian dialect.

The new association makes three local bodies in the State of Kansas, the others being the Kansas association at Topeka and the Wichita association. If the present existing plans mature a fourth association will be organized in the South-eastern part of the State at either Fort Scott, Parsons or Pittsburgh.

Officers of the new association were chosen at the meeting as follows: President, David J. Hanna, Bank Savings National; vice-president, J. J. Eberhardt, Massachusetts Mutual; secretary, Richard J. Surface, Farmers and Bankers; treasurer, L. A. Alexander, International.

Two additional members of the Executive Committee were elected as follows: J. P. Harker, Metropolitan, and J. G. Cuttler, of Abilene, Union Central. All the other members of the Executive Committee have their headquarters at Salina.

San Francisco.

William L. Hathaway occupied a prominent place at the November meeting of the San Francisco association. As Mr. Hathaway was chairman of the delegation to the Atlantic City convention, his report of the proceedings of that gathering was listened to with much interest. He also placed in the custody of President George B. Scott the loving cup donated by himself, National Vice-President John Newton Russell, Jr., Hubert H. Ward and W. D. Mead, and explained that the trophy was to be competed for by the various associations of the Pacific Coast in a contest for increased membership.

While in Atlantic City Mr. Hathaway also received the Ben Williams memorial vase to deliver to R. O. Miles, to whom it was awarded in the prize essay contest. Mr. Hathaway presented the vase to Mr. Miles with a few appropriate remarks, and Mr. Miles responded by reading his essay.

President Scott called attention to the convention club idea, which has been brought to his notice by National Vice-President Russell, and a committee consisting of the following gentlemen was appointed to look into the merits of the plan: William L. Hathaway, W. J. Bell and James S. Osborne. Several new members were admitted to the association.

St. Louis.

The St. Louis association, at the meeting in the evening of Nov. 18, finished the annual programme of educational talks that was mapped out for it at the beginning of the year by George L. Dyer, president.

Nine meetings were held, in which the association was addressed by prominent insurance agents and officers, or business men in other lines, also by clergymen and lawyers. The last was Darby A. Day, of Chicago, who talked on "Organization and Field Energy."

The association began the year with about thirty members, and it now has more than 100.

At the last meeting President Dyer was authorized to appoint a committee to co-operate with a committee of the National organization in an effort to secure the reduction of State taxes on life insurance premiums. The agents have been requested to educate their patrons and the public as far as possible on the fact that the taxes on premiums come out of the pockets of the policyholders and not the companies.

South Dakota.

The November meeting of the South Dakota association was held on the 15th of that month at Sioux Falls, and several new members were admitted. Regular routine business was transacted and several matters of local importance were discussed. The speakers seemed imbued with real association enthusiasm. A special program has been arranged for the December meeting.

Syracuse.

Byron Winters, ex-Assemblyman of Waverly, N. Y., was the principal speaker at the Tenth Annual Meeting of the Syracuse association, held on Nov. 29. Mr. Winters discussed his fight against the National Protective Legion. Several new members were admitted and the election of officers resulted as follows: President, H. B. Husted, State Mutual; first vice-president, Henry Phillips, Northwestern; second vice-president, George A. Burnap, Prudential; secretary, W. G. Marot, Equitable; treasurer, C. J. Kirkland, Northwestern.

Texas.

Although the Texas association was organized but a few months ago its present membership embraces 175 life underwriters, and if plans of its officers work out satisfactorily, it will before the end of the present association year embrace 350 members. At the regular November meeting 25 applications for membership were received.

Isaac Miller Hamilton, president of the Federal Life of Chicago, addressed the association on this occasion, and H. G. Everett, secretary of the Central Life of Iowa, was another prominent speaker.

The executive committee has raised a fund of a thousand dollars to be used in assisting county attorneys in prosecuting cases involving violations of the anti-rebate, misrepresentation, anti-twisting and embezzlement acts. The State Insurance Commissioner has declared his willingness to co-operate, and states that he will not renew the license of an agent found guilty of violating the laws.

Utah.

The Utah association proposes to organize the Inter-Mountain Association of Life Underwriters to cover the States of Utah, Idaho, Colorado, Nevada, Wyoming, New Mexico and Montana. This plan was first proposed by Will G. Farrell, general agent of the Penn Mutual, who is also a member of the National Executive Committee. The project, it is announced, will have the co-operation of President Kipp, of the Utah association, and President F. C. Hathaway, of the Utah Life Managers Association.

In this day of insurance when most companies are safe and most policies sound, PRICE and PROFIT are the points that win the final decision of the buyer. And that is why "It pays to work for the Union Central". The Union Central pays larger dividends to policy holders than any other company, and therefore offers a "Net Premium Rate Lowest of All". This is "the argument that gets the business" every time.

West Virginia.

A discussion of "The Best Way to Present Twenty-Year Payment Life Proposition" was the principal feature of the November meeting of the West Virginia association, which was held at Wheeling on Nov. 22. The discussion was animated and was participated in by a large number of the members.

Youngstown.

The regular December meeting of the Youngstown association was held on the evening of the 9th inst., at the Hotel Ohio. The program for the evening consisted of a general discussion upon life insurance salesmanship, led by George E. McNabb, who read extracts from an article written by Charles Weinfeld, representing the Northwestern Mutual Life at Wausau, Wis.

Capital District.

With a good attendance the Capital District association held its last meeting on the evening of Nov. 18 at Albany. The secretary presented National President Clark's letter on the question of appointing a local committee on Education and Conservation. President Kohn referred to the previous meeting of the local body and its special benefits and said that the executive committee had thought best to limit the work of this meeting to the association's membership. He announced that a number of the members would give the benefit of their experiences as to arguments and suggestions used in closing difficult cases.

D. A. Ter Bush presented a suggestion that he had been able to use successfully in a recent case relative to the necessary monthly expenses of a prospect's family and questioning the prospect as to the source of these necessary funds in event of the prospect's death. This he said had been the means of securing two applications that same day.

T. J. O'Brien gave several specific and helpful points in connection with approaching and closing a prospect. George E. Cantine told of a difficult case he had encountered, the number of interviews which followed without result, and the manner in which it was finally brought to a close. In this transaction he not only secured the insurance of the prospect, but later an active all-time producer which is still devoting his entire time and making a remarkable record as a manager of one of the largest companies.

J. P. McGarrahan stated that in his opinion the "easy" prospects were the ones he had generally found the hardest to close. Thomas E. Hanigan suggested reaching a man through his weak points, and gave some interesting experiences along these lines. Others who entered in the discussion were Mr. Rix, Jesse Barnet, W. A. Baker, Jr., and President Kohn.

It sets us all an example of intelligent and systematic toil and of steady production of satisfactory results.—Prudential Weekly Record.

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS

Entered as second class matter, Feb. 4, 1907, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

Vol. 8.

NEW YORK, JANUARY, 1914.

No. 5.

TO THE LOCAL ASSOCIATIONS OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS:

Baltimore, Md., January 15, 1914.

Gentlemen:—At the Atlantic City Convention a most important amendment was made to the Constitution of the National Association in Article VIII, Section 1, whereby non-resident membership of local associations was authorized on a most liberal and advantageous basis.

It has long since been recognized that the influence and advantages of both the National and local associations should be extended to those field representatives not residing in large centers where local associations already existed. This need has now been met so far as perfecting the National machinery is concerned.

It is my desire, therefore, that each local association wherever possible inaugurate a NON-RESIDENT MEMBERSHIP CAMPAIGN, urging not only all general agents and managers within the radius of their influence to make application for membership, but also the solicitors residing in the small towns and rural communities of such territory. Favorable and aggressive action by our local associations on this question will result in extending the benefits of the life underwriters' movement to thousands of agents not now enjoying same, thereby increasing immeasurably the influence of the National Association and assisting greatly in the work of our Education, Conservation and Taxation Committees.

The Constitution provides that only one dollar ($1.00) each shall be paid to the National Association for any that may be designated by the local associations as non-resident members paying less than regular local dues.

Life Association News will be regularly sent to all non-resident members and they will be eligible to Convention privileges and membership on the National Executive Committee under the same regulations as applicable to resident members.

Yours very truly,

ERNEST J. CLARK,
President.

THIRD PARTY INSURANCE.

Every Man Who Suffers from the Non-Insurance of Another Is Carrying a Part of the Risk Himself.

By Edward A. Woods, General Agent, Equitable Life Assurance Society, Pittsburgh, Pa.

This article is copyrighted by Mr. Woods, who is well known in the above capacity and as Vice-President of the National Association. There are few Thrills in Life Insurance literature; nearly all that can be said has been said. But there are always different viewpoints and in this instance Mr. Woods gives us a new "slant" on a phase of the business of vital importance to every man who carries a rate-book.—Editor's Note.

Most prosperous people will suffer loss in money, time and through unpleasant complications and embarrassments, through the non-insurance or inadequate insurance of relatives, kindred, business associates and employees.

You can render these people a great service if you induce those through whose negligence they will suffer to insure. Every man who suffers from the non-insurance of another is really carrying a part of that risk himself.

One of our agents asked us to request the father of a young married man with one child to advise his reluctant son to take a policy. The father said it was no affair of his—that his son would have to "take that risk" himself.

"No," we told him, "you are carrying the risk."

"What do you mean?"

"If he dies, you will have to take care of his widow and child. Public opinion will make you, whether you want to or not. What we are suggesting is that we could help you get our company to assume that risk, instead of yourself."

Many fathers, particularly the prosperous and provident, have taken home widowed daughters with young children, requiring not only their support, but involving embarrassment and family readjustments. Much of this could have been averted if the parents had actively interested themselves in having their sons-in-law adequately insure.

Many sons must provide for widowed mothers, often with embarrassed financial and family relations because their fathers did not sufficiently insure.

Family Readjustments.

Many fathers should welcome your inducing their sons to form thrifty and provident habits through life insurance.

Many employees risk their livelihood because their employers do not insure the permanence of the firm in case of the death of one or more of the firm.

Every employer would be benefited by a thoroughly insured body of employees, for such would be provident, thrifty and permanent. Deaths among such would not mean passing the hat, with the expectation of a generous contribution from the employer or the alternative of the unwelcome reputation of being close-fisted and cold-blooded.

Creditors are interested in seeing that their debtors are adequately insured.

Every bank is interested in the adequate insurance of its customers. No banker relishes pushing the widow for payment of money, nursing along the indebtedness, closing out or refinancing the business. Adequate insurance might have made all this unnecessary.

Evicting widows is neither pleasant nor profitable. Lending money on homes should be protected by life insurance. Brothers-in-law should be urged to carry adequate insurance that in case of death the family problem of caring for the sister and her children will not have to be solved.

Many charitable and philanthropic institutions will suffer because of the death of benefactors not having provided life insurance to continue their support, throwing the burden of filling the large gap in the annual budget upon the remaining contributors.

The death of any non-insured or inadequately insured man is an economic loss, a social default, which falls on the entire community, but chiefly on a few, or perhaps a sole sufferer. How widespread has been the ruin from the collapse of a business, due to the death of its owner, inadequately insured or not at all? What would it be worth to a community to make sure that a great business, employing thousands, would be maintained and not jeopardized by the death, at an inopportune time, of an important head?

In what financial and other embarrassments have you been involved because of someone's death? Have you not had to help support others, because of little insurance or none? Perhaps you have a son, father, brother-in-law, creditor, about whom you yourself feel uneasy every time you hear he is sick, knowing that his death may bring you not only financial but other embarrassments?

Grave Situations.

The financial loss is frequently not all and sometimes not even the principal damage. Suppose a sister is suddenly not only widowed but left with small children and unprovided with insurance. Perhaps none of the surviving brothers are able to take the entire care of her family. Then comes the family question of how is her support to be arranged; with whom is she to live; how much is each to contribute—with perhaps disagreements in the family as to who is best able to do it, and who has other prior claims. Sometimes are added family complications between the wives. There are probably numbers of persons you would be very glad to know carried life insurance, and you would thank any agent of any company who had afforded you this protection. Having applied the principle to your own case, apply it to others.

This should lead you to the prosperous members in your community. You are urging their own interest, offering your help to induce others to relieve them from obligations. Many applicants say "my wife has rich relatives; she will be provided for." It is the prosperous members of just such a connection that resent the suggestion that they will assume this burden and who, when they properly understand it, will assist you, perhaps even insisting that such take care of their own families, and not expect their more thrifty relatives to do what they should do themselves by life insurance.

This is professional work of the highest order. If you are known as one to whom your clients and their families look to induce others to make the provision that they ought, you will have established that reputation in your own community that the best kind of a physician and lawyer establish. You will have helped spread the idea that adequate insurance is a universal need and that he who neglects this duty is injuring numbers all around him.

A Valuable Service.

In securing this interest, remember that you are offering a gratuitous and valuable service, which, if you put it to him properly, will be welcomed. It all depends upon the tact you use in going about it. If you ask a father with several married daughters to give you names of persons who "want insurance," you will probably get a very curt refusal—and deserve it. Even if you ask him if his sons-in-law should not be insured, you may not arouse his interest. But if you tactfully bring before him how the insurance of his sons-in-law is a matter of vital concern to him, you may very quickly interest him. He may give you such facts and help as will enable you to effectively present insurance to them, even if he does not give you his active assistance, and you will know if the father's advice is sought, what it will be.

Women are interested in the adequate insurance of the husbands of their sisters.

Remember that when you are interesting anyone in why another should be insured, he is as David, with the prophet Nathan preaching insurance to himself. For illustration, if a sister is interested in having her sister's husband adequately insured, so as not to bring this burden sometime upon her own husband, it is but a step to have her realize that her own husband requires more.

Consider how to present to an employer his selfish interest in having his employees well insured. Forget his doing you any favor and present entirely his side of the case. It is always well to present a matter to anyone entirely from the point of his interest, not yours. Approach him with knowledge of his business. Assume his interest in knowing that his employees have savings bank accounts; that they own their homes. Life insurance is another evidence of thrift. You are prepared, without any expense to him, to see that his employees make such provision for their families and old age; all you want is his moral support and such information as he can give. Many employers have insured their employees at great expense to themselves. Our own agency pays thousands of dollars to insure our own office force. We practise what we preach. Such well known firms as Procter & Gamble, Yawman & Erbe, Montgomery Ward & Company; local firms, such as The Rosenbaum Company, the Pittsburgh, Butler, Harmony and New Castle Street Railway Company, and others—pay the entire cost of the insurance of their employees. Employers in England and Germany are compelled to so provide for employees and laws have been passed or are pending in various States for compelling this very thing. You are prepared to induce his employees to effect this arrangement themselves and at their own expense, if he will give you the necessary support and information. Would not any employer rather have insured than uninsured employees? Having thoroughly interested him in the fact that an insured class of employees will relieve him of burdens, give him a more contented, satisfied and permanent set of employees, you are in position to get his active co-operation.

Going Some!

The Puget Sound Association admitted 84 new members at its December meeting. This gives this local body a membership of over 150. The Association expects to take in 100 additional members in the near future.

Going Some! Yes! Yes!

LIFE INSURANCE EDUCATION IN THE UNITED STATES.

America Far Exceeds All Other Nations in the Volume of Insurance in Force, but There is Almost a Complete Absence of Provisions for Insurance Education.

By W. F. Gephart, Professor of Economics Washington University, St. Louis, Mo.

It was Cecil who said: "The first step to knowledge is to know that we are ignorant." Professor Gephart believes that the public at large sadly needs a knowledge of the fundamental principles of Life Insurance, and that the majority of solicitors are none too well informed to intelligently impart this knowledge. If you are an underwriter, willing to confess that you do not "know it all," it will be worth your while to become acquainted with Professor Gephart's ideas.—Editor's Note.

One of the most striking paradoxes to be found in the present stage of education and business is in the field of life insurance. The United States far exceeds all other nations in the volume of life insurance in force. Insurance is deservedly popular with the people, both on account of the service which it renders and also in the manner in which the service is rendered. As a business it has appealed to a class of men who stand out among the present-day business population as men of great ability and energy. Whatever may have been the true bearing of the facts disclosed in the numerous insurance investigations during the past decade, it must be recognized that the business of insurance in its essential characteristics has withstood these tests and is now stronger than it has ever been. Yet with all this volume of life insurance in force, and with all the present-day disposition to buy insurance, the public—the purchasers—know very little about insurance. Nor is this a complete statement of the paradoxical situation. There is an almost complete absence of any provisions or agencies for insurance education.

In the Early Days.

It is difficult to explain fully the absence of insurance education in the United States. It is due in part to the earlier history of insurance in this country. Many earlier companies were organized and operated upon an unscientific basis and inevitably failed with the result that many individuals lost all, or a very large part of the payments which they had made. Many are yet living who were victims of this kind of insurance, and many more are fond of reciting the experiences of their fathers. Then, too, the earlier insurance agent was frequently one whose methods of selling insurance would not be countenanced by any reputable company or general agency at the present time. He was frequently a man either of questionable character or one who had failed to make a success in other lines of business. Insurance and insurance agents became the subject of jokes in newspapers and humorous publications. In short, insurance was not considered in a serious manner, and hence very naturally was not seriously considered as a proper subject for instruction. This is only a partial explanation.

Another partial explanation, but one which has reference to the exact opposite attitude towards insurance, is that it has erroneously been considered a subject of great technicality, and hence the average man has readily admitted that he cannot understand it. This ready opinion has been offered before he has made anything more than a superficial effort to understand it. He has made the mistake of assuming that an understanding of insurance meant an appreciation of the actuarial phase of insurance knowledge. It is true that this division of insurance knowledge is highly technical and is difficult of comprehension, so far as any mathematical knowledge can be said to have this characteristic. Mathematical formulas appear very formidable to the uninitiated.

What, then, is the situation at present in regard to insurance education in the United States? There is first a large number of various kinds of insurance associations. As presidents of insurance companies, or as agents, or as insurance commissioners, they meet in their associations and discuss among themselves their problems. Reports of the proceedings are published, but such proceedings circulate almost exclusively among members of the association or those in the insurance business, closely allied to the association.

There are actuarial associations which have for many years been meeting and presenting discussions of a very high order. Their proceedings are also published as splendid contributions to insurance knowledge; but these contributions have even a more narrow constituency than the former. Even members of other insurance organizations either do not or cannot read and understand such contributions.

There is, in the third place, the numerous insurance journals whose circulations are almost wholly confined to insurance men. Many of these are no doubt rendering a great service. However, none of these agencies reach the public at large who, it has been agreed, especially among insurance men, need education in life insurance.

Instruction in Colleges and Universities.

Finally, there is the formal instruction in life insurance in colleges and universities. An examination of the catalogues of colleges and universities supplies a rather pretentious number of examples of courses in insurance. Yet the real facts are quite different. In many cases the course of instruction is simply on paper, and in some other cases it were better if it remained on paper. That is to state that there are very few instructors in colleges and universities who have the proper equipment to give a course of instruction in life insurance. This applies more generally to the courses in the departments of economics and law and less so to the courses in the mathematics of insurance. In many cases the course is given only occasionally. It may be in alternate years, or at longer intervals.

So far as real insurance education is being secured, the insurance agent is doing at present the greater share of it. In all probability he will continue for some time to do the major part of it, and it, therefore, is a matter of very great significance that he does the proper kind of educating. It may appear a perversion of the true sense to speak of "a proper kind of education," but one may become educated into ignorance quite as well as educated into wisdom. This idea may be expressed by the statement that what the average person knows about insurance is not true.

The Method of Procedure.

The question then arises as to the method of procedure in organizing or furthering real insurance education. The view has frequently been expressed that formal insurance instruction should be given in the public schools. To those who are familiar with past history and present status of public school instruction, such a proposition is futile and impractical. This is true, first, because there is and has been greater pressure and real need for the introduction of other subjects; second, because very few teachers now in the public schools are prepared to teach it properly. Nor would it be desirable or necessary to set aside a part of the course of study for such instruction. Whatever instruction in this subject is desirable can be given in connection with such well established subjects of the curriculum as civics, history and mathematics. The teachers in high schools are increasingly becoming graduates of colleges, and it is at this educational institution that chief effort should be centered to secure the establishment of formal instruction in insurance. If such instruction were offered in universities, colleges and normal schools, there soon might be a considerable number of teachers and others who would become radiating centers of intelligent insurance knowledge. What, then, should be the formal training in insurance, and in what department of the college and university should it be given?

There should be a study not only of insurance itself but also of the closely related and interdependent fields of knowledge, classified as economics, finance, banking, taxation and sociology. These studies should prepare best not only the student who expected to go into the business, but also the citizen who should be the means of indirectly educating many of his fellow citizens. Mathematical or actuarial training is purposely omitted since this is highly specialized, and it is believed that the insurance education now needed is an understanding of the economic and social aspects of insurance.

However promising the results which may be secured from such a type of insurance education, the immediate and most promising step in such education is for insurance men to educate themselves. It is doubtful whether there is any other important business in which men who are engaged in it know so little about the business. This is easily explained by the fact that the people with whom they do business know infinitely less about insurance than the insurance men. There has been in the past no very great inducement for the man in the business to study it. The bank official comes in contact with people who although not experts, yet either know enough about the business to ask intelligent questions, or can soon judge the accuracy of the information given by the results secured. This is not generally true in the insurance business. The buyer neither knows at the time nor will he often ever be able to know whether he has had accurate information. Too frequently the insurance information given out consists of glowing adjectives, attractive phrases, and striking expressions about insurance. This is neither education in insurance, nor a tool for it. It is an enthusiastic expression of emotionalism about insurance. What is needed is not a jumble of pathetic statements about the beauties of insurance, its holiness ad nauseam, but candid, simple statements of what it is and what it can do as nothing else can do.

The Actuarial Side.

It is only on the actuarial side that there is in English literature an insurance that can be called scientific. For the word scientific, the so-called practical man often expresses contempt, notwithstanding that he daily exemplifies the scientific if he is a successful business man. Scientific is not the same, necessarily, as technical. It does not mean something difficult to understand nor anything that has no real relation or influence on actual every day affairs. Scientific simply means a logical arrangement and treatment of the facts pertaining to a particular field of knowledge.

The people are beginning to ask questions and to study insurance in a manner, and the successful insurance man of the future must know infinitely more about it than his predecessors. Legislators are showing a disposition, however slight, to learn more about insurance with a view of establishing better regulations of the business which will, if successful, mean the repeal of some laws now in force.

What Insurance Really Is.

Too frequently insurance has been confused with banking investment and what not, both in the minds of the legislator the insurance official and the agent. There is great need to return to a re-examination of what insurance really is: To emphasize the elementary and fundamental characteristics and purposes of insurance. Insurance is good enough to stand on its own merits. Banking, investment, or what not can reflect no glory upon it nor does insurance need additional glory. The insurance principle is fundamental in the nature of man. It is as old as the human race. It has had no origin, no development, no history. It is, has always been and will always be. It is the most unselfish institution of the human race. It is a temple to the golden rule. Its success, its growth, is the best proof that men grow better. It is the measure of the progress of socialized man.

THE EVILS OF WASTE—THE GOSPEL OF SAVING.Wastefulness in All Lines One of the Crimes of the Day—
The Necessity of Conserving Time, Energy, Talk and Commissions.

By Hubert H. Ward, General Agent of the Pacific Northwest, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company.

When Mr. Ward talks he always illustrates his points through the medium of some event of current interest. In this article he draws his moral from the embryonic capitol building at Olympia, Wash. This is a good distance from Broadway, but the connection is by no means far-fetched.

Waste—a subject prolific of dire consequences, not only in life insurance, but in any line of business, and particularly applicable to the man selling life insurance. Too many men are Wasteful of Time, Wasteful of Energy, Wasteful of Talk and Wasteful of Commissions.

Wasteful of Time.—I like to harp on the subject of Time, because, as I have often said, it is a life insurance agent's best asset. The agent who is wasteful of his time is his own greatest sufferer.

Wasteful of Energy.—While the moments are at the disposal of the agent, they must be energetically applied. The agent must use energy, which conveys force, in his general appearance—in the way in which he gets around—in the way in which he approaches a man, and in which he talks. The sleepy, dreamy, hazy sort of an agent never produces big results. It is the sledgehammer blow which counts in this business, and blows to be sledgehammer blows must be given with energy.

Wasteful of Talk.—Many a life insurance agent talks a man into life insurance and talks him out again at the same sitting. Some agents talk too much on the subject of life insurance, but the average agent who talks too much does so because he doesn't confine himself to his subject. He is apt to ramble on other subjects. The successful agent, among other things, tries to hold his prospect to the subject in hand, namely, the purchase of some particular policy which he is presenting.

Wastefulness of Commissions.

Wasteful of Commissions.—Some agents have a tendency to spend their commissions before they are earned. This often leads to trouble. Commissions are never earned until the policy has been issued, delivered, the acceptance receipt signed and the premium in cash or its equivalent, which means check, draft or money order (not notes) paid to the company. When all this has been done it is safe for the agent to think about his commissions. It is not wise for him to do so before then. Do not spend your commissions, Mr. Agent, before you earn them. Do not plan before you earn them how you will spend them after you have earned them. It is a good rule never to plan to spend all of any commission. Create the saving habit yourself. How better can you do this than to purchase your particular kind of a policy in your own company at the outset and add to that policy other policies from time to time as you are able to increase the amount of insurance you have.

Wastefulness in all lines is one of the crimes of the day, and it is not by any means confined to the life insurance agent. Those who get ahead in any walk in life usually do so by avoiding waste.

The "stocking" of the French nation is a proverbial expression. It signifies the saving habit of the French people. The French peasant places his small horde of savings in an old stocking for lack of a better bank and on more than one occasion, big enterprises have been financed by the French nation bringing out its stocking. The American people do not seem to have a stocking. Too many Americans have everything from automobiles, on which are mortgages, to unpaid board bills. The life insurance agent should be the great apostle for Saving, which is the direct opposite of Waste. No set of men in the country are as well equipped to preach the Gospel of Saving and the Evil of Waste as is the life insurance agent.

Wednesday of this week Mr. Mead and I spent at Olympia. The State of Washington has been trying for years to build a capitol building. Plans have been prepared for group buildings, which, when completed, will cost several million dollars. For beauty of arrangement they will probably be unexcelled in the United States. The history of the building of a Capitol building for the State of Washington seems to be replete with waste. Three attempts have been made at three different times and in three different locations. The first attempt consisted of a foundation of cut stone standing about ten feet high and covering a large area of space which was put in and abandoned over twenty years ago after expending $350,000, we were told. This whole foundation has had a wooden roof over it, which is falling into decay, and workmen were engaged in removing the old roof in order to build another temporary roof over the structure.

A House of Sawdust.

For some reason, involving waste, this foundation was abandoned, and as a second attempt, a gaudy, ugly, cheaply constructed stone building was built down in the heart of the town. It seems to be a veritable house of sawdust. It so impressed us at least, because the Northern Pacific Railroad, which runs through an open cut not more than fifty feet from one corner of the building, is putting in a concrete tunneled passageway for its trains, and as we were talking to the Insurance Commissioner, every time the pile driver came down preparing foundations for the tunnel the building shook. That is why I call it house of sawdust. This building also represents waste.

The third attempt is the beginning of the new group plan. The Supreme Court building of this new group has been recently erected and is now occupied—is a magnificent, fire-proof structure covering almost as much ground as either the first or second attempts at Capitol building. Its exterior walls at present are of rough brick, to be faced with marble later. The other buildings of this group are to be erected one at a time. When all are finished and occupied, the whole group of buildings are to be faced with marble and the beauty of the structures will then be apparent. Here again is waste. Prodigal waste on the theory of false economy. It will cost more to erect those buildings and then face them with marble than it would to erect the whole group at once, letting the exterior marble facing rise with the walls. The whole system represents waste, w-a-s-t-e, WASTE, and it made me think of certain types of agents.

Types of Agents.

One type of agent will start something, abandon it, put a temporary roof on it with the intention of coming back to finish it and leave it. That type of agent naturally does not close business. Another type of agent in his haste to construct something quick erects a house of sawdust and when attacked by the sledgehammer blows given by a competitor his structure trembles. He does not write life insurance because he loses it to the other man in competition; his building not being able to withstand competition. A third type of agent starts out with a grand scheme. His preliminary architectural plans are good, but he employs a method of construction which covers a period of months and of almost incessant interviews.

The successful life insurance solicitor does not follow any one of the three types of construction seen at Olympia. He learns how to preserve time and energy. He avoids waste. He picks out a prospect with the idea of placing a cover of life insurance protection over his head. He does not erect a foundation and leave it. He does not build a structure which will fall down on the man's head, and he does not do something greater than the man can stand.

It is the thinking agent who becomes the successful agent. In selling life insurance, Mr. Agent, the architectural work must be planned at your desk, the mechanical work must be done at the other fellow's desk. Don't forget this. Remember that too many agents have beautiful prospects on paper, but the real work that counts is the completed structure. Let the three attempts at Olympia be a lesson on which you can draw a moral for your own work in selling life insurance.

A Little Later.

The cry of the procrastinator is, "A little later—a little later and I'll attend to it."

MANANA, say the happy-go-lucky Spaniards, and after them poverty, ignorance, crime and beggary follow.

Think of the thousands of widows and orphans in this rich country of ours who have been consigned to poverty, to the poorhouse, under the sentence of "A little later—a little later," pronounced by husbands and fathers!

Life insurance says: "Take me now—take me while you can—I know no 'little later'; there's no such speech in my book of life."

The "waiting game" when it comes to life insurance is a mighty dangerous one. Just why any sane man should "take chances," when the welfare of the family is at stake, is beyond reason.

It's all right to wait if it's a matter of marrying, buying a suit of clothes, a farm or such like things, but when TO-MORROW may look you in the face and pass the fatal sentence, "too late"—too late to save the family from poverty, too late to do a duty plainly incumbent upon you NOW, then "waiting" becomes akin to a CRIME.

"A little later—a little later, and I'll insure."

O, man, get your life insurance while you can!

Let everything wait upon that duty.

Lifemen! It's your bounding duty to MAKE men insure—it's your mission to compel them to come into the fold while they may—it's your glorious privilege to nullify the sentence of "A little later—a little later."

Over a million people die annually in the United States. Many of them—yes, thank God for it, a great majority—leave life insurance as the sole means of support of wives and children—but how many—ah, so many, leave none.

And be assured, lifemen, in the prayers to God that go up from widows and orphans for the repose of the souls of loved ones who were persuaded by you to take life insurance while they could, your names will not be forgotten.—International Lifeman.

THE VALUE OF TIME.

The Life Underwriter Who Does Not Devote at Least Seven or Eight Hours a Day to Earnest, Persistent, Determined, Concentrated Solicitation Is Sinning Against Himself and His Creator.

By Robert J. Mix, Manager, Prudential Insurance Company, New York.

Here's wishing you, gentle reader, the best and happiest year that you have ever known!

Speaking of "Happy New Year," "New Year Resolutions" and all that sort of thing, I want to have a word with you this morning about that great and wonderful gift that has been bestowed upon all of us—the gift called "time!" Maybe you think that subject is somewhat trite, but let's have a little talk about it. I sometimes think that it would be a good thing if we could have constantly at our side a "mentor"—someone who should call us to task whenever he found us wasting our time! That would not be altogether pleasant, I fear, for we are all more or less flagrant sinners in this respect—but some are greater sinners than others.

It was never intended that you and I should work all the time! Not to rest or play a reasonable number of hours out of each twenty-four is almost, or quite, as great a sin as not to work enough. We have got to be reasonable about these things. I rather like the old-fashioned idea of the proper division of the day—eight hours for work, eight hours for rest and recreation and eight hours for sleep! I don't think you can beat that program very much—but there's work and work! When some men say that they're working, they're simply flattering themselves! What they are actually doing is killing time!

"Work" in the proper sense of the word means applying yourself with concentrated thought and energy to your appointed task—intense application, with your mind fixed right on the job, digging deep and industriously and with grim determination eight hours of every day—that's work! Men with the desk habit, for instance, kill hours of every day and try to make themselves think they're industrious!

Now, my brother, it always seems to me that it's the height of folly for a fellow to try to fool himself! I can understand how and why a man might attempt to fool somebody else, but that he should try to deceive himself and make himself believe that he is what he is not—that certainly seems absurd!

I read in a little pamphlet the other day something like this:

"If you lost a five or ten dollar gold-piece every day for a month, it would get on your nerves, wouldn't it? If someone held you up and robbed you of ten dollars, you would be highly indignant, wouldn't you? Do you realize that every day you waste hours you are really losing money? Your time is your capital! If you fail to keep it employed, your capital is not earning! Why not study the question as earnestly as though you were losing actual cash—why be satisfied to use but a fifth or a third or a half of your earning power when you have the opportunity to use it all?"

Now, let's get this straight! If you—you, my brother agent—are not applying yourself for at least seven or eight hours a day to an earnest, persistent, determined, concentrated effort to secure more and more and still more applications for life insurance, you're wasting time—you're throwing away money—you're sinning against yourself and your Creator!

That's pretty plain language, isn't it? Tell me—what do you think about it—do you think I'm right or wrong? Just put it up fairly and squarely to yourself and be honest about it! Are you throwing yourself heart and soul into this business for at least seven or eight hours every day, and, if not, what excuse have you to offer—why shouldn't you mend your ways? Are you contented to go on making the same blunder—to go on wasting your time in the splendid new year that's just beginning!

A LESSON TAUGHT BY THE ATLANTIC CITY CONVENTION.

Personality, Vision and Persistence Developed to a High Degree Means Almost Unlimited Success in Life Insurance.

By J. Everett Hicks, General Agent, Union Mutual Life Insurance Company, Boston, Mass.

Mr. Hicks attended the Atlantic City Convention, and very frankly confesses that it was a source of great inspiration to him. He says: "Any thinking man must have come away with vastly larger ideas of the tremendous potentialities of life insurance to complex social structure." His remarks are intensely practical.—Editor's Note.

I was greatly impressed by the proceedings of the Atlantic City convention of the National Association of Life Underwriters. Some of the dominating characteristics were earnestness, dignity and the determination to accomplish.

All of the sessions bore witness to the fact that this was no junket but a meeting of men determined to do something for each other and for the cause of life insurance, and through this for the millions of policyholders whom they represent. Any thinking man must have come away with vastly larger ideas of the tremendous potentialities of life insurance to complex social structure. It has indeed become one of its principal supports. As I attended the sessions I became more and more impressed with the great possibilities for good represented by these more than nine hundred insurance men and the other one hundred thousand who were not present.

With these things in mind it was not unnatural that I should give some attention to the men around me with respect to their ability to write life insurance, because as a general proposition the more insurance one can write the more good he can do.

Individual Production.

I have given much thought to the subject of individual production. I know many men who are writing annually less than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars who should be producing a quarter of a million. Why do they not do so? Men around them, who seem to have no more ability are doing it; why not they? I studied this problem at the Atlantic City convention also; here was an excellent opportunity to do so with so many producers present from all parts of the country.

Of course, there are many reasons why one man is more successful than another in any department of human endeavor. I only desire to call attention to three qualities which seem to me to be prime requisites for successful salesmanship in our profession. To the man possessing these qualities success will come just in the proportion to the degree of their intensity.

These three qualities are personality, vision and persistence; and with these developed to the highest possible degree, success in life insurance is almost unlimited. Witness just two men who attended the convention, one representing a production of fifteen millions and the other twelve millions of life insurance annually.

By personality I do not mean that one must be tall or handsome or richly dressed or any other thing which would make him a conspicuous figure on the street or in any public gathering—our business is done by close personal contact with the prospect. By personality I do mean character, those qualities which inspire confidence and keep it; those ineffable qualities or characteristics which some individuals possess in large measure, and which can be cultivated, I am positive, that make a man liked and trusted. All of you know what I mean because you yourselves possess it to a greater or less degree. By personality I mean reputation, that fundamental need which means more than money and more than collateral security; by personality I mean honesty, that quality which induces us to sell the man five thousand of straight life insurance, if we honestly believe that fulfills his needs, rather than one or two thousand of endowment insurance, or vice versa. Some men mistake craftiness for the quality I am trying to describe. The "Gold Brick" man may gain our confidence, but he does it by deception and not by the strength of his personality in the sense in which I am using the word.

Great confidence in one's self and in one's business, a conviction that both are on the level and of importance to mankind, will increase greatly this quality of personality.

"While doubt stands still, confidence can erect a skyscraper." This confidence will bring out another very important phase of the kind of personality which I believe to be necessary in selling life insurance and that is earnestness; rarely is life insurance sold flippantly, we are dealing with sacred things, love of home, wife, children, and we must be in dead earnest. Our prospect will often treat the subject lightly,—we must never do so. Have I made my point clear? You know or you should know that "life insurance is a business proposition of the highest character" and that "the insurance solicitor of the future, as the best have been in the past, must be a higher grade man than the salesman in other lines of business."

A Definition.

What do I mean by vision? Many things which we life insurance men must possess to be successful. In the first place an overwhelming belief in the institution of life insurance. The total amount of life insurance protection in this country is in excess of $25,000,000,000, and the annual premium payments to keep this vast amount in force is more than $700,000,000, a tremendous power for good. And yet you and I must believe, if we know the facts and have any sort of idea of the future, that fifty years from now these figures will look small in comparison. We must each believe in his own company of course, but we must also realize that after all our company is merely a small fractional part of one magnificent whole. The man if vision is not a "knocker" but a "booster" of his competitor, and this is good business. If we possess this vision of life insurance, we will talk life insurance,—not company; protection of loved ones,—not surrender values; the service that the man who insures does for society,—not dividends. Tell your prospect that if he will take $10,000 of life insurance for his family and keep it in force, he will render a higher service to society than if he gave $10,000 to an old ladies' home, because that will make old ladies' homes unnecessary; and you will obtain his signature on your company's application blank because he believes in the institution of insurance and in you. We are not selling company or surrender values or dividends, but protection to loved ones.

Human Nature Always the Same.

Again, if we have this vision we shall realize that ninety-nine per cent. of all the men from whom we solicit insurance, love their families as well as we love ours and wish to do the right thing for them. We all desire to live as well as possible and to create an estate for ourselves and our families, and these men feel exactly the same. It is our business to convince them of this truth: That life insurance is one of the surest and easiest ways of doing just what they and we desire to do. Do not be pessimistic about these men, do not talk lightly about these things with them, be in earnest, talk the thing big and for them, make it a personal matter. As Norval A. Hawkins says: "When life insurance is rightly sold, it will not be a question of 'Shall I take out a policy?' but 'How large must it be?'"

Imagination is one of the attributes of vision. I have long believed that one of the most powerful aids in closing an insurance sale is vivid imagination. Men see all around

THE TWISTER.

An ostrich buries its head in the sand and, unable to see approaching danger, believes itself protected from an enemy. The busy life underwriter immersed in the exacting and arduous routine of his calling frequently forgets that there is always an enemy in the field; and, although by reason of his circuitous methods he cannot always be seen, the results of his raids are often felt. We refer to the "Twister."

It is not so much the injury which he does the legitimate agent, nor even the injury which he does those companies whose business he steals, which constitutes the principal offense of the "Twister." These, of course, are serious enough to bring him within the police regulations of many States. But he has more grievous sins to answer for.

It is the disrepute into which he brings Life Insurance, as a whole, with everyone credulous enough to deal with him, and the injury he inflicts on individuals and families who either are mulcted in impaired insurance, or undoubtedly, in many cases, induced to abandon all insurance when their faith has been poisoned. If all the work of the "Twisters" could be traced, there would be found case after case of widows and orphans dependent on charity, or in abject poverty, earning a beggar's pittance, who but for his insidious and treacherous instrumentality would be in the enjoyment of independence and, perhaps, comparative or actual affluence.

When the confidence of the insured is weakened in any way in Life Insurance, when he is led to believe that the plan he has accepted is "a delusion and a snare," he has been inoculated with a poison which grows more virulent with time. It will spread through his entire mental make-up and inevitably he will apply to Life Insurance the principle of false in one thing, false in all. Multiply one man by a thousand, by many thousands, perhaps, and we begin to get some idea of what the labor of the "Twister" means to the multitude whom he robs of participation in Life Insurance beneficence.

Considering that the "Twister" is a man of producing ability on legitimate lines, it becomes the more difficult to regard him in any other light than that of one who finds it impossible to be honest. He is possessed of a spirit of malevolence which makes him a proper subject for summary procedure. The criminologists have already made a study of those with analogous characteristics, and apparently have come to the conclusion that there is no help for them, no way of curbing their criminal tendencies by moral suasion. They are radically bad and beyond redemption, and the only effective method in dealing with them is the invocation of punitive law where it can be made to apply.

SENSIBLE SUGGESTIONS TO SUCCESSFUL SOLICITORS

In Other Words

"COME TO THE PACIFIC WITH WARD."

It is nothing strange to find those with acknowledged ability to do well by legitimate methods who prefer to desert the higher life and accept uncertain compensation in crooked practices. It is on a par with the man of depraved appetite who would thrust aside wholesome and palatable food for offal. And medical books are full of such cases, just as the newspapers now and then tell the stories of young men and young women who have deserted comfortable homes and considerate friends for the companionship of the vulgar, the degraded and the criminal.

It has been pointed out by State authorities, by company officials, and by the National Association that the "Twister" can have none other than a sinister design in endeavoring to induce an assurant to change his insurance from one company to another. As an insurance man, he knows that in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of every one thousand cases this can only be done at loss to the insured, and his one motive is to secure pay from some source. If he can find a company to deal with him he gets his profit in commission. If he can lead the person he is twisting to make the new application himself, he demands a percentage on what he is apparently saving his victim, who later discovers that he has been robbed of the amount he has given the "Twister."

The "Twister" is the Coyote of the Life Insurance Plains, shrewd and shameless, cunning and cowardly. Were he open to the qualms of a conscience, he would realize his condition and reform it, if only for the sake of showing those who exhibit their contempt for him by thrusting him outside the pale of his one-time profession that he had decency enough left to be penitent.

But the impression has been arrived at by all right-minded life insurance men that the "Twister" is incorrigible, too dangerous to waste any more time on him is necessary to apply to him the lash of the law. It, therefore, devolves upon all members of local associations to be on the alert to detect twisting and secure such evidence as may be brought to bear with effect to secure just punishment.

The "Twister," like his compeers in other branches of confidence games, has many aliases. Sometimes he is an "Insurance Expert," and "Insurance Adviser," an "Actuarial Investigator," and many other titular things, but always a "Twister" and always worth watching.

them homeless widows and neglected orphans, daughters of other men forced to work in store and shop and worse, subject, to all sorts of temptations; they see bright boys forced to do cheap labor because they have been denied the proper education and home influence, and yet somehow it seldom occurs to them that these same things could happen to their own widow and orphans. One of the best insurance thoughts which I have seen this year is expressed in a pamphlet entitled, "Choosing a Widow." The insurance agent with imagination can make these things real and personal to his prospect in the proper way; he can show him how pitifully insufficient are his few thousand dollars of insurance protection as a barrier between his loved ones and want or perhaps crime.

Vision then is that broad conception of insurance conditions and families which makes us able to present this thing in a big, forceful broad minded manner so that our prospects will be aroused out of their sufficiency and require larger protection.

Applied Persistence.

Broadly speaking, I mean two things by persistence as applied to our profession. Having started to convince a prospect we shall be enabled, by means of persistence, intelligently directed, to force him to give us a full hearing either now or at some future time,—emphatically now, if possible. We may be obliged to use all of our personality to prolong the interview, we probably must show him the vision to the very end of his life, but with skilful persistence we hold or regain his interest and finally create the desire and write the application for $10,000 more insurance, and what a reward is ours if we believe in our work! This is one thing I mean by persistence. The other is the persistence of making calls, having interviews. Probably not one of us here has enough interviews per week. I do not believe, either, in from ten to twenty interviews per day for the ordinary successful insurance agent; that is too many, but I do believe that we should have good strong talks with, say, twenty men per week. How many of us do this for forty-eight weeks in the year? If we should do so and persist in it next year many of us would double our volume of sales, and it seems so easy.

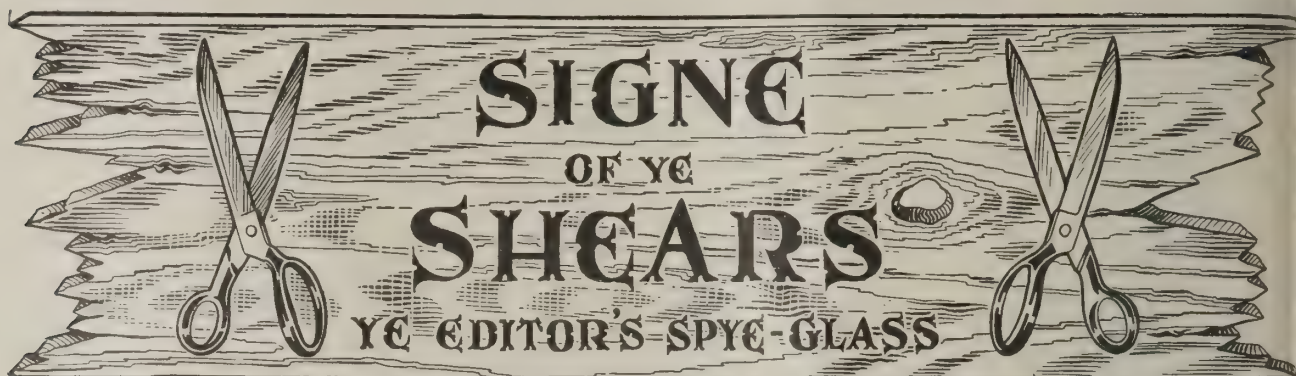

"Write on your doors the saying wise and old,
'Be bold! be bold!' and everywhere—'Be bold;
'Be not too bold!' Yet better the excess
Than the defect; better the more than less;
Better like Hector in the field to die,
Than like a perfumed Paris turn and fly."

The Part-time Man and What Is Said About Him.

"Sappers of agency energy," "traitors in the field," "destroyers of free and equal competition," "eavesdroppers," "nuisances," "spotters," "rascals," "petty thieves," "rounders," "pirates," "scavengers," "irresponsible and unintelligent sneaks," "parasitical bloodsuckers." Such are a few of the condemnatory, damnable, denunciatory and defamatory epithets which have been hurled from time to time against the part-time man, and the end is not yet—there are still a few more choice terms which will undoubtedly be employed by full-time enthusiasts to stigmatize and anathematize that class of men who are the natural enemies of the legitimate agent.

There is, of course, an honest and legitimate difference of opinion as to the question of part-timeism. Many men of high standing in the profession declare that the part-time man, whether in metropolitan or country districts, must be divorced from his work of spoliation; they are also opposed to a probationary term during which a man may determine for himself whether or not he can make a success of selling life insurance before severing his connections in some other line of business. Then again there are many prominent and reputable life underwriters who do not believe in employing part-time men in metropolitan districts except under a probationary term agreement—a professional try-out, as it were. This group of underwriters argue that the part-time man is a necessity in the country districts.

The Radicals and Conservatives both support their contentions by arguments apparently equally potent and experience equally extensive. Both factions agree, however, that life underwriting should be limited to those men only who are regularly and permanently under contract and who are recognized as bona-fide agents in their respective communities; that there should be eliminated from agency relations that class of part-time agents and one-case brokers who neither educate a prospect nor create an applicant, who are not agents in any true sense, and whose only relation to the business has been to undo or take advantage of the work of some regular agent. Both also believe that licenses should be issued to bona-fide agents only, and that payment of commissions or any compensation whatever in connection with the procurement of an application or the payment of a premium should be confined to a regularly licensed agent under written contract.

This is an authoritative statement outlining a common meeting ground of both Radicals and Conservatives—authoritative because it is the substance of a resolution adopted at the twentieth annual convention of the National association, after an exhaustive discussion of the subject involved, in which discussion both sides had ample opportunity for partisan argumentation.

Apparently, it makes little difference what phase of field activity is for the time being in the limelight, the part-time question, like the poor, is always with us, and look at it as we may, it is really one of the great problems of the home office and the manager.

A strong sentiment against the part-time man was evident at the Atlantic City convention. 'How about the part-time man?' said Bernard R. Rose, of the New York association.

"How long will he be permitted to drag this noble calling down to the level of the street huckster? * * * The only question is whether we will get rid of him ourselves, * * * or whether we shall have to experience the great humiliation of having this long overdue reform forced upon us from without." Warren M. Horner declared: "If this association will adopt and carry out the idea of an institutional advertisement, I will take my chances in these three great agricultural States (Minnesota, Iowa and South Dakota) against the other fellow who keeps up the practice of appointing the pseudo agent, the part-time agent and the unreliable and unintelligent agent." Neil D. Sills, in his address as president of the National association, said, in part: "I feel that we should take a stronger stand than ever that life insurance commissions should be for life insurance men only."

Quite recently a move toward restricting the operation of part-time agents has been inaugurated by Insurance Commissioner Robert J. Merrill, of New Hampshire, who has issued a call for information from all companies for a statement regarding their methods in dealing with part-time men. It is said that this action contemplates the restriction of licenses for such agents, and the idea is to establish a minimum amount of business below which a license will not be renewed. Commissioner Merrill has authority to put such a system in operation if he desires to do so, as an enactment during the last session of the New Hampshire Legislature gave him discretionary powers in issuing licenses.

As a matter of fact the part-time problem is entirely in the hands of the home offices, and giving credit to The Eastern Underwriter, we herewith give the opinions of a number of company officials who dictate the policies of agency management of their respective companies.

Vice-President George T. Dexter, of the Mutual Life of New York, said:

The objections commonly urged against the employment of part-time men in soliciting life insurance are largely sentimental and will not bear critical analysis.

It is desirable that the life insurance solicitor should devote his entire time to the work; grant it. To succeed in life insurance soliciting, natural adaptation to the business, training and experience are necessary. Whether the prospective agent possesses the first of these qualities in sufficient degree to insure success cannot be determined in advance. A very brief experience may in some cases prove a sufficient test; more often it is only after a course of efficient training, actual practice in the field, and long experience that the successful solicitor finds himself.

It is well known that a majority of those who enter the lists as soliciting agents fall by the wayside, or, persisting for a time, ultimately take their places in the great army of failures. In view of this fact it is cruel and it is wrong to persuade a man to abandon outright a calling at which he is making a living, or a salaried position in which he is giving satisfaction, in the hope of bettering his condition by taking up a tried and extremely difficult vocation.

Some of those who take this perilous step succeed; the majority fail, and presently find themselves "down and out," their living gone, their business or professional careers wrecked—temporarily at least. Practical experience has proved that the humane way, the only way, is to advise the prospective agent first to test his adaptation to the business by soliciting during his leisure hours, or during such time as he can appropriate without detriment to his regular business. Whatever his calling may be, he may find time and opportunity every day, or at frequent intervals, to apply the test of practical experience to his contemplated venture before staking all upon a doubtful experiment.

Every company can cite many conspicuous examples of successful solicitors secured in this way; and every insurance official and agent has seen numbers of disappointed and discouraged men, who had made the mistake of "quitting a certainty for an uncertainty."

Many of the Mutual Life's best producers wisely began their insurance careers by devoting only a part of their time to the business until they had proved their adaptation to the work. Many first-class producers have come to us, who were previously engaged chiefly in other lines of insurance work, but who gave some attention to life insurance, some of them having hesitated long before wholly abandoning an established and successful business. Numbers who still hesitate to make the apparent sacrifice continue to send in many applications yearly, and we get no better business. Many of these will sooner or later give us their whole time.

The system of recruiting the field forces of the several companies from the ranks of part-time men is general and is indispensable. The alternative would be to persuade good men to abandon occupations in which they are now successful, generally to their own great detriment, or to entice away the agents of other companies by offering greater financial inducements. The latter course, besides leading to increased expenses, would be unethical and is unthinkable. There would remain one other source from which to recruit our ranks—the derelict of the business world, the men "who failed at everything else."

In reply to your special query, I see no objection to licensing an officer or employe of a factory or similar institution, who would solicit chiefly among those employed in the plant. The latter need insurance, but under the usual regulations they cannot be solicited in the ordinary way. With the plant inaccessible to the regular solicitor, many of these employes would remain uninsured if no one connected with the institution could act as agent.

The attitude of the Equitable Life Assurance Society was described by A. R. Fullerton, superintendent of the society's Bureau of Statutory Requirements, as follows:

This society is in thorough accord with the idea of limiting the number of licenses issued, but we obtain many whole-time men who started as part-time men; men who did not feel justified in relinquishing their old positions, they being very often on a salary, until they had studied the question of insurance and obtained applications after business hours. These men have often later developed into whole-time men, that is, men who devote all their time to the soliciting of life insurance.

We make every effort in the beginning to make contracts with only such men that we have reason to believe will eventually give up their other lines of business and become whole-time agents.

R. Seton Lindsay, superintendent of agencies of the New York Life, had this to say:

As a general practice we discourage the employment of part-time men, unless these men intend to go into the business as whole-time agents later; in fact, it is our rule not to execute a contract with a part-time man unless he will put into the writing the fact that he intends within six months to give us his whole time.

Our experience shows that many of our best field men started as part-time agents, and we believe that part-time men are necessary in the business, if they are employed with a view of being made into whole-time men within a reasonable period.

The Phoenix Mutual recently issued a bulletin in which it announced its new program of agency efficiency, giving in considerable detail its views on part-time agents. This company considers the part-time problem "the real center around which future improvements in field conditions must build." Continuing along these lines and developing this theory, we read:

We have discussed the subject from every angle, conferred with our field men and with the managers of other companies. Indeed, we have secured statistics from several New England companies and found that what was true in our company was also true in other companies. Beyond question of a doubt two-thirds of the licensed agents of at least six companies and including approximately all the part-time men, secure less than one-third of the insurance effected each year. We are naturally forced to the conclusion that there is a great waste in the efforts of our managers and a waste of money involved in developing and supervising a large number of men who write only a small part of the business.

Some of the best and largest producers start in at first as part-time men. There are, however, thousands of part-time men licensed as insurance agents in some States who are not true representatives of the business and who write only an occasional case as a side line. In many cases these men are simply order takers. The business may have been sold, that is, the demand created (and the final details postponed) by a full-time man and the part-time man stumbles into the case or hears about it in some way and secures the commission which legitimately belongs to the man who made the sale and who is dependent entirely upon this line of work for his income.

We believe that we have dealt with the problem in all fairness in our plan whereby part-time men will be licensed in the future only with the understanding that a minimum amount of new business must be written during the year in order to insure a renewal of the license for the succeeding year and also that in other than rural communities part-time men shall be licensed only with the understanding that the first year is an apprenticeship and that the renewal of the license for the succeeding year depends upon their becoming full-time men. This may seem to be a radical step, but it is one which we believe is fully justified and will eventually broaden into a general movement for the elimination of the untrained, unsuccessful part-time man.

What proportion of solicitors starting as part-time men eventually devote their entire time to the business? This is a question which has doubtless occurred to every man who has had occasion to consider the part-time problem. One company—the Fidelity Mutual—has made a canvass of its field staff and has ascertained that 42½ per cent. of its agents began soliciting insurance as a side line.

The Life Extension Institute.

"Life is not to live," said Martial, "but to be well." This truism is strikingly brought to our attention by the plans and purposes of the Life Extension Institute, which was recently incorporated with ex-President William H. Taft, Chairman of the Board of Directors, and Elmer E. Rittenhouse, Conservation Commissioner of the Equitable Life, as President. Reviewing the field of activity which the Institute has mapped out for itself, we are not inclined to believe that the object of the Institute is to be summed up, as an editorial in one of the daily papers says, in the old saw, "A stitch in time saves nine." We believe that the Institute intends to obviate the necessity of even one stitch, to say nothing of the nine. That is to say, that when the organization is fully established and in practical working order thousands of the men and women of this country will have available such means as will keep them so well advised of their physical condition as to resort to such preventive and prophylactic methods as will render unnecessary the surgeon and his consequent stitch.

The Institute, while primarily philanthropic, unlike some other agencies to promote health and longevity, will be placed on a self-supporting basis. It is said that $1,000,000 will be at the disposal of the management, although it is believed that but a small proportion of this amount will be required at the present time.

On its philanthropic side the Life Extension Institute will disseminate life-saving knowledge which is to be supplied by savants from all parts of the world through the Institute's Hygiene Reference Board, of which Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, will be chairman. It is announced that Col. William Crawford Gorgas, whose remarkable fight against yellow fever in Havana and the Canal Zone has called forth commendation from all parts of the globe, will be on this board as chief consultant in sanitation. The information given by this board will be given to the public without money and without price.

As to the business side of the organization, the Institute will offer its services to life insurance companies and to the general public as examiners to determine the physical condition of policyholders and individuals at a very reasonable fee. The plans call for a large staff of physicians to be maintained at headquarters in the large cities of the United States.

The Board of Directors is as follows: William H. Taft, Chairman; Harold A. Ley, of Springfield, originator of the plan; Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale; E. E. Rittenhouse, Robert W. De Forest, Frank A. Vanderlip, Dr. E. R. L. Gould and Charles H. Sabin, of New York; Francis R. Cooley, of Hartford, Conn., and Henry A. Bowman, of Springfield, Mass.

Speaking of the scope of the Institute, Professor Fisher has this to say:

The method to be used to prolong life is very simple and the same as applied to ordinary machinery—inspection and repair. Any person, whether as a policyholder in a company which employs the Institute or as an outside individual, may have an expert examination made of his physical condition. If he is entitled to the examination as a policyholder, he has it without cost to himself.

After the human machine has been inspected, the individual will be advised to see his family physician, who will be furnished a full statement of the results of the examination—high blood pressure, or whatever the disability may be.

Conservation of Policy Proceeds.

Sylvester C. Dunham, president of the Travelers, in his address at the seventh annual meeting of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, gave some startling figures as to the amount of money lost by the American public through fraudulent schemes operated through the mails. According to Mr. Dunham $77,000,000 was the amount which, according to the Post Office Department, proprietors of such schemes had obtained from the people of this country during one year. As to just what proportion of this amount was originally the working capital of life insurance beneficiaries no estimate can safely be made. Bearing in mind the fact that "every widow is a shining mark for every mining shark," and in view, too, of feminine propensities with the proceeds of a lump sum policy suddenly at disposal, it may be assumed that the providence of thousands of husbands failed to be of practical benefit.

The Post Office Department has been unusually active during the past year in prosecuting "get-rich-quick" concerns using the mails, so that for the years of 1913 and 1914 the total loss to the people of America has been approximately $129,000,000.

According to W. H. Lamar, Assistant Attorney-General for the Post Office Department, reliance upon the courts have proved ineffective. "Criminal proceedings are necessarily slow," says Mr. Lamar in his annual report, "and by means of appeals and other methods the execution of sentence is deferred for long periods, during which the concerns and individuals engaged in such fraudulent businesses continue to reap a harvest. In some instances, the penalty being merely a fine, there was nothing to prevent the parties from continuing to conduct their schemes except fear of subsequent fines. These they could easily afford to pay in view of the large revenues derived from the businesses."

And yet there are agents who still continue to advise the old lump sum form of policy. As Charles W. Scovel said at the Atlantic City convention: "We can no longer say, 'I didn't know.'" Dare we henceforth—dare we say, "I forgot," or "It was too much trouble?"

What the Local Associations Are Doing

Life Association News has no paid correspondents. We depend entirely upon the secretaries of local associations to send us stories of all meetings of their respective associations. If an account of the last meeting of your association does not appear in this department, ask the secretary of your organization why he did not send us the particulars.

Immediately after each meeting, on the same day if possible, secretaries of local bodies should send us a full account of the business transacted, including copies of all speeches, or extracts from the most important of them.

Akron.

The December meeting of the Akron association was in the form of a noonday meeting, with twenty-five members present. The principal feature was an address by State Senator W. F. Potting on "Taxation of Life Insurance. What It Means to Policyholders."

Columbus.

Hon. James M. Cox, Governor of Ohio, was the guest of honor and principal speaker at the December meeting of the Columbus association, which was held at the Hotel Chittenden. Mr. Cox was not in favor of State Life Insurance. It was ladies' night, and twenty-three ladies were present. Governor Cox said that there had not been a complaint registered against life insurance companies or life insurance agents in any of the departments during his administration. He declared that there was no call for State Insurance or for any supervision beyond which the State now has. The Governor also made a careful comparison between the methods of the liability companies and the life companies, and explained why he thought it necessary for the State to enter certain fields hitherto occupied by the liability companies. He believed that it was not desirable for any State to engage in any business, provided it can be carried on as satisfactorily by private enterprise.

Attorney-General Timothy L. Hogan preceded Governor Cox and spoke highly of the life insurance profession and its field representatives.

Chattanooga.

A. S. Caldwell, second vice-president of the Volunteer State Life, was the principal speaker at the luncheon of the Chattanooga association, held on Jan. 9 at the Hotel Patten. The subject of Mr. Caldwell's address was "What Is Life Insurance, Anyway?" In the course of his remarks he mentioned the fact that over $400,000,000 was being paid out annually by life insurance companies in beneficences, and called attention to the great benefit this was to those left helpless and unprotected.

The association decided to send a copy of its publication, The Life Insurance News, printed every Saturday in the Chattanooga News, to every one of the local associations of life underwriters. The Chattanooga association was the first local body to inaugurate a department of its own in a daily newspaper.

Detroit.

With over 100 members in attendance, the Detroit association held its January meeting on the 5th inst. State Insurance Commissioner John T. Winship was the only formal speaker. This was the commissioner's first appearance before the local association, but he made a favorable impression. He dwelt to a considerable extent upon various forms of comparisons as advertised by some of the companies and called attention to the Michigan law which prohibits incomplete comparisons of policies by agents.

Supported by a delegation from the Detroit association, Franklin B. Mead, Secretary and Actuary of the Lincoln National Life of Fort Wayne, recently addressed the senior class of the Eastern High School at Detroit. In his address Mr. Mead explained the four principal policies in use—the ordinary life, limited payment life, the endowment and the term. The students were evidently much interested, and particularly so when the speaker cited figures compiled by a statistician of an Eastern college, which keeps records of the career of its graduates, showing that those who took up life insurance as a profession made larger incomes than those who adopted some other calling.

Duluth.

The Duluth association held its annual meeting and election of officers on the 3rd inst., with the following result: President, W. L. Smithies, Metropolitan; first vice-president, C. H. Giddings, John Hancock; second vice-president, H. I. Pineo, Penn Mutual; treasurer, Charles D. Oreckowsky, Equitable; secretary, George Wilson, State Mutual.

Fort Dodge.

"The year just closed has been the formative period of this association," said Burton H. Saxton, retiring president of the Fort Dodge association, at its annual meeting on the 3rd inst. "The motives and ideals which have governed this organization have persisted and have had direct and continuous influence on its plans. More than that, the actual results accomplished have borne out, in no uncertain way, the original claim made that the association work could and would better conditions in the local field. It is no doubt true that these conditions were at the outset more favorable for such a move than in many places, for with very few exceptions the life underwriters to whom the plans were presented were of the type which is willing to take the broader view and which welcomes anything that makes for high grade of efficiency."

M. V. Keith, secretary of the association, reviewed the year's work, calling attention to the increase in membership, and urged the members of the association to make an effort to attend the Cincinnati convention of the national body.

A movement was also set on foot with a view to holding a life insurance congress some time during the early summer under the auspices of the local associations of Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota and Minnesota.

The annual election of officers for the ensuing year resulted as follows: President, A. E. Wilder, Equitable Life; vice-president, J. O. Broleen, Northwestern Mutual; secretary, M. V. Keith, Register Life; treasurer, David P. Smith, Central Life of Des Moines.

The members of the association are now preparing a series of non-partisan educational lectures on life insurance which will be delivered at the business colleges and the high school of Fort Dodge. Arrangements will also probably be made to deliver this series of lectures in some of the principal towns of the neighboring counties.

Iowa.

Officers for the Iowa association were elected for the ensuing year at the annual meeting of the organization at the Grant Club, Des Moines, on the evening of the 3d inst.

The business formalities were preceded by the usual banquet. The officers elected were:

President, George W. Hughes, of the Aetna Life; first vice-president, M. M. Deming, of the Kansas City Life; second vice-president, L. E. Dutton, of the Metropolitan Life; secretary, W. D. Bowles, of the Phoenix Mutual Life; treasurer, H. A. Bryan, of the American Life; national committeeman, J. A. Blum, Equitable Life of New York.

Executive committee—C. M. Anderson, of the New England Mutual; Claude Fisher, of the Connecticut Mutual, and J. A. Blum, of the Equitable.

A vote of thanks was extended to J. A. Clapp, the retiring president, who made a brief response and called attention to organization problems which had been solved during the year and which he declared would smooth the path for the new officers.

Features of the meeting were the annual reports of the retiring president and committees. A feature of the president's report was a review of burdens placed on the life companies by the income tax. To these, he said, a vigorous protest was offered by the National Association. Mr. Clapp urged the formation of the committee to work against all unjust taxation against life insurance companies, which he intimated is ultimately paid for by the policyholder. He urged the idea of giving publicity to life insurance both by advertising and by means of lectures. He declared that what helps one helps all.

M. M. Deming, chairman of the printing committee, turned over the new membership cards. These cards will be given to members upon the payment of dues and will show that the holder is an insurance man of good standing. The rules were suspended and the officers were elected viva voce.

Kansas.

The Kansas association held its regular monthly meeting at Topeka, and, in keeping with its progressive methods, decided to issue membership cards and to advertise generally that a card membership in any of the Kansas local bodies was guarantee of a square deal. It was also decided to establish a bureau in which to file the names and description of men against whom complaints have been lodged. The Kansas association will ask the Wichita body and the underwriters' association at Salina to co-operate in this plan. It is supposed that when this bureau is in full operation it will eliminate certain unreliable field men who have been guilty of reprehensible field practices and who show no desire to reform.

Kansas City.

The 25th anniversary dinner of the Kansas City association was held on the evening of Dec. 20 at the Baltimore Hotel, Kansas City. Darby A. Day, manager of the Mutual Life of New York at Chicago, was the principal speaker. Ex-Governor Herbert A. Hadley and Prof. William F. Gephart, of Washington University, St. Louis, were scheduled for speeches, but both were unavoidably detained. Ex-Senator A. L. Cooper, of Kansas City, spoke in the place of Mr. Hadley, while W. H. Watlington, formerly of Oklahoma City, substituted for Prof. Gephart.

Mr. Day did not go into the technicalities of the profession, but delivered a stirring address of an inspirational character. One point which the speaker brought out and which was the subject of considerable discussion was in regard to the reservation clause which is taken advantage of by many policyholders. According to the speaker, where the insurer retains the power to change the beneficiary at any time, the policy is his own policy, and in case of financial difficulty would be listed as part of his assets. He declared that any agent who permitted a policyholder to make this reservation without fully explaining the subject was not living up to the highest ideals of the profession.

Senator Cooper spoke briefly, giving his viewpoint on life insurance as a layman. Mr. Watlington, who is a new man in Kansas City, displayed an unusual degree of oratorial ability and dwelt particularly upon the ethics of the profession.

Los Angeles.

There was an unusually large attendance at the December meeting of the Los Angeles association. One of the principal features of the meeting was the discussion on "Income Contracts," the principal speakers being W. C. Mage, of the Northwestern Mutual; L. A. Greenwood, of the Travelers, and George L. Dickenson, of the Connecticut General.

The report of the officers and Executive Committee showed the local association to be in a prosperous condition. The report of the Nominating Committee was adopted without opposition and the following officers were elected for the coming year: President, A. S. Chipron, Equitable; first vice-president B. P. Rouse, Mutual Benefit; second vice-president, W. C. Shaw, Metropolitan; secretary-treasurer, W. McClelland, Equitable.

A vote of thanks was extended to all the retiring officers, and special mention was made of the excellent work done by President Frank E. McMullen and Secretary McClelland. Mr. Chipron briefly thanked the members for the honor which had been conferred upon him.

Louisiana.

The adoption of a resolution requesting Tulane University to establish a course in Life Insurance as a part of its curriculum and discussion of methods for eliminating life insurance agency work as a "side line" comprised the principal action of the Louisiana association at a monthly meeting in the evening of Dec. 30. Wilson Williams, general agent for the New England Mutual and vice-president of the association, was host, at his residence, 1821 Marengo street. A special feature of the meeting was an address by Dr. Max Heller, rabbi of Sinai Temple.

Thomas J. Kelly, of the Mutual Life, paved the way for a spirited discussion when he made a motion that any general agent employing men to solicit life insurance as a "side line" be expelled from membership in the association. He called attention to the fact that some of the companies do employ men in regular positions, such as bank clerks, department store clerks, factory workers and others purely on account of their personal acquaintanceship and daily contact with a large number of fellow workers or with the public. He said that the employment of these "side line" agents, who are not licensed and who really are not legitimately connected with the insurance companies, is demoralizing to the ranks of men who have taken up the work as a vocation and depend upon it for a livelihood.

The sentiment expressed by various speakers was to the effect that the "side line" agency is an evil that should be remedied, but Mr. Kelly's stand in favor of peremptorily expelling general agents now engaged in the practice was regarded as being too drastic. Dr. E. G. Simmons, vice-president of the Pan-American, said that the rule against the "side line" agency would do very well in the city, but that in the rural districts, where it is necessary to constantly develop new talent as agents, a hardship to the companies would be worked. T. P. Thompson, of the Equitable, suggested an ultimatum covering a period of three months. After further discussion it was voted that at the end of one month any general agent not living up to the terms of the motion be expelled from membership, only one, Frank J. Levy, of the Equitable, voting in the negative. Mr. Levy gave as his reason the rural conditions previously mentioned by Mr. Simmons. It was stated that only three of the general agents will be affected by the new rule.

Crawford H. Ellis, president, was absent during the part of the session devoted to business, and Mr. Williams presided. Correspondence between a committee and Dr. Robert Sharp, president of Tulane University, in which the latter stated that the institution at this time did not have the necessary funds to institute a course in insurance, was read. The resolutions later adopted requests the establishing of such a course at the earliest possible time. The executive committee reported in favor of admitting to associate membership the medical examiners.

It was decided that hereafter a program and entertainment will be furnished each month by the representatives of the various companies in turn. An informal luncheon was served. Mr. Levy will entertain the association at his residence at the next meeting, late in January.

The address of Rabbi Heller evidenced a careful study into the more serious phases of life insurance and its significance as a factor in family life. He was accorded warm applause.

"There is one aspect particularly from which the work of the life underwriter appeals to me as one of the great educational agencies of our day," he said.

"The spread of life insurance signifies an education in providingness, a deepening and rationalizing of family affection, the emancipation from humiliating charity, the growth of self-control and self-respect. To large classes of our population the insurance agent is almost the only practical and forceful preacher of the duty of looking ahead. How many occupations there are, both commercial and professional, in which the workers earn comfortable incomes without ever seeming able to accumulate any appreciable amount of capital!

"When one sees, however, that despite all lessons by far the largest number of people require outside pressure to perform this duty toward those who depend upon them, one can only realize how necessary it is for every factor of publicity to strengthen and deepen a healthy public opinion which will demand protection for the family.

Louisville.

For some time past strenuous efforts have been made by the Louisville association to discourage the practice of rebating, and a reward was offered for the conviction of rebaters. However, Insurance Commissioner M. C. Clay has refused to co-operate with the association, and without the assistance of the Commissioner, the association is in a quandary as to how to go about the matter. The Legislative Committee, it is expected, will recommend two changes in the present law on the subject—one making the policyholder who receives a rebate equally guilty with the agent, and the other voiding the policy.

Western Massachusetts.

Congress was a shuttlecock that was batted from highest praise to deepest condemnation at the monthly meeting of the Western Massachusetts association in the Nelson-Haynes Hotel in Springfield on the evening of Jan. 8. More than 50 insurance men heard Joseph C. Allen, actuary of the Union Trust Co., say Congress never did a better act than when it made the currency bill a law, and then listened to Walter P. Hawkins, general counsel of the Berkshire Life Insurance Co. of Pittsfield, call certain legislation "rapacious" and "unjust" and speak glowingly of the "ignorance of leaders in Congress."

Mr. Allen was the first speaker at the talk, which followed the banquet, and he outlined the important points of the currency law, precluding his remarks with the statement that it is beyond question one of the most important legislative acts ever passed by Congress. Mr. Hawkins, on the other hand, began by saying that although the original principle of taxation of insurance companies by the States, to the end that each company should contribute annually to cover the expense of the maintenance of the insurance departments of the various States, was laudable enough, that, as the work of these departments has become simpler and the collection of taxes easier, "the assessments levied upon insurance companies have become increasingly rapacious." This same condition, Mr. Hawkins said, exists in the Federal Government.

Memphis.

The first meeting of the Memphis association for the new year will be held at the new Hotel Chisca on the 23d inst. Bolling Sibley and John E. Lippett have been named as the local Committee on Education and Conservation.

Minneapolis.

The December meeting of the Minneapolis association was held on the 27th of that month. Hon. M. C. Tift discussed "The Points of Law that a Life Insurance Man Should Know." He called attention to the responsibility of the agent, in part, as follows: "An insurance agent, or broker, who acts for another in making a contract for insurance is held to be the company's agent, and any fraudulent representation by which such agent or broker procures the payment of, or an obligation for the payment of, insurance pre-

Minnesota.

Darby A. Day, manager of the Mutual Life of New York at Chicago, was the guest of honor and the principal speaker at the last meeting of the Minnesota association, which was held in St. Paul on the 5th inst. The meeting was held at noon, and Mr. Day told how it had been possible for him to write through his agency $1,000,000 a month. He defined very clearly his idea of a successful agent, and stated that he urged his solicitors to let it be known that they were selling service. He also emphasized the necessity of fitting the policy to the individual and made reference to State taxation.

The association voted to adopt the resolution of the National Association which was passed at the Atlantic City convention with regard to taxation of life insurance funds.

Mississippi.

There was a meeting of the Mississippi association on the evening of Dec. 31 at the Edwards Hotel, at Jackson. President E. L. Ragland announced that the meeting was called to discuss matters of general interest and to close the old year with a good fellowship and get-together conference. The plans of the National Committee on Education and Conservation were discussed and unanimously endorsed. The association by unanimous vote also recommended that managers and other life insurance men in Mississippi contribute the amount requested by the Committee on Education and Conservation.

It was resolved that the association should hold its meetings regularly on the first Monday of each month in 1914, and a list of subjects for discussion should be sent in advance to each member of the association. The president read a list of subjects that he had selected for consideration at future meetings. Only a few minutes will be devoted by any one speaker to discuss any one subject. Interesting talks were made by W. Q. Cole, president of the Lamar Life; W. A. Montgomery, of the Franklin Life; Felix E. Gunter, of the Penn Mutual; C. H. Thompson, of the Reliance Life; W. E. Mallett, of the New York Life; A. C. Gunter, of the Prudential; W. H. Pullen, of the Security Mutual, and Fred Sullens, editor of The Daily News. Each speaker's remarks were of practical value to the members and the best of good feeling and good fellowship prevailed.

A press committee was appointed to represent the interests of the association and to give publicity to matters of general interest.

Nebraska.

At the annual meeting of the Nebraska association, held in Omaha on the 3rd inst., the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Tom S. Kelly; vice-president, Charles H. Johnston; secretary, W. D. Morton; treasurer, Freel B. Dale; executive committee, G. W. Noble, chairman; Franklin Mann, W. G. Preston, George T. Blandford and H. O. Steele.

Among the speakers were H. D. Neely, C. F. Junod and W. A. Smith.

New Hampshire.

A meeting of the New Hampshire Life Underwriters' Club was held at Manchester on the 9th inst. and the matter of the agents pledging five cents per thousand of paid-for business to be contributed toward the fund now being raised by the National Committee on Education and Conservation was favorably discussed. It is reported that a large majority of the general agents of this association are inclined to lend their assistance to the movement; in fact, a resolution was passed to this effect.

New York City.

Dudley Field Malone was the guest of honor of the New York association at its December meeting, which was held at the Whitehall Club at noon on Dec. 27.

President Edward W. Allen introduced Mr. Malone in a few brief remarks. Mr. Malone did not attempt to tell his audience how to write life insurance. He did, however, make an exceedingly favorable impression by outlining certain innovations which he intended to institute in the discharge of the duties of his office. He believed that it was time that we assumed that public officials were honest and that any man who exceeds above his expressed obligation to the public deserves recognition. The speaker gave a brief outline of some of the difficulties in connection with his office and stated that it was the personal element in life which interested him most.

William F. Atkinson, secretary of the association, announced the election of several new members and reported progress in investigating several cases of rebating. He referred to the fact that it was difficult to secure evidence in the cases of alleged rebating. Frequently, in his opinion, many cases were reported which were the result of mere supposition on the part of a disappointed agent. Mr. Atkinson called the attention of those present to the fact that the association had subscribed to 75 copies of the proceedings of the Atlantic City convention and subscription blanks were passed around in an endeavor to dispose of the copies of the volume in his hands.

T. Reid Fell, a former president of the New York association and organizer of the Daily Luncheon Club, announced that the regular meetings would be postponed until Jan. 5, at which time sessions would be resumed every day at the Press Club. He urged the members to take interest in the club and believed that a daily attendance could be increased to an average of 30 or 40 members.

President Allen called attention to the January meeting of the association, which will be held on the 27th inst. Edward A. Woods, vice-president of the National Association, will be the principal speaker and will discuss unjust taxation of life insurance funds.

Oklahoma.

Forgetful of premiums and everything connected with the insurance business, the Oklahoma association ate and was merry at the annual banquet and musical at the Lee-Huckins Hotel in the evening of Jan. 5.

Toastmaster J. Henry Johnson, president of the association, in a few appropriate remarks, introduced Deputy Insurance Commissioner Arthur W. Pettit, who delivered an interesting address on "Oklahoma a Miracle of Practical Progress." In opening Mr Pettit said:

"One of the axioms of science is that the whole is greater than any of its parts, and it seems to me that you good men had in mind this charitable truth when you enacted your constitution and by-laws, as your energies are directed toward the betterment of the insurance profession, rather than the advancement of the desires of any individual. It should be our steady purpose, each of us, to raise our profession to the highest possible standard, and not attempt to obtain temporary personal advantages by shams and shadows. We should fix our eyes upon the ideal and endeavor to obtain a realization of our dreams.

"When a body of men of such magnificent character, ability and intellect as is possessed by the members of this association unite their energies in a worthy purpose, the results of their labors is an improvement in organized society."

Following Mr. Pettit, Dr. Phil C. Baird, of the First Presbyterian Church, spoke on "The Power, Use and Majesty of the Mind." Rev. Baird pointed out the difference between the power of tangible things and the power of intangible things, of which he said the mind was a good example. He spoke in complimentary terms of the work done by the insurance men and how much they had accomplished in grasping the intangible and making it do their bidding.

The closing address on the program was delivered by Attorney Ed S. Vaught.

Mr. Vaught spoke in his usual humorous vein and kept his hearers in a merry mood by his sallies that were aimed at insurance men and those of other professions.

At the close of the banquet the following officers were elected:

Oregon.

The Pacific Coast membership trophy was on exhibition at the December meeting of the Oregon association, which was held in Portland on the 15th of that month. President Hubert H. Ward urged the members to make an effort to increase the membership of the local body. Secretary E. W. Smith presented his resignation, stating that he was not able to devote sufficient time to the work, and the executive committee selected Joseph H. Gray as his successor.

Mr. Ward called the attention of the members to certain editorials which had appeared in local papers suggesting that the public patronize Oregon companies only. He read a letter from the executive head of one of the publications intimating that money spent in the advertising columns sometimes influenced the editorial policy. Other matters which were discussed were the resident agents law in Washington and the ruling of the Oregon Insurance Department on the subject. The meeting closed with a debate on the relative merits of ordinary life and endowment insurance. The principal speakers were D. C. Herrin, who took the affirmative side, and H. G. Colton, who represented the negative.

Puget Sound.

"The spirit of enmity and jealousy that formerly prevailed between one insurance man and another, each struggling in the insurance field to outdo the other, now lies far in the background and a new spirit of good fellowship, friendliness and respect has taken its place."

These words, spoken by Malcolm Hughes, Seattle manager of the Travelers', sounded the predominant note at the season-end banquet and meeting of the Puget Sound Life Underwriters' Association, held in the lecture room of the Seattle Commercial Club in the evening of Dec. 29. It was an open meeting and nearly 100 insurance men were there.

W. D. Mead, State general agent of the health and accident department of the Pacific Mutual, who was one of a party of four to donate an attractive silver trophy to be contested for between the various underwriter clubs of the Coast, reported that Seattle has a good chance to take the cup at the end of the first "game," which terminated on New Year's Day. It is quite possible that Mr. Mead's opinion was well founded, as the association at this meeting admitted 84 new members. This gives this local body a membership of over 150.

Other speakers were L. A. Nadeau, agency manager of the Equitable Life Assurance Society and president of the local organization, and A. Greenwell, of the same company.

Rochester.

The November meeting of the Rochester association was held on the 25th of that month. The speakers were Willis K. Gillette, former sheriff of Monrow County, and the Rev. Paul Moore Strayer, pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church. Mr. Gillette's subject was "Service," while Mr. Strayer discussed "Temperance."

The tenth regular meeting of the association was held on Dec. 31. A beautifully decorated Christmas tree had been placed in the middle of the room and from it W. J. Bott, representing Santa Claus, distributed gifts to each member.

The annual meeting and election of officers will be held on the 17th inst. National President Ernest J. Clark has been invited to address the association at its February meeting, and invitations have been extended to the members of the Buffalo and Syracuse associations to be present on that occasion. Plans are being made to make this affair the largest of its kind ever held in Western New York.

San Francisco.

At a recent special meeting of the San Francisco association the following resolution was adopted:

"Be it Resolved, First, That a special vote of thanks and appreciation be tendered the Life Underwriters Association of Oregon, for the framing, introduction and adoption of this resolution (referring to a resolution endorsing the World's Insurance Congress);

"Second, That a vote of thanks be extended to all other associations who have up to date adopted this resolution;

"Third, That as the Los Angeles association has already joined the Oregon association in adopting this resolution, and as the delegates to the Atlantic City convention from the Los Angeles association, the Oregon association and the Seattle association all heartily co-operated with the San Francisco delegation in creating sentiment expressed in this resolution; be it

"Resolved, That all Pacific Coast associations be, and are hereby invited to co-operate with the San Francisco association in arranging for and acting as hosts to this 1915 convention of the National Association of Life Underwriters in keeping out here in 1915 of the National Association of Life Underwriters may be truly a Pacific Coast affair, and to this end be it further

"Resolved, That all other Pacific Coast associations are invited to appoint committees to arrange for special delegations to meet at some point en route to the Cincinnati convention in 1914, to the end that the delegates from all Pacific Coast associations may go there in a solid body."

The principal feature at the regular December meeting of the association was the adoption of the proposed amendment to the association's by-laws by which the age requirement of company membership was reduced from seven years to two years. There was some little difference of opinion, but the members were practically unanimous in favor of the amendment. The San Francisco Cincinnati Club was launched after a report by the committee, which was composed of Messrs. Hathaway, Bell and Osborne. This committee made several recommendations and proposed the following agreement:

We, the undersigned, members of the Life Underwriters' Association of San Francisco, constitute ourselves the "San Francisco-Cincinnati Club."

The purpose of this club is to insure a large delegation to the twenty-fifth annual convention of the National Association of Life Underwriters, to be held in Cincinnati early next fall. To accomplish this worthy purpose, we agree as follows:

First—Each signer hereto agrees to deposit with the duly elected club secretary-treasurer upon the 15th of each month, commencing December 15, 1913, and continuing to and including the month in which the convention is held, the sum of at least ten ($10) dollars.

Second—Should any signer hereto be unable to attend the convention, he may designate a substitute, provided only such substitute is a member in good standing of our association.

Provisions Governing Fund.—First—As soon as five members have signed this agreement, said signers shall elect a secretary-treasurer, who shall have charge of these funds until disbursed for the purchase of round-trip railroad transportation and Pullman accommodations, which are the purposes for which the funds are being collected, and any amount exceeding that requirement will be returned to the depositors.

Second—When the club membership is completed an election of a president and first and second vice-presidents shall take place by the member securing the greatest number of subscribers to this agreement being designated as president, and the second and third largest numbers first and second vice-presidents, respectively, and these three officers shall have charge of the trip and be given prominence in connection with the activities of the club while at the Cincinnati convention.

Third—Should any signer hereto be unable to attend the convention because of illness, or should any signer hereto remove from this territory, or for any reason leave the insurance business, the full amount deposited by him shall be refunded.

Fourth—Should any signer hereto (not being relieved by the third paragraph) fail to attend the convention, or fail to send a qualified substitute as above provided, 75 per cent. of his total deposits shall be refunded to him.

Fifth—It is understood and agreed that these deposits shall be made promptly the 15th day of each month, and that the money so deposited is for the sole purpose of purchasing round-trip tickets and Pullman accommodations, and after that is accomplished and the refunds called for above are made, if any, that the remaining moneys in the treasury, if any, shall be equally divided between the signers hereto, or their substitutes, prior to leaving for the Cincinnati convention, when this fund will be entirely disbursed.

South Dakota.

The regular monthly meeting of the South Dakota association was held on December 20 at Sioux Falls. It was expected that Insurance Commissioner Stablien would be present, but he was unavoidably detained and in his absence President George R. Douthit announced as a subject for discussion "Life Insurance for Business Purposes." West Babcock, George F. Jones, R. J. Woods, B. C. Shaw and F. H. Davis participated in the discussion, which was of great interest and brought out many new points of value to all.

Manager B. C. Shaw, of the Mutual Life of New York, paid a glowing tribute to John Mullanney, general agent of the Northwestern Mutual, who had just completed thirty years of service with that company in the State of South Dakota. Mr. Mullanney responded briefly.

Charles M. Day, editor of the Argus-Leader, spoke on the need of co-operation in any business, and ventured the idea that it was more essential in the life insurance profession than in other lines.

Syracuse.

At noon on December 20, in the Tabard Inn Restaurant of the Yates Hotel in Syracuse, the Syracuse association held its regular monthly meeting. There were thirty-one members present, which was considered a splendid attendance during the holiday season. Announcement was made by the Committee on Education and Conservation that a course of lectures on Life Insurance had been arranged for at Syracuse University, beginning the first Monday of February and continuing every two weeks for five lectures. These courses of lectures will be conducted by Charles W. Scovel, General Agent of the Northwestern Mutual at Pittsburgh and former president of the National Association.

While the course is arranged primarily for the students of the university, doubtless they will be well attended by life insurance representatives and men in other professions.

The course as outlined is as follows:

Feb. 9. Life Insurance, the Institution. Its History and growth. What it is, and whose. Its stability and permanence.

Feb. 23. Services to the Community. Economic. Social. State operation, regulation, taxation.

The association endorsed the recommendations of the Executive Committee for a compilation of a life insurance directory, to include all agents licensed in Syracuse and Onondago County, giving names and address, company represented and whether part or full-time men. This list will be compiled at an early date, and will probably be printed and a copy presented to every member of the association. Seven new members were admitted.

Tacoma.

The Second Annual Meeting of the Tacoma association was held at the Tacoma Commercial Club, Saturday evening, Dec. 27, 1913. A large number of the members participated in the banquet, which was followed by the regular business meeting and election of officers. President William Peterson presided.

A committee consisting of H. L. Pelletier, Tallmage Hamilton, Samuel McDowell, M. C. Arvidson and H. L. McConnell had been previously appointed as a nominating committee. Their recommendation was that the following Safety First!

A message to Union Central Agents

THIS new railroad slogan has a significant meaning to you.

It stands for a company in back of you—which has never for an instant digressed from its original policy of safe conservatism and wise economy—which has for 47 years tacitly and consistently considered "Safety First."

And what has been the result?

Growth in last 32 years, from the twenty-third to seventh largest company in the United States.

A reputation for soundness and safeness that is a by-word in the insurance world.

An investment system unsurpassed in safety—unequalled in high rate of interest earned.

A remarkably low death rate.

And a spirit of sane aggressiveness and sound enterprise that has "made it pay to work for the Union Central."

officers, who were installed in May of 1913, be re-elected for the coming year: William Peterson, president; Carl Widmann, first vice-president; H. L. Pelletier, second vice-president, and G. H. Jackman, secretary. These officers were elected by a unanimous vote of the association. M. C. Arvidson was elected treasurer, to succeed J. E. Horton.

Secretary Jackman's report showed that the association has a membership of 50 at the present time, and at the time of the organization one year ago there was a membership of 20. The association is in a very flourishing condition, and a great deal of enthusiasm has been manifested by the members.

The publicity committee reported that the newspapers in Tacoma had been liberal with regard to space, and that in several instances a large portion of a page in the daily paper was given over to news of the association.

The names of eight insurance agents soliciting application for membership in the association were passed on at the meeting, and six were elected to membership, while two were rejected.

Texas.

The Texas association held its regular monthly meeting on December 13 at Dallas, the principal speaker being A. B. Francisco, representing the Sheldon School. Mr. Francisco's address had to do with scientific salesmanship and was received with much interest. The association is but seven months old, but already has a membership of 167 of the leading managers and solicitors of Texas. Aggressive efforts are being made to induce all reputable life insurance men in Texas to join the association, and the life insurance men throughout the State have been invited to report to Secretary Bigger any cases of rebating or misrepresentation which may come to their attention. The association has the assurance of Commissioner W. W. Collier that he stands ready and willing to exercise all the authority with which he has been legally vested to assist the association in establishing a high standard of ethics. A special fund has been collected and the association has called the attention of all country attorneys in the State to the matter of the vigorous prosecution of those who violate the insurance laws.

Utah.

The two principal speakers at the December meeting of the Utah association were Wesley E. King, general agent of the Accident and Liability Department of the Aetna Life for Utah, Iowa, Wyoming and Nevada, and Insurance Commissioner W. F. Done. The meeting was held at the Commercial Club, Salt Lake City, on December 20. Mr. King's subject was "System in Selling." The speaker demonstrated the necessity of the adoption of a plan, and showed how unplanned effort generally fails. Mr. Done's remarks had to do with a review of the recent Chicago conference of casualty company officials, agents and commissioners.

Utica.

Systematic plans for stimulating attendance at the Cincinnati convention were discussed at the December meeting of the Utica association. The following committee was appointed to look over the matter: Edward C. Schwab, W. S. Butler and M. Oliver.

The Committee on Education and Conservation, consisting of William H. Shaw, W. F. Wallace and James M. Hay, was empowered to secure speakers for courses on Life Insurance in the local Y. M. C. A. Academy and Business College.

A feature which made this meeting particularly interesting was the general discussion on "Income or Instalment Settlements of Life Policies." The discussion was so animated that the usual closing hour, 8 o'clock, was prolonged to 10:30 o'clock.

West Virginia.

The principal feature of the January meeting of the West Virginia association was an address on "Soliciting" by O. G. Beaus, superintendent, Bradstreet Commercial Agency. A question box proved an interesting feature of the meeting and many subjects of general interest were discussed.

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS

Vol. 8.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY, 1914.

No. 6.

To the Officers and Education and Conservation Committees of All Local Associations:

Gentlemen—The Education and Conservation Committee of the National Association is glad to report most satisfactory progress in the work of the committee.

The arrangement made by President Clark with Dr. S. S. Huebner, of the University of Pennsylvania, to write the text-book is alone worth all the effort that has been put forth thus far in behalf of the Education and Conservation movement. The outline of this text-book, already submitted by Dr. Huebner and approved by the council and committee, shows that it will supply a want long felt on the educational side of Life Insurance.

Work on the institutional advertising has taken definite form and if every member of the National Association could be supplied with the copy already prepared we would have pledges amounting to $250,000 instead of $25,000.

There will be presented to the Executive Committee, at its mid-year meeting in New York, a complete and practical workable plan for publishing these institutional advertisements, even to the extent of identifying those who contribute toward the campaign, if such seems advisable, without detracting from the educational and institutional character of the advertisements.

The committee has been much gratified with the comment which has accompanied pledges, and there is nothing disappointing and discouraging in the way the pledges have come in other than that the committee has positive knowledge that hundreds of men who intended to contribute have delayed sending in their subscriptions.

The indorsement given the plans of this committee at Atlantic City, and subsequent action by the Executive Council, practically request the National Association to try out the plan and the committee are perfectly willing to stake their reputation for soundness of judgment upon what we propose to do with the $25,000 asked for.

We must, however, have money, both for the educational work and the institutional advertising, and we now ask that all members of the National Association—especially managers—respond to the pledge sent them, so that in further completing plans before the meeting of the Executive Committee in April we will know the sentiment of the majority of the National Association.

Let us give forth the example of a united front in this proposition, because even the most sanguine cannot see the tremendous advantage which will result from this nation-wide movement to the profession of Life Insurance in this country, and to the National Association of Life Underwriters in its future influence and accomplishments.

Will you, therefore, bring this before your local association meetings at the first opportunity?

No actual cash will be called for before June or July.

Yours very truly,

WARREN M. HORNER,

Chairman,

Committee on Education and Conservation.

Read and approved.

ERNEST J. CLARK,

President, National Association of Life Underwriters.

FORMER INSURANCE COMMISSIONER A. I. VORYS, OF OHIO, RENDERS IMPORTANT OPINION OF INTEREST TO ALL LIFE INSURANCE AGENTS.

AN EXHAUSTIVE ARGUMENT ADVANCED THAT RENEWAL COMMISSIONS PAID SUBSEQUENT TO FEBRUARY 27, 1913, ARE NOT TAXABLE UNDER THE INCOME TAX LAWS.

National President Ernest J. Clark and Vice-President Edward A. Woods Recommend Form to Be Used By All Agents In Making Returns, If Favorable Ruling Is Not Secured Prior to March 1.

A few of the big Eastern companies have issued instructions to their field forces concerning the method of complying with the income tax law and dealing specifically with questions peculiar to the business. All agents, general agents, managers and other field representatives will, of course, make their returns on Form 1040, as required of all persons whose income exceeds the amount exempted. This applies also to the members of agency firms, who must make returns as individuals. It is required also, by the Internal Revenue Department, that there be included in the statement of income the profits of the co-partnership, whether these profits are apportioned and distributed or not. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the district collectors have authority to compel such a statement of undivided profits.

Incorporated agencies make returns on the old excise tax form. Under the new law there are some changes from the old form. There is no exemption for corporations of $5,000, and dividends from other corporations must also be included in the income this year.

It is interesting to note that the Internal Revenue Department has practically reversed itself in two rulings on the application of the tax to annuities. On request of the Union Central, the department held that payment of proceeds of policies, "whether the same be in a lump sum or in installments, at the death of the insured, on a matured policy, or as annuities, no withholding of the tax is required." This clearly exempts annuity payments; yet, in a later ruling made on the request of the Mutual Life to pass on a specific case, Commissioner Osborn holds: "Any increment on purchase price of annuity is taxable income, and if in excess of $3,000 and no exemption is claimed, tax must be withheld."

Renewals Not Taxable.

This takes but a general view of the situation. The question which is at the present time of most interest to the members of the National Association is in connection with renewals. Notwithstanding rumors to the contrary, it is believed that renewal commissions paid subsequent to Feb. 27, 1913, but on business secured prior thereto, are not taxable under the income tax. It has been proposed that a concerted movement of all parties interested in securing a favorable ruling upon this be secured, and that if such action is not obtained prior to March 1, when returns must be made, all agents making returns withhold in the body of the income tax return the renewals on business secured prior to Feb. 27, 1913. But in order to comply with the law the following footnote should be appended. Emphasis should be placed upon the necessity of using the exact phraseology of the following form, and no local rulings should be requested by agents throughout the country:

In addition to the above, I have received certain deferred payments or renewal commissions fully and completely earned prior to February 27, 1913 (amounting to $.....) as consideration for services rendered and expenses incurred in securing certain policies of life insurance prior to said date, which I am advised by counsel and honestly believe are not "gains, profits or income, received by or accruing to me during the year for which the return is made" within the meaning of the Act of Congress of October 3, 1913, and therefore are exempt from taxation as income.

Former Insurance Commissioner A. I. Vorys, of Ohio, has rendered an opinion that renewals as outlined above are not taxable, and this opinion will be found comprising the body of this article.

It is suggested by other able counsel concurring in Mr. Vorys' opinion that the presentation of this case be made in concert, that it may be presented in the strongest possible way by the proper counsel and a carefully selected case be selected for the test, as the presentation of a less favorable case and by counsel who had not given most thorough consideration to the subject might secure an unfavorable ruling and prejudice all, and that, therefore, communication be made with National Vice-President Edward A. Woods.

Having made the return March 1, with the clause as stated, agents will have until June 1 to decide on the next step.

Numerous citations supporting Mr. Vorys' opinion, showing exhaustive investigation of the subject, will be furnished to anyone interested, upon request, by addressing

EDWARD A. WOODS,
Frick Building, Pittsburgh.

Following is the opinion of Hon. A. I. Vorys, ex-Superintendent of Insurance of Ohio, on renewals under Income Tax Law:

COLUMBUS, O., Jan. 29, 1914.

"You have requested an opinion whether renewal commissions of a life insurance agent, paid in 1913 on business written prior to 1913, should be returned as income under the Federal Income Tax Law of Oct. 3, 1913.

"You have stated that the commissions were earned in years preceding 1913; and that they represent the compensation of the agent for services in prior years, in soliciting business for the company; that upon the acceptance of the policy and payment of the initial premium, the company paid the agent a certain percentage of that premium and agreed to pay the agent a certain percentage of renewal premiums as they accrue and are paid to the company; that the agent's compensation is based solely on the service of soliciting the application and having the policy accepted and the initial premium paid; that the agent is not required to render any further service or do anything further to entitle him to the renewal commissions; and that the contract for the renewal commissions and right to receive them may be assigned to another person.

"I am of the opinion that such renewal commissions on business so written and completed prior to 1913 are not required to be returned as 'income' under the income tax of Oct. 3, 1913.

"The sixteenth amendment to the Constitution provides:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration."

"The Congress was without the power to lay and collect such income taxes until this amendment became effective. The amendment did not become effective until it was proclaimed in 1913.

"The income tax law prescribes penalties and forfeitures and probably is within the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws, and the amendment would not be held to have repealed to that extent the provision of Article I, Section 9, of the Constitution against such laws.

"It can be said that the income tax is not a law imposing penalties and forfeitures and, therefore, not within the prohibition against ex post facto laws, still a constitutional amendment, like a law, cannot be given retroactive operation by construction. The sixteenth amendment does not specifically authorize taxes on incomes theretofore earned. It provides power 'to lay and collect taxes on income, from whatever source derived.' It clearly contemplates a tax on income as distinguished from capital or property which are sources of income. It is not retrospective, but prospective, comprehending not incomes of the past but incomes of the future. Future incomes from whatever source may be taxed. The source may be labor, business or property investments, but the earnings of the past, if unpaid, were capital when the amendment to the Constitution took effect. As such capital, they may be sources of income. Incomes from such capital may be taxed, but not the capital comprised in the outstanding unpaid wages or compensation fully earned before the Constitution was so amended.

Income Defined.

"Income has been defined as 'that which is earned, remaining itself intact' (30 Hun. 177). The amendment has made a clear distinction between income and its source. All incomes of the future, whether from services, business or investments, are to be taxed. Unpaid compensation for work done before the amendment would be an investment 'source' of 'income,' if it draw interest after the amendment, but it is not 'income' liable for tax under the amendment.

"The purpose of the amendment demonstrates that it does not authorize taxes on incomes earned before the amendment. Before the amendment incomes could not be so taxed. The amendment was adopted so as to authorize in the future what the Constitution did not permit. The amendment wrought a clear, substantive change. It draws a line between the past and the future. Before that line incomes are tax free. After that line incomes from all sources are taxed. The then capital becomes a source of income. Its accretions are income. Accretions to unpaid compensation, like interest, are income, but the unpaid compensation is capital, not income. Debts due for compensation for services rendered before the amendment are, like other debts, capital. Payment of such debts after the amendment cannot be denominated income.

The Sixteenth Amendment.

"From these views it follows that the sixteenth amendment does not authorize taxation of incomes earned before the amendment took effect.

"It is important to consider that sixteenth amendment and its purpose before construing the income tax law, for the law is not free from ambiguity.

"It may, however, readily be construed in harmony with the view that incomes earned before the amendment and before the law are not to be taxed.

"The first declaration in the law is that there shall be levied and paid annually 'upon the entire net income arising or accruing from all sources in the preceding calendar year to every citizen * * * a tax of one percentum per annum upon such income.'

"If, as heretofore suggested, this law is within the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws, it could not be extended to past income, even though its language so declared.

"But it does not specifically so declare. It does not specifically provide a tax on incomes earned or that have arisen or accrued prior to the enactment of the law. As heretofore stated, retroactive operation will not be given by construction so as to subject to a tax interests acquired prior to the enactment. To be given retroactive effect, a law must clearly so provide.

"Another rule which prevails in construing revenue laws of the United States is that they must be construed strictly against the Government and in favor of the taxpayer, and that no person and no property is to be included within their scope unless explicitly placed there by the clear language of the statute. In every case of doubt, such statutes are construed most strongly against the Government and in favor of the subjects or citizens, because burdens are not to be imposed beyond what the statute expressly and clearly imports.

"This first general provision in the income tax law refers to income arising or accruing from sources in the preceding calendar year. The words 'in the preceding calendar year' apparently modify the words 'arising or accruing' and the word 'sources.' Therefore, the ordinary meaning of the clause would be that the income must arise or accrue in the preceding year and from a source in the preceding year. This construction excludes incomes whose sources are services rendered prior to the preceding year. It would exclude earnings of previous years.

A Prospective Statute.

"That statute in language and in general tenor is prospective in its provisions. It contains no provision expressly making it retroactive. It contains no provisions which imply that it is intended to be retroactive. Like the sixteenth amendment which authorizes it, the statute is designed to tax the incomes of the future—not the incomes of the past. Therefore, incomes are not taxed. They could not be so taxed under the Constitution. Thereafter, incomes are to be taxed as the amendment authorizes. The line is drawn at the threshold of the new taxation scheme. All prior accumulations are capital, and capital is not taxed by this law. Thereafter, all income, gains or profits, beyond the exemptions, are to be taxed. Income from the accumulated capital will be taxed. If that capital consists in part of debts due for services theretofore rendered, or debts due for profits of business theretofore transacted, the income from that capital will be taxed. Income from business thereafter transacted and income from services thereafter rendered will be taxed. But payments thereafter on debts for services theretofore rendered, or gains or profits in business, or trades theretofore conducted, are not incomes arising or accruing from sources in the preceding year, within the meaning of the statute.

"I have given much consideration to the meaning of the words 'arising,' 'accruing,' 'derived' and 'paid,' and of the word 'income,' to the language of former income tax statutes and the corporation tax statute, and to omission of some of these words in other statutes. I have also carefully considered Paragraph B of this statute, which attempts to further define 'income' 'in whatever form paid.' And there are many other provisions of this statute which must necessarily be studied.

Difficult Questions.

"Very serious and difficult questions arise in considering whether income earned in any year after this law was enacted, but not actually paid until a subsequent year, shall be reported as income for the year it was earned or for the year it was paid. Upon such a state of facts the real significance of the words 'arising,' 'accruing,' etc., becomes very important. If the source of the income is labor, but the income is not paid within the year, but is evidenced by a promissory note or by an account, it may be said that the income under the statutory language 'in whatever form paid' has been paid by the note or account. It may be said that the income has arisen or accrued because the debt for the services has arisen or accrued. On the contrary, there is authority for the view that the income has not arisen or accrued and is not 'income' within the meaning of the law until it 'has come in' or until it has been paid in cash or its acknowledged equivalent. Under such construction the earnings of any given year would not be reported unless paid in that year. Such state of facts and construction of the law would permit tax dodging by not paying the tax in the year when the income is earned, because the income is not paid in that year, and not paying in the year when the income is paid because it was not earned in that year.

"I assume that the courts will place a construction on this law that will not allow any such tax dodging, but will exact the tax on all incomes earned, arising and accruing after the Constitution was amended and the law was enacted. This may be by requiring annual returns on a revenue basis or on a cash basis. The statute may be susceptible of either application. If the revenue basis is adopted, then all good debts and accounts for income, gains and profits should be returned. If accounts considered good turn out bad, they can be charged off as losses in succeeding year. If accounts considered bad turn out good, they can be entered as profits in succeeding years. If the cash basis is established, then "income" will mean all income paid, although the source may have been in a year prior to the payment.

Owner of Contractual Rights.

"The question you present is, in my judgment, not involved in any such efforts at practical construction to aid in accomplishing the purpose of this statute. The renewal commissions were completely earned before the Constitution was amended and this law was passed. They were chosen in action belonging to you. They constituted part of your capital, property and estate when this law became effective. The fact that their payment to you is contingent on the premiums being paid to the insurance company does not affect the question. You were and are the owner of the contractual right to the commissions, the same as you would be the owner of an unconditional promissory note if given and held for your services. Any such promissory notes and all other property representing the accumulations and income of former years constituted your capital, property and estate at the time this law was passed. This constitutional amendment and this law are not intended to and do not tax the accumulations of income before the amendment and law became effective. Therefore, the commissions earned before that time, but paid since, are not to be returned for taxation."

LIFE INSURANCE—THE FOUNDATION OF INDIVIDUAL RIGHTEOUSNESS.

A Profession Which Seeks to Move Mankind Out of the Infancy of Impulse to the Maturity of Foresight.

By Rabbi Max Heller, New Orleans, La.

This is an address which Rabbi Max Heller recently delivered before the Louisiana association. If you are an agent obsessed with a small opinion of your mission; if Life Insurance merely spells Commissions to you, make an earnest effort to see things from Rabbi Heller's viewpoint. Have a SPIRITUAL BRACER with us.—Editor's Note.

The feeling often comes to me that, with the complications of modern life, the sphere of the pulpit has broadened immeasurably, the subjects have multiplied, a braver and more tactful treatment is called for; yet conservative as we guardians of the holy fire must naturally be, we are as yet far from having grown up to the new demands of the wider life. I will not take up your time with any attempt to enumerate all these perplexing and in their present forms virtually new problems of our industrial and commercial, our civic and social, our domestic and spiritual life; I prefer to plunge into the midst of my subject by confessing at once that time and again I have considered and weighed in my mind the propriety of devoting a sermon to the subject of life insurance.

Other subjects, of course, belonging properly to the higher realms of business, such as the ethics of financing and brokerage, the moralities of the real estate business, the benefits and the evils of corporations, the responsibilities of directors and administrators, have often appeared to me as properly coming within the purview of the pulpit, if only the minister could reach out for the intelligent mastery, the wide outlook and the discriminating judgment which might throw upon all of these the higher lights of humane benevolence and forward-looking justice; but out of all these higher commercial activities which have such boundless powers of ploughing deeply into human lives and human hearts, none has seemed to me to mean so much, not only to the primal elements of human happiness, but to the foundations of domestic peace and of individual righteousness as does the profession whose representatives I have the honor of addressing.

How little of information I have to offer you I am most deeply conscious; more than almost any other devotee of a business pursuit, the average life insurance agent must have the facts of his vocation at his fingers' ends. But in all higher work the knowledge of detail may blind us to comprehensive rules; and the minister has opportunities for entering into the intimacies of the home, into the privacies of the soul-life which teach him to appreciate the ultimate working out of things, and enable him to study the operation of business from the human side.

A Great Educational Agency.

There is one aspect particularly from which the work of the life underwriter appeals to me as one of the great educational agencies of our day. We speak of civilization as the great process by which the savage and the barbarian are lifted from the level of the brute to that of the self-governing, peace-loving, broadminded and charitable citizen. And especially we Americans who are believers in mechanisms and short-cuts, when we enumerate the agencies of civilization, we think of railroad and telegraph, of press and platform, of school and college. We are apt to forget that of all civilizing and humanizing agents the greatest is that of home-building and home-making. The habits and principles inculcated in the home, they lay the true foundation of citizenship and character; the self-control, the strength of will, the discipline of living acquired in the home, they form the pith and marrow of whatever energy, trustworthiness and endurance may form the real assets of a people's strength.

If, by these lights, we are to test our own standing among the world's nations, we shall find ourselves, by universal agreement, afflicted with one characteristic foible, a wastefulness and an improvidence which seek their parallel among advanced people the world over. We are wasteful and improvident as a nation; we denude our forests, exhaust our soil, we largely waste our coal, gas and oil, our government, with few exceptions, is conducted by the most uneconomical of methods, wasteful in its building, in its publications, its franking privileges, its pension system and a thousand other hoary abuses that might be cited; we are, if possible, even more wasteful through corruption and mismanagement, in our State and municipal administrations; but we are most remarkably and unpardonably wasteful in the management of our domestic economies and our personal expenses.

No Hard and Fast Lines.

Perhaps this particular province of our private lives may not seem to be the one with which the minister has any professional concern. In a narrow view of the minister's sphere the spiritual welfare of humanity is his proper charge, the salvation of the soul may seem, to certain small minds, the one department of work which is reserved for him. But to the honest and thorough student of human soul-life there is no hard and fast line where the interests of the body and the welfare of the soul begins. Our bodies are the earthly homes of our souls, not their prisons, but their potential sanctuaries which we neglect at our peril. Our duties to our dear ones, to the wife of our plighted troth, to the hostages which we have given to fortune, are duties of the holiest and most responsible class, but are expressed in food and clothing, in dollars and cents. These duties call upon us to exercise self-control in our personal indulgences, to practise habits of economy, to provide for emergencies of non-employment, of sickness and of death.

"One Way Out."

Just how far the average American is living up to these duties we have no available statistics to give us exact figures; but does not the most limited experience, the most superficial observation show him the inferior of the unsophisticated immigrant in all or most of these respects? A friend, only lately, placed into my hands a book which has attracted a good deal of attention, "One Way Out," by William Carleton. This volume is not first in pointing out the hardships of the middle class under the present standards of living; but it claims to have found a way out, by asking the American to lay hold of the opportunities of this country with the immigrant's earnestness, to cast off the bondage of conventional obligations, to live within his income and to achieve independence out of his amassed savings. The watchword of this author is: Immigrate, in other words, assume the conquering attitude of the foreigner who is new to the country and bends his neck to the task of becoming a leader, without aspiring to any social recognition or standing before he has won out. To my mind the evil is present, but the remedy is impracticable. The clerk or bookkeeper cannot, except in the rarest instances, go back to the work of digging tunnels; he can and he must learn the cleanness of foresight and the strength of will to apportion his income between the indispensable needs of the present and the imperious demands of the future, if he has a future.

It is here that the spread of life insurance signifies an education in providingness, a deepening and rationalizing of family affections, the emancipation from humiliating charity, the growth of self-control and self-respect. These duties are solemn enough to be taught, again and again, in the Bible, whether it be by the example of a Joseph providing for famine during years of plenty or in commending the ways of the ant to the sluggard or by praising him who casts forth his seed in the morning.

To large classes of our population the insurance agent is almost the only practical and forceful preacher of the duty of looking ahead. How many occupations there are, both commercial and professional, in which the workers earn comfortable incomes without ever seeming able to accumulate any appreciable amount of capital! The physician, the lawyer, the commercial traveler, with many other classes of large earners, tell us that they are forced to live up to their incomes, that the laying aside of anything for their old age is virtually impossible. To such people their neglect of duty comes home in the most shocking form when some friend of theirs, dying before his time, leaves his wife with perhaps a half-grown family in virtual destitution. I have seen such monuments of wrong in all their stages of suffering; and, on the other hand, as must be the experience of every minister, I have observed how keen an edge was taken from even the fiercest of sorrows and the saddest of bereavements when they were unaccompanied by the menacing specter of undeserved and often utterly helpless poverty.

Duty by Pressure.

When one sees, however, that despite all such lessons by far the largest number of people require outside pressure to perform this duty towards those who depend upon them, when one meets, in frequent instances, with parents and wives who, whether out of silly superstition, mawkish sentiment or childish improvidence, are not only indifferent to their plain interests, but who sometimes even interpose all sorts of obstacles in the path of so important a step, one can only realize how necessary it is for every factor of publicity to strengthen and deepen a healthy public opinion which will demand protection for the family, which will frown upon such remissness as a species of selfishness which from intelligent people is unpardonable.

Of late years there have been two movements in the insurance world which have made me, in common probably with many others of my profession, feel what a beneficent influence your sphere of activity is exercising on the education of the masses; I am referring on the one hand to what is called industrial insurance, and on the other hand to the effective manner in which some insurance companies have begun to look after the health of their clients. The agent of the industrial insurance company is, to my mind, a valuable teacher of the habit of saving, a habit in which especially our lower classes stand in great need of training; humble though his work may seem, wasted in many instances, the huge mass of it in the aggregate probably mounts to a schooling of the intelligence, a spurring of ambition, a bracing of self-constraint the value of which all over the Union is beyond all approximate calculation.

Health Campaigns.

Nor was a more enlightened measure ever resolved upon than the recent health campaign of some of the insurance companies. That vast corporations of that kind understand the value of health in dollars and cents, that they are willing to go to vast outlays for a protection which their contract does no call for, all this certainly constitutes a public lesson of eminent value to teach, at one and the same time, how much science can do to prolong life and how solidly and infallibly it pays the community in general to protect the health of the individual.

It is not easy for us to-day to realize how the world ever got along without the sheet-anchor of life insurance; we can hardly imagine how people managed in the early days when strong companies were liable to go by the board, much less how it was in still earlier days when the largest fortunes could be swept away, without anything left to fall back upon.

But surely the experience must be a common one which has imbued me with a strong sense of gratitude towards the whole fraternity of underwriters, the experience of the happiest relief which a young man has when, with burdens and obligations of many kinds, he has felt rather doubtful as to his chance of passing medical tests, and when at last he is told that he will be permitted to protect his dear ones from the danger of sudden want by interposing the mighty arm of a strong corporation between them and that danger. How much sweeter sleep becomes under that happy sense of security.

Far be it from me for one moment to exaggerate the power and the worth of money; there is too much bending of the knee before Mammon for any lover of his kind to add voice to the deafening din; but there is, right by the side of our groveling before wealth and its trappings, a great deal of reckless disregard of the serious obligations which material life entails, a great deal of childish living in the moment and of the moment, which, in the enjoyment of the present hour, forgets the uplifted finger of the uncertain future. "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," that is the unconscious philosophy of a great deal of happy-go-lucky living, of the genial moral indolence that ever waves all serious reflection aside as if it were a mere ghostly intruder at the festive banquets of life. "Let us enjoy with moderation, let us be calmly ready for the emergency, for any day may be our last," that is the ripened philosophy of the soldier of duty; to be one of the forces that move mankind out of the infancy of mere impulse to the maturity of foresight cannot but lend to your profession a dignity of its own among the most eminent factors that make for the uplift of humanity.

OFFICIAL NOTICE.

TO THE SECRETARIES OF LOCAL ASSOCIATIONS:

Your attention is called to Section VI of the Constitution of the National Association, which reads as follows:

"Each local association shall each year, immediately after its annual meeting and again within thirty days after June 1st, send to the secretary a correct roll of its officers and members on said dates, specifying their mail addresses, the companies they represent and in what capacity. Each association seeking admission shall furnish such roll with its application."

As the Executive Committee is anxious to obtain statistics as to the number of members which have been admitted to local associations as non-resident members, in accordance with an amendment to the Constitution at the Atlantic City Convention, please indicate the number of members of your association included in this class when making your returns to this office.

Yours very truly,

GEORGE M. WRIGHT, MAYOR OF WORCESTER, MASS., EMPHATICALLY ENDORSES LIFE INSURANCE.

A Practical Enumeration of a Few of the Reasons for Business Insurance as a Means of Perpetuating Prosperous Firms or Corporations.

Mayor Wright delivered this address before a convention of agents of the Mutual Benefit, at Worcester. The mayor is president and general manager of the Wright Wire Co., which is one of the largest wire plants in the country. There are many agents who find that some particular class of prospects always play the game of "follow the leader." Therefore, this is a good article to show to some difficult prospect for corporation insurance.—Editor's Note.

Your toastmaster and I have known each other since early youth. We were schoolmates in our native town and grew up together as boys, but in early manhood were separated for some 15 years by reason of our different callings. Later it was a pleasure to both of us that circumstances brought us together again in this good old city of Worcester.

About 15 years ago Mr. MacGowan began his work of creating my enthusiasm for personal life insurance, and I became a thorough believer in it. A few years ago he began talking about business life insurance. That was a new idea, and he found out that, notwithstanding we were natives of the same Worcester County town, in the Old Bay State, I had visited Missouri often enough to acquire the characteristic desire of the people of that State, "to be shown." He was after a time successful in convincing me that it was not only desirable, but almost necessary that a business man situated like myself should carry business insurance on his life. In consequence I was induced to call to the attention of our directors what I felt and still feel was a most desirable action. With their hearty approval $100,000 of insurance was placed upon my life for the benefit of the Wright Wire Company, and the following year enough more insurance was added to bring the total amount to $300,000.

Beginning Early.

Now I also carry a large amount of personal insurance for the benefit of my family, and I should like to say a few words about personal life insurance. I believe that a young man should begin taking life insurance as soon as he begins earning money, because he ought early to begin making provision for some return to others for all that has been done for him, and also because the taking of life insurance encourages thrift and the sense of obligation to others. By life insurance a man makes it possible for his good intentions to live after him, and he assures himself that his plans for mother, sisters, wife or children will, in a measure at least, be carried out should he die prematurely.

Every thoughtful man can call to mind pictures of anxious widows and helpless orphans whose numbers without the beneficent returns of life insurance would be a hundred-fold greater.

Insurance money is like a great bank account; it means comfort and competence where otherwise in thousands of cases there would be wretchedness and want. Better than all the theories of charitable men and women is the "spot cash" life insurance settlement in time of direst need. Personal life insurance for one's family has long been recognized as an economic necessity. Without it the whole social order would be affected most disastrously.

So much for my belief in personal life insurance. Now I have come to believe that there is as great, if not a greater, field of usefulness for life insurance in the business world.

There are many reasons why business insurance should be placed on the lives of partners in business, as well as the heads and leading spirits of large businesses and corporations, and I will undertake to enumerate a few of the most important of them as they appear to me.

Every thoughtful business man appreciates the importance of perpetuating any thriving business, and that its discontinuance or even temporary embarrassment is certain to inflict far-reaching injury upon many innocent persons. Therefore to-day we find many conservative concerns endeavoring to protect themselves and those interested in the enterprise against the possibility of crippling losses; and so they carry fire, employers' liability, burglary, credit, defalcation and other kinds of insurance. We are awakening to the tremendous importance of life insurance as one of the greatest safeguards to business assets and business permanency, a duty hitherto long neglected.

It is easy to recover from fire and burglary losses, but when the buiding energy, intelligence and possibly lifetime experience and business friendships are cut off in the death of perhaps one man the loss is great, indeed, and business life insurance alone furnishes indemnity for this kind of loss.

There are many ways by which the life of a concern is endangered by the death of a big man in it. He may be its inventive genius, or he may be its moneyed man, or the one who has represented the concern in its relations with the banks, or by training or natural ability he has been the inspiration of the selling force. The death of this man is quite likely to cripple the concern for a time. A goodly sum of life insurance money would tide things over until a new man can be found to fill the place.

Difficulty of Settlements.

In a partnership it often is a very difficult thing for the survivor to come to a reasonable settlement with the widow of the deceased partner, and many such concerns annually go out of business in consequence. Life insurance could be and ought to be employed to prevent just such disasters. Often the partner with the capital would best conserve the interests of his family by business insurance that guaranteed the return of the capital in case of his own death.

There are often several men in a large concern the death of any one of whom would entail far greater loss upon the business than any fire or casualty, for the latter are pretty well covered by insurance. Also these losses may never occur. Death sooner or later is certain. I believe the time will come when every conservative business will carry life insurance on its leading men, payable to the concern.

When business life insurance was first called to my attention it did not appeal to me. Why should we pay our large sums of money yearly for such insurance? Later I came to a proper appreciation of the matter. I was giving the best of my life to building up the business, not for myself alone, but for my family and those associated with me. It was a matter of deep concern to me that the structure I had labored hard to erect should not be weakened should I be taken away. It was a matter of concern to me that the stock held by my family and friends and by those who had bought it because of good faith in me and the company should continue to yield them as good returns even if I was not here to watch over the company's affairs.

Interim Often Fatal.

I have always felt that no matter how good a man is, given time, you can find another to take his place. But in the interim a company is likely to suffer loss in one way or another, and money is needed to tide it over this period of experimentation. In our case we have reason to feel that our business life insurance has given increased confidence to our stockholders. Our banks from coast to coast are kept informed that the company carries $300,000 of life insurance on its president and general manager, and although our credit has been excellent, it has been increased because of the business life insurance we carry. A great mercantile agency has stated that the taking of business insurance strengthens the credit of the firms taking it, and that the increased confidence it establishes is recognized in the mercantile community and thus reflected through their mercantile reports.

The commercial warfare for business success in mercantile and manufacturing fields has become so fierce and competition is so close that it is only by transacting a large volume of business at small profits that any degree of success may be attained. As a result of this condition the credit system is more extended to-day than ever before. In fact, a bank has no goods to sell but the use of money. Most enterprises are being carried by the aid of large credits, at least for a portion of each year. This credit is generally extended on the basis of personal confidence in someone connected with the corporation, and banks are more and more asking and, I believe, some day will require, as a general rule, business life insurance to protect them in case of the death of the member with whom they deal or the guiding genius or employes upon whose business or technical skill and experience the success of that particular enterprise depends.

I would be glad to see my enthusiasm for this form of business protection—commercial life insurance—become so contagious that you would be all busy writing it. It would mean fewer business failures with their attendant hardships and discouragement, and, by making prosperity permanent, would greatly increase the sum total of human happiness.

GIVE 'EM MORE GAS.

By Robert J. Mix, Manager Prudential Insurance Co., New York City.

You're spinning along over a nice bit of country road—everything's going smoothly and your car's working fine—till you come to the foot of a long hill! Now, what are you going to do? Leave things just as they are and let her wheeze and pant and struggle and finally give out before she gets to the top? No, sir—nothing of the sort; you're going to give 'er more gas—that's what you're going to do—and, when you give her the gas she's going to take that hill like a breeze! You can't take the hill away and you can't go through it—the only way to do is to get over it somehow, wherefore you "give 'er the gas" and over she goes!

'Pears like some of you good fellows have come to a hill, and there's just one thing in this world (and only one) for you to do—clap on more power—"give 'er more gas!"

It has been reported to me that in certain commercial lines business conditions are temporarily unsatisfactory, but I'm going to be hard-hearted enough to say that I don't think that that fact is a sufficient excuse for the failure of any earnest, determined agent to do a good, fair volume of business during these coming months. There are several millions of people within a radius of five miles from my desk, and no man can make me believe that among all these millions, the active, ambitious, hustling agent can't find plenty of prospects whether "general business conditions" are good or otherwise! Moreover, there are a great many professional men, salaried people and men engaged in certain lines of business who are just as prosperous as ever they were—making lots of money. Find out who they are and get after them—specialize on them if necessary!

It may be that heretofore you've found it practicable to write a fair business by interviewing an average of a half-dozen people a day, but perhaps you're now finding that your daily half-dozen calls aren't producing enough business for you. Very well, then, you'll simply have to see a dozen or more people a day—you'll have to give 'em more gas! Aren't you willing to do that? If you're not, then I can't see what's going to happen to you during these coming months—it looks as though you'd lie there at the foot of the hill till the cows come home!

The question with every one of you is not "shall I or shall I not do a good business for the balance of this year?" but "how am I going to do a good business for the balance of this year?" If you're right there at the foot of the hill, the problem is not "am I going to get over it?" but "how am I going to get over it?" for over it you must go, my brother! It's the old, old proposition that you have to face. The difficulty is there, the obstacle is in your path—very well—it must not stay your progress—you must surmount it!

For your own sake, I ask you to face the situation with open eyes! Let's not make excuses during these coming weeks but play the man—play the man—and give 'er more gas!

"THE GAME IS NEVER OVER UNTIL THE LAST PLAY IS MADE."

The Successful Life Insurance Agent a Player in One of the Greatest Games of Life—The Necessity of Great Attention to the Proper Use of "Side Lights."

By Hubert H. Ward, Manager Pacific Northwest, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co.

Mr. Ward's contribution this month is particularly interesting and replete with inspiration for the agent who needs encouragement. It is warranted to give a knock-out blow to the most stubborn case of the "blues."—Editor's Note.

The above quotation applies to life itself and it applies to almost everything pertaining to life. Life itself is a "game" and we are all "players" in that game. The more we understand the game the more proficient do we become as players, and with our increased knowledge of life does our increased proficiency in the play itself become demonstrated. I never like to look upon the business in which I am engaged as a mere something from which I am obliged to wrest dollars. It is interesting at times to philosophize on our work, to study the side lights as they play upon that work.

In illustration, how tame the average light opera, grand opera or spectacular play of any nature would be were it not for the assistance rendered the setting of the play by the use of the calcium lights. Probably no profession or business has made as great improvements in its manner of presentation as has the profession of theatricals since the days of Shakespeare, when his players were first presented in a barn and with none of the accessories furnished by the modern stage setting.

The world itself is a stage and we are the players and our acting is good, bad or indifferent, according to the way in which we master our subject and in which we make use of the mechanical devices of the "side-lights" furnished us by others.

Player in a Great Game.

The successful life insurance salesman is a player in one of the greatest games of life. In order that he may make his play a success he must pay great attention to the proper use of the "side-lights," not only the "side-lights" appertaining to the life insurance business but those appertaining to human nature itself. Human nature is a peculiar and elusive proposition. Like capital, it is timid. It must be coaxed, attracted, and having been won it must be treated right to be retained.

Your prospect is like the brook trout. You must angle for him. You must have the right fly and you must have the sinker of such a weight as will put that fly before the nose of your fish. Having got your prospect on the line by the use of the proper accessories which are furnished you by others it is then necessary for you to begin a series of intelligent maneuvering to keep that prospect on the line. You must know when to reel the line in and the most delicate part of the whole operation is the psychological moment when you undertake to transfer your prospect from the water in which he has been disporting himself to the basket in which you would place him.

Every life insurance salesman is in a sense a fisherman, and I sometimes think that one of the helpful side-lights for the life insurance salesman would be the reading of Sir Isaac Walton's book called "The Complete Angler."

Look upon your work as a game, a something in which you will take pride in accomplishing that for which you set out, from the standpoint of winning the game as well as from the standpoint of winning dollars which go with the game.

The average fisherman gives the day to his favorite sport not primarily for the number of fish which he may bring home, but for the pleasure of the sport and for the healthful exercise which he derives from it. You, as a life insurance salesman, should derive your real pleasure from the knowledge that you have furnished protection against the storms of life to the dependent ones of the prospect whom you have written for life insurance. If you, as a life insurance salesman, can early acquire this mental attitude toward your business you will find that the material returns, which are so necessary for all of us engaged in the game of life, will come as logical sequence, and frequently those material returns will come in a larger and more rapid manner by making the thought of the material side secondary in your mind to the thought of the beneficial side of your work.

The quotation which heads this letter was given to me by a friend of mine who used it not long ago as a telegram to certain business associates who expected him to meet with defeat in a certain business matter in which they were engaged, where the "odds" seemed to be against him, but he won—he won by surmounting the odds which were against him, and he also won because the proposition had merit. His desire to win would not of itself have enabled him to win had it not been for the fact that his proposition had merit. It was necessary that the two should be in combination, his own desire to win and the merit of his proposition.

The Desire to Win.

This is true in life insurance. Your proposition may be exceedingly meritorious, but you as a life insurance salesman will never get anywhere with it, no matter how meritorious it may be, unless you may have within you the desire to win. On the other hand we occasionally find a life insurance salesman who has the desire to win but who is attempting to represent a proposition or a company which is not meritorious. We also find the life insurance salesman with the desire to win lacking in a knowledge of the business sufficient to enable him to put that desire into execution. This business of yours and of mine is one of "Brains versus Brains," and in any undertaking involving "Brains versus Brains" do not lose sight of the fact, Mr. Agent, that "the game is never over until the last play is made."

If you are discouraged, if you are down-hearted, if you feel dumpy, shake off the trouble, no matter what that trouble may be. First fill yourself with the desire to win, and then having filled yourself with that desire, get into the game with a whole soul. Play the game as it should be played and never lose sight of the fact that "the game is never over until the last play is made."

The Golden Rule.

There is no business which demands a higher ethical standard than that of life insurance. There is no business where sterling worth and character count more. A man talks with his family physician, in whom he reposes all confidence, about the welfare of his dear ones; he confides to his attorney the matter of his estate. Is it not for the life insurance salesman to win such a place in the community that his advice will be sought by those who would make provision for their families.

A striking feature of our association is the large number of young men who belong to it. The spirit of brotherly love and co-operation has helped to make this the best day for our business the world has seen. If the standards of the business are higher than they were ten years ago they may be elevated higher still. I believe that all will agree that if this is done it must be done largely by the young men.

Life insurance is the embodiment of an ideal. It expresses the forethought and love of the dead for those whom they leave behind. Is it not true that a business which is an expression of man's noblest and best impulses should be conducted in a manner to represent the highest ideal of co-operation and brotherhood?—Arthur E. Bridgen.

ASSOCIATION OF LIFE INSURANCE PRESIDENTS COMPILE STATISTICS ON POLICY LOANS.

$456,000,000 Represents the Amount of Policy Loans and Premium Notes Outstanding to Policyholders at the Close of 1911.

In an endeavor to ascertain the causes of the rapid increase in the mortgaging of life insurance policies in recent years, the Association of Life Insurance Presidents has segregated by State lines $456,000,000 policy loans and premium notes outstanding to policyholders at the end of 1911. This investigation, which has just been finished, shows that the policyholders of certain recognized groups of States are much larger borrowers on their life insurance than are the people of other sections. Those credited with being the smallest borrowers are the people of the Central Northern States, the loans in that section amounting to 13.49 per cent. of the reserves estimated for that district. It is stated that the largest borrowers are the people of the Pacific Coast section, the policy loans and notes there being 20.09 per cent. of the reserves. The average for the United States for the same year, 1911, was 15.98 per cent. The reserves from which this sum of $456,000,000 was borrowed amounted to $2,853,000,000. These figures and percentages are based on the United States business of American companies holding 93 per cent. of the total assets of the life insurance companies of this country in 1911.

The investigation also included the segregation by States of policy loans and premium notes outstanding in 1907, held by fourteen companies having two-thirds of the assets of the United States life insurance companies that year. As these same 14 companies were included among the 39 reporting in 1911, the association is enabled also to present comparative figures showing the policy loan development by States and by sections of the country for the period from 1907 to 1911 on two-thirds of the business.

The per cent. of increase of the 1911 ratio of policy loans and premium notes to reserves over the 1907 ratio for such loans and notes to reserves varies from 10.74 in the New England States to 37.93 in the Southwestern States for the two-thirds of the business indicated.

The results of this investigation and also data showing the annual growth of policy loans from their inception are contained in a report submitted by Robert Lynn Cox, general counsel and manager of the association. This report appears as an appendix to the proceedings of the seventh annual meeting of the association, which have just been issued.

In compiling this geographical distribution of policy loans, the association had recourse to the general investment statistics previously contributed to it on two occasions by a large number of companies in connection with meeting the arguments of supporters of legislation to compel local investments by life insurance companies equalling 75 per cent. of their reserves in different States. These two sets of original statistics grouped policy loans and premium notes by States, as they did all the other classes of investments held by the companies. It, therefore, was possible to utilize fully, in the investigation just closed, all the figures as to loans and notes.

Much more than half a billion dollars of life insurance protection will be lost to widows, orphans and other beneficiaries as a result of the policy loans now outstanding, according to the report. It is declared that experience shows that a large proportion of the insurance protection withdrawn by policy loans is never replaced, the money being invested elsewhere or wasted.

In making the report public, Mr. Cox says that no conclusions are stated in it. "The figures, which speak for themselves as to the extent and distribution of the policy loan practise, are presented to the American public," he said, "in the hope of stimulating a study of the underlying reasons for the recent large expansion in such loans and the presentation of remedies therefor."

SPECIAL COURSE OF LECTURES AT THE UNIVERSITY OF PITTSBURGH.

Pittsburgh Association Responsible for Excellent and Comprehensive Course of Study on Life Insurance Under the Direction of Prof.

Ira G. Flocken, M.A.

That life insurance is a subject of intense interest, that it may be discussed in a broad and practical way, that, contrary to popular knowledge, or lack of knowledge of the subject, its mysteries can easily be explained will undoubtedly be realized by the students of the University of Pittsburgh and others who may attend the course of lectures recently arranged by the Pittsburgh association. This course is connected with the regular course of life insurance study in the evening school of economics and finance of the university. The course and the lectures are scheduled for the Monday evenings of the second semester, Feb. 2 to June 1, the lectures dating fortnightly from Feb. 16. Anyone, whether a regular student of the university or not, by paying a small fee, may take the entire course, which includes the study of Prof. Gephart's "Principles of Life Insurance" and the "Yale Readings in Life Insurance" under the direction of Ira G. Flocken, M.A.

The eight lectures are free to the general public and form part of the country-wide educational and conservation movement started at the Atlantic City convention. The local committee, composed of Charles W. Scovel, former president of the national body; Thomas S. Pomeroy, of the New England Mutual, and Chauncey O'Neill, of the National Life of Vermont, has arranged for these practical talks to be given by the association's strongest men, as follows:

JUNE 1—Examinations.

New Association at Atlantic City.

As one of the direct results of the Atlantic City convention, it now seems quite probable that a local association will be organized at that place. A number of local insurance men met recently in the office of William C. Walker & Son, local managers for the Fidelity Mutual, and discussed matters relative to the general good of the profession. It was decided to employ an attorney to draft a proposed amendment to the insurance laws of New Jersey to prevent twisting. Those present at the meeting in question were: Howard R. Cloud, Penn Mutual Life; William C. Walker, Fidelity Mutual; Ralph H. Bogle, New York Life; Granville H. Steelman, Jr., Massachusetts Mutual; Edward A. Wilson, Mutual Life of New York, and J. A. Vance, Prudential.

Why a Man Should Insure.

A man's wife is dependent upon him for support. Support means money. Few men save much; they are in danger of losing what they do save, which if followed by an early death leaves no estate for the wife's support.

A few dollars a year paid now for life insurance means several thousand dollars when it is most needed.

Children need support, money, shelter, food and clothing, as well as the wife, but children need more—an education—one that takes years and much money to get; the education they would get if their father lived. Insurance of a sufficient amount will assure the wife and children all the necessities of life, and some of the luxuries and an education.

A man's first creditors are his wife and children, next his father and mother. Business, however, does not recognize love and devotion, but demands dollars for dollars. A man should insure heavily enough to:

Pay off all debts, taxes and mortgages, and have enough left to Support his wife for life and his children to maturity.

No man need do more than that—but none can do less and die with his face to the light. No man dies twice; if he could he would be heavily insured the second time. The poorer a man may be, the greater the need of insurance. The rich man needs insurance to protect his estate. It's not man's fault if he dies. It is man's fault if he dies and his death means a loss to those who trusted him and a burden for his friends to bear.—Travelers' Bulletin.

REPAYMENT OF POLICY LOANS.

The Difficulty of Dealing With Policyholders Who Are Indifferent, Speculative or Unfortunate.

By O. W. Carpenter, General Agent, Union Central Life Insurance Co., Cleveland, O.

It may be assumed that inasmuch as policy loans are a matter of policy contract by reason of the public demand, both by competition and legislation, that a company is safely guarded by the limits of the reserve, the surrender charge and the security of the policy itself, with the result that, in the event of lapse, there is safety to the company, fairness to the withdrawing policyholder and no unusual hardship to the persistent policyholders. Nevertheless, there is loss to all interested parties under a lapsed policy, and the danger of a policy loan is that it becomes a deferred surrender, in which event the company almost invariably loses a healthy policyholder, the premium and interest income is surely lost to the company and consequently the agent's renewal fades away. Then, less selfishly, but even of greater importance is the extravagance of the policyholder, who, by lapse loses the very estate he for years has been trying to create. Nor does the loss end there, but increases when the applicant takes out another policy at an advanced rate. The policyholder always wastes when he lapses insurance.

There are certain circumstances under which loans should not be depreciated, such as loans on endowment policies approaching maturity, loans on policies yielding no income to the company or agent, such as paid out or paid in policies. There should be no objection to lending to the thrifty policyholder, or to the wealthy policyholder, for these classes ordinarily will maintain their interest and repay their loans.

Problems of Importance.

But we have in addition to these the shiftless policyholder, the indifferent policyholder, the speculative policyholder and the unfortunate policyholder—and the handling of these various classes constitutes our problem. The unfortunate man suffering from sickness, financial reverses or loss of position is justified in making a loan, and if he fails to keep up his interest, pay his premium and repay his loan, that is an additional misfortune, probably beyond his control, and, if so, certainly beyond ours. The shiftless man, the speculator and those who do not have a sacred regard for their insurance, form a class that is susceptible to proper efforts on our part.

When a policyholder comes into our offices and desires a loan we should endeavor to feel out the situation. By a little diplomacy we can ascertain whether it is necessary to make the loan, whether it is not possible to secure the money from some other source, gradually leading up to where we can point out to the policyholder that his policy is among the most sacred assets in his possession; that in making a loan against the policy he not only lessens the amount of insurance he is carrying, but that he is mortgaging the estate of his wife and children, and that it should be the last thing he should touch for his own benefit.

Of course, this will not often have a deterring influence, especially since the loan value has been one of the prominent factors guaranteed him in the sale of his policy, but seeds of higher appreciation have been sown and the applicant is then prepared for the next step consisting of the matter of details of the loan; that it is to his interest and to the interest of the company to have the policy unencumbered, and for the purpose of assisting him in the repayment of his mortgage, the company will accept his note for the full amount for a year, with the privilege of partial or full payments any time before that time, and that if there be any doubt of repayment within the year the company will extend to him the privilege of annual repayments extending over a period of five years.

And right here I desire to state that the Company made a wise move for the repayment of policy loans when they changed the time of repayment from five years to one year, or partial payments extending over five years, but unless the agent impresses on the borrower the fact that he should lift the mortgage against his policy at his earliest opportunity, and that the Company expects him to meet these notes when due, the sole object aimed at by the Company in reducing the time of its loan notes, will be lost, and instead of having more repayment of loans, we will have more renewals of loan notes.

All agents, cashiers and general agents should regard a loan as an infringement on a sacred estate, the privilege to be exercised only under the direst necessity. They should plead for early repayment; urge this for the policyholder's benefit; and by similar suggestions should endeavor to change the mental attitude of the borrower. So that when the indifferent policyholder thinks of a loan on his policy as the first available asset in time of adversity, an educational and persuasive talk, such as I have briefly hinted at, would bring about a different mental regard for his policy, would revive the feelings which were engendered by the agent who sold him his first policy, would reclaim the reverence lost by disregard; in short, a higher appreciation of life insurance would be instilled, resulting in prompter payment of interest, more repayments of policy loans, and fewer lapsed policies.

THE VALUE OF SYSTEMATIC WORK.

The Best Plan Is One That Is Progressive, Showing Results at Its Various Steps and Not Dependent on a Sudden Burst of Speed.

By Charles J. Rockwell, Field Supervisor, the Edward A. Woods Agency, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Beyond a doubt every agent has determined that he will make his spring business the best of his career; and that he will put forth his best efforts to make it so. But just what plan of work he has settled on, if any, is not so clear to him. Determination is a necessary and quite important part of an agent's equipment for work; but alone it will not accomplish much. There must be a plan, carefully worked out, clearly understood, and followed absolutely.

The old idea of work hard to-day, and let to-morrow take care of itself, is gone, with other old and exploded ideas and notions. The salesman who succeeds to-day is following a definite plan of action laid down by himself or his manager. The doctrine of luck and chance is obsolete, and we have in its place to-day scientific methods and systematic work; and from these follow, as certainly as day follows the dawn, the golden harvest of better results secured more easily.

In other lines educated, systematic salesmanship has superseded the old order of unorganized, haphazard ways and methods; and if we would meet the merchants, manufacturers and big business men on an equal footing, we, too, must adopt the plan they have found so successful and systematize our work. Scientific salesmanship systematically applied will be generally recognized and adopted by employers of large numbers of salesmen within the next five years, because of the lessons being taught them by its successful application to-day; and we may say without hesitation that the men in our own profession whose achievements stand out before us in such dazzling glory, are the ones who have employed the highest degree of system in their work.

From the days of our childhood we have been taught that wishing for something will, alone, not bring it; we must do something to get it; and even a strong determination to achieve something is but a step beyond wishing for it, unless we go another step and adopt a definite plan of action, directly leading up to and having for its final and ultimate end the result we aim at. This must be a plan we can and will follow. It must be possible, clearly conceived and not visionary. It must be a progressive plan, showing results at its various steps, and not dependent on a grand finale or sudden burst of speed to complete it. It must be a true system.

Such a plan would be for each agent to set for himself a certain volume of business to be secured during the remainder of this year. To divide it by the number of months remaining of the year to get his monthly quota; then by the number of weeks in each month. Then set out to produce that amount or more each and every week remaining of this year. Can we do it? Of course we can do it! Nothing is impossible that has ever been done. A steady and regular weekly production is not only possible, as shown by the records of many others, but it will soon under the new order of salesmanship become common. And from being common it is but one step to being compulsory.

But present methods, unless planned with the idea of steady production in mind, cannot be relied upon to accomplish it. It need hardly be said that to become a steady producer you must first be a steady worker. Not a little-work-to-day; none-at-all-to-morrow, and then a heart-breaking finish-the-day-following style of work will never do in the world. You must follow a plan of work calculated to bring the results you strive for. You must work every day, and do an equal amount of work every day; see a equal minimum number of people every day, and give an equal number of good earnest interviews every day. You need not fear that your work will become machine-like; it cannot do so; meeting so many different people will bring out different problems to be met, and keep your work sufficiently interesting. And even if it does become somewhat machine-like, but successful, is that not to be preferred to interesting, work-when-I-please-and-fail methods?

The Pacific Coast Membership Contest.

The officers of the National Association and members of the Executive Council have been greatly interested in the membership contest of the Pacific Coast associations. It will be recalled that William L. Hathway, Hubert H. Ward, John N. Russell, Jr., and W. D. Mead offered a trophy to be awarded on the basis of increased membership, the first period of the contest to consist of the months of November and December, 1913. C. I. D. Moore, secretary of the Pacific Mutual, was chairman of the committee of award, and has just announced that the Puget Sound association won the cup in the first period of the contest. This association will hold the trophy for the six months ending June 30. The following list indicates the increase in membership in the five Pacific Coast associations: Puget Sound, 94; San Francisco, 6; Portland, 3; Los Angeles, 60; Tacoma, 15.

THE TAXATION MATTER.

Of all unjust impositions on the American public, the greatest is the taxation of Life Insurance funds beyond the amount necessary for efficient supervision by State authorities. There is no good argument to the contrary. The policyholders of legal reserve companies of this country—the land of the FREE and the home of the BRAVE—paid during the year 1912 approximately $13,000,000 for the PRIVILEGE of being permitted to insure their lives so that their dependents would not in future years be a burden to the State.

The provident people of the United States of America—a nation born in a bitter struggle against TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION—are now legally compelled to submit to a form of taxation as indefensible as that which was foisted upon the Colonists. And it was the same old spirit of '76, always present in an American gathering, which engraved the archives of the National Association at the Atlantic City Convention, a mighty protest praying for relief from further exactions, which would increase this extortionate levy to the extent of possibly $6,000,000.

All members of the National Association are familiar with the story of the results accomplished by the Atlantic City resolution, which called upon Conference Committee of the Senate and the House to strike from the Income section of the Tariff Bill that section which taxed the refunds to policyholders. This resolution, telegraphed to President Woodrow Wilson and to all members of the Conference Committee, supported by the personal work of Edward A. Woods, Lawrence C. Woods, Henry J. Powell, John Dolph, Ernest J. Clark and others not identified with the National Association, saved the policyholders in legal reserve companies over $3,000,000.

When, at the Convention, the taxation matter was discussed, and afterward, when it became apparent that the resolution had effectively accomplished the purpose for which it was launched, rumors were heard that the National Association had overstepped its provinces, that it had to a marked degree usurped the field staked out for other agencies. Whatever the motives which gave birth to this view of the matter, it must be said that this resolution and the consequent activities of association members in its support, developed the greatest and most complete coup in the history of Life Insurance and legislation. Because this was the first spectacular demonstration of the power of the National Association is no reason to assert that it should not have been attempted. Indeed, it should not matter through what instrumentality the redress was secured. The only appropriate action from all sources should be congratulations.

This much should also be said: there is nothing in the constitution of the National Body to limit or confine its field of endeavor. Much to the contrary, there is an illimitable latitude of purpose expressed in its object, which is, "To advance the best interests of the cause of true Life Insurance." Thus with nothing to prohibit, with all to encourage, the action contemplated became a duty—a duty to the organization, to Life Insurance as an institution, and, perhaps greater than all, a duty to 25,000,000 policyholders.

The 20th Century has set a terrific pace and this is now almost ancient history, but truly magnificent as were these results, we are still face to face with the fact that legal reserve Life Insurance is taxed approximately $13,000,000, and every cent of this enormous sum eventually comes out of the pockets of men who voluntarily assume an obligation to save money for the State. Considering the statistics of the year 1912, we find that the total premium income for that year was $666,000,000. Therefore, for every $1,000 of capital which the policyholders paid in that year, the State appropriated about $20.

The problem is not one which will be ameliorated by passive inaction. The situation demands aggressive resistance against greater injustices and makes imperative concerted agitation for a readjustment of taxation to a sound and just economic plane, which level will be found when taxation ceases to be, as John Stuart Mill says, "A direct discouragement to prudence and forethought."

It was not a spirit of fatuous elation over its success in securing a modification of the Income Tax Section of the Tariff Bill, as related to refunds, which caused the National Association through its Committee on Taxation to assume the further responsibility of awakening public sentiment against the standing burden of $13,000,000. The organization could not escape a duty to which it was pledged by its constitution, and then again its membership permitted of opportunities which could not be found in any other body of Life Insurance men.

National Vice-President Edward A. Woods, who is also chairman of the Committee on Taxation, has repeatedly called attention to the facts that the National Association is the only body representing to 25,000,000 policyholders, all of the companies in all sections. As a concrete example of possibilities in spreading the propaganda, Mr. Woods recently said: "Suppose 100,000 agents had a five minutes' talk once a day for two hundred days a year—that would mean 20,000,000 people reached in one year." This is by no means an exaggeration of what could be done through the National Association.

What would be the influence of the opinions of 25,000,000 tax-enlightened policyholders on legislators, whether State or National? William H. Hotchkiss said at the 1911 Convention of the National Association, at which time he was Superintendent of Insurance of the State of New York, that the agents should make insurance legislation their business, "not for selfish reasons, but for the common good." To quote further: "In no kind of law-making does the average legislator more need reliable advice than in this specialty. . . . Who is the natural spokesman of the policyholder? Not the company, but the agent. Why may he not, as the spokesman of both—yes, of the public itself—guide the departments and legislators, toward laws that shall always be broad and fair?"

On the second day of this month, before the St. Paul Association, Senator James D. Denegre, chairman of the Insurance Committee of the last session of the Minnesota Legislature, delivered an address in which he gave utterance to certain statements which support and vindicate the theories of the Committee on Taxation. Senator Denegre said in part:

"Now a word with reference to the attitude of insurance towards legislation. There is too strong a tendency to denounce our lawmakers for the existence and growth of this tax. The leaders in life insurance are too prone to criticize and ridicule members of the Legislature and charge them with being unscrupulous and looting trust funds. The members of our Legislature represent the average intelligence and intellect of the community. Most of them are insured and anxious to protect the rights of policyholders and of companies. Create among the buyers of insurance a sentiment for lower tax rates. Organize your policyholders so as to create through them this sentiment. It will then soon be reflected in our legislative halls. Leave out the antagonism and criticism and get together on what is fair and right."

This is a remarkably strong endorsement and justification of the policy of the National Association in assuming a task of tremendous importance; a complete and authoritative corroboration of the effectiveness of the campaign mapped out by the Committee on Taxation. And the germ thought is: CREATE AMONG BUYERS OF INSURANCE A SENTIMENT FOR LOWER TAX RATES. IT WILL THEN SOON BE REFLECTED IN OUR LEGISLATIVE HALLS.

Educating the Beneficiary.

Samuel B. Love, manager of the Mutual Life of New York at Richmond, Va., is of Scotch-Irish descent. When ever we think of him—and we do quite often—that old “gag” comes to mind, to wit: “Pat, where did you’re ancestors spring from?” “Begorry, they sprang from no one; they sprang at them.”

Samuel B. Love never dodges opportunities; he springs at them. He was largely responsible in landing the Memphis convention for that city, and when he removed to Richmond he immediately started in to secure the convention for Richmond.

Therefore it was with great pleasure that we read in the Evening Journal (Richmond, Va.) that Mr. Love delivered a lecture before the Women’s Club of Ashland on “Life Insurance as Related to Women.” We were also informed that at the close of the address Mr. Love invited the ladies to ask questions relative to the subject.

Mr. Love should be, and hereby is, enthusiastically and unanimously congratulated. To express the matter succinctly, though inelegantly, Sam has the right “dope.” We know of nothing more practical, nothing more truly beneficent, nothing more influential for lasting good to the service of life insurance than the education of Woman as to what life insurance really means to her.

Forbes Lindsay, associate manager of the home office agency of the Pacific Mutual, discusses this subject in the semi-annual policyholders’ number of the Pacific Mutual News. Mr. Lindsay’s deductions are much too important to escape general attention, so the article follows:

In view of the fact that the National Association of Life Underwriters is inaugurating a system for educating the general public in matters relating to life insurance, this would seem to be a peculiarly fitting time to advance the suggestion that a distinct need exists for the education of those who are or who may become beneficiaries under life insurance policies and the recipients of indemnity derived from them. Such education should have for its aim three specific purposes: 1. To inculcate an appreciation of the values of life insurance protection. 2. To instill careful ideas and encourage the preservation of the policy. 3. To teach the necessity of economical and prudent disposition of its proceeds.

If the active influence of women should be generally exerted in favor of life insurance, the greatest potential factor for its development would be brought into play. At present the prevalent attitude of women toward this, a matter of most vital concern to them, is that of indifference or antagonism. This attitude is, without doubt, largely due to ignorance. We know the prejudices, misapprehensions and selfish motives which prompt women to oppose life insurance. It is within our power to reduce or eradicate these adverse influences by a system of direct education.

The literature of life insurance companies is practically all addressed to the prospective policyholder. Why not address some of it to the prospective beneficiary? Can we not impress the wife with a realization of the husband’s duty to protect her adequately with life insurance? Can we not induce the mother to insist upon the proper protection of her children by the father? It would seem probable that these objects might be attained by directing toward women similar agencies to those employed in the education of men.

How much insurance might be saved from lapse if the interest and understanding of the beneficiary were greater? Thousands of women who consent to the surrender of their husband’s policies would not do so if they understood that replacement is only possible on the passing of a satisfactory medical examination and the payment of a higher rate of premium.

In another respect, it would be highly advantageous to excite the care of women for the conservation of policies. Loans would be less frequently applied for if the beneficiaries had a better appreciation of the impairment of the protection entailed by them. The pitiful ignorance on the subject is made evident by the numerous claimants who actually imagine that the death of the insured cancels such liens.

The ultimate object of life insurance is the payment of a death claim and that is its chief function. But it is questionable whether a company’s interest in the matter should cease with the discharge of its contractual obligation. If it be possible by the exercise of a benevolent influence to enhance the security and scope of the provision made for the beneficiary, it would seem to be justified by business policy no less than altruistic consideration.

Thousands of claims are paid yearly without the attention of beneficiaries being drawn to the advantageous instalment option available to them. Tens of thousands of checks are handed to inexperienced widows without a word of warning against swindlers or a hint of advice as to safe investment. A leaflet of purely disinterested character would serve a useful purpose in this respect.

The income policies, now sold by nearly all companies in one form or another, are the most effective mediums for the protection of insurance money against loss and waste. The sale of these policies would undoubtedly be considerably increased by educating beneficiaries to the peculiar advantage of them.

Let us educate the beneficiary. Here is a vast field of opportunity, arid only for lack of reclamation. Let us irrigate it with intelligent instruction and the yield will be a doubled per capita holding of life insurance within two generations.

The plans of the National Committee on Education and Conservation take into consideration the important influence which women exert in life insurance. The proposed country-wide campaign of institutional advertising would appeal just as much to the women of this country as it would to the men.

In the June, 1913, number of the News we gave editorial consideration to the great necessity of educating women as to life insurance. Portions of our editorial received marked attention from various sources, and we have since seen no reason to revise or modify our opinion of the situation. We still believe that, as the matter now stands, woman is the cause of life insurance; an unconscious and indifferent cause, with no relation to the act or to the ultimate effect of the act. She is not dynamic in the situation. The act of a husband taking out insurance and the protection which accrues to her at the time when material support is most needed are merely incidents, and she as the cause as well as the beneficiary has not been volitionally active. In nearly all business transactions the cause is virile and compelling, and the stronger the initial impulse the more surely and quickly follows the resultant act and the consequent effect.

Therefore life insurance as it is written to-day, speaking broadly, has its genesis in a "dead center"; a policy is placed on the life of a man not because of the cause, but rather in spite of the cause.

Why not vitalize the cause? Why not weld together in the proper sequence of all business transactions cause, act and effect? It can be done and will be done if the plans and purposes of the National Association's Committee on Education and Conservation are accomplished.

The Part-Time Problem.

Resuming our discussion of the part-time question, to which we gave considerable space in the January number, particular mention should be made of the action of the Louisiana association with regard to men who solicit life insurance as a side line.

Dismissing from consideration the pros and cons of the situation as it exists in New Orleans, the association at its December meeting passed a resolution whereby any general agent or manager, at the end of one month, who employed part-time men would be expelled from the association. So far as is known, this was the most drastic action taken by any local body with regard to this phase of field activity. Indeed, this resolution was rescinded at a meeting of this body held on the 30th of last month and a substitute resolution was unanimously adopted which recited in part:

"Be it resolved, That this association deprecates the practice that exists in New Orleans, on the part of some general agents and managers, in giving rate books indiscriminately to clerks, bookkeepers and others who are not regular full-time agents or legitimate part-time agents. * * * This association hereby places itself on record, while recognizing in many instances the necessity for the use of the legitimate part-time agent, as deprecating and decrying the abuse of the so-called part-time agent and as discountenancing the practice by any company of accepting business from so-called part-time agents in competition with other full-time agents."

Insurance Commissioner Robert J. Merrill, of New Hampshire, has been instrumental in rendering the life insurance fraternity a great service, for, by reason of his inquiries to some offices having representatives in New Hampshire, executives of these companies have been compelled to state their attitude in connection with the part-time agent. This is an exhibit which is of more than little interest, because the life underwriter is fully aware of the policy of the company he personally represents, but the official viewpoint of other companies has hitherto been more or less of an enigma, or, at best, a subject of conjecture. So far as our knowledge extends, the action of Commissioner Merrill has brought to light the only symposium from company officials on part-timeism.

We are told by The Eastern Underwriter that Vice-President E. E. Rhodes of the Mutual Benefit believes that part-time men are necessary.

We think that under certain conditions the employment of part-time agents is fully warranted, and that very unfortunate conditions would result if the companies were not in a position to employ such men. There are many men who find it difficult in their present vocations to provide a comfortable living for their families. They cannot, however, afford to give up their present salaried positions to work elsewhere on a commission basis until they have demonstrated in such spare time as may be at their disposal that they can earn more as insurance agents than they can otherwise. Unless such men can be employed as part-time agents, they must give up their present positions and become connected with a life insurance company under an arrangement by which the general agent or the company itself agrees to pay them a salary which will enable them to live until they have demonstrated their ability as life insurance agents. This plan is expensive for the general agents or the company, as for some time it will require an outgo in excess of the earnings. We think you will agree with us that the employment of part-time men under the above conditions is a benefit both to society and to the life insurance companies, in that it makes a man a better producer and enables the life insurance business to be conducted more economically.

We realize that part-time men are sometimes employed under conditions which are not as free from objection as those referred to above, but we think that the benefits of the plan far outweigh the objections. Our aim is to develop part-time men into full-time men as rapidly as possible.

Edward B. Preston, general manager of agencies for the Travelers, in reply to Commissioner Merrill, said in part:

We most cordially commend your determination to "limit the representation of insurance companies to genuine insurance agents," etc., and your evident determination to treat with common fairness applicants for license who will devote part time to the insurance business as well as those who devote their whole time to such business. We have in past years set to work "an officer" and now and then "an employe of a factory or similar institution to work mainly among the workmen connected with such a plant," and in many cases with success and entire satisfaction. The writer set such an employe to work in a paper mill in Lowell 45 years ago, who succeeded so well that in a year or so he left the mill in which he was employed and became a special agent of this company and succeeded in doing a large business. He continued in the insurance business during his whole life.

Now and then an officer of such or similar corporations, desiring that his employes be insured, is at considerable pains to induce them to insure against accidents and take out life policies, not on account of the commissions received on the premiums, but because of a desire that his employes be insured. The writer commenced this sort of business in a tannery in Rutland, Vt., more than 40 years ago and has encouraged more or less of it ever since. The teller of a bank commenced canvassing for this company from a bank in which he was employed, directly across the street from this office, in 1864 and 1865, resulting in his appointment as special agent in 1865, and in 1866 his appointment to the general agency of the company in the city of New York, representing us in that capacity for 25 or 30 years; at any rate, until he died. The principal of a school in the province of Ontario was set to work getting business, incidentally, of course, resulting finally in so much success that he was appointed our general agent in Toronto, where he represented us very successfully indeed until his death. In such cases, after a few months' trial, if unsuccessful, we have been in the habit of discontinuing the relation.

We believe this to be a good practice and one which you can heartily favor if the business is well done from the start to the finish. We do not favor the appointment of any part-time agent who evidently desires to receive commissions on his own risk and possibly risks of his brothers or people in his employ or in some way closely identified with him in business or otherwise. Putting it another way, we most heartily favor the licensing of any such as go into the business as bona fide agents, whether they will devote their whole time or only part of their time.

Not long ago a butcher in the State of New York made application for a license, and also a barber, both of which applications we did not approve. On the other hand, lawyers, bankers, real estate agents and principals of schools, and now and then a clergyman, in order to earn a little extra money, desire to be appointed agents, and we encourage such men and have set to work many, most of the time resulting in success. As a rule, if not enough business is done in the course of a year to warrant a renewal of license, we do not ask for renewal. I have given you a few instances which may help you to reach a conclusion. Many more could be given covering an experience of nearly 50 years.

If applications from such and similarly situated men are carefully considered, getting bottom facts, in the light of our experience, there appears to be justification for not dictating hard and fast rules which forbid the licensing of every way worthy people who will give but a part of their time to the insurance business.

Commissioner Merrill is also in possession of a declaration of part-time principles from the Prudential. President Forest F. Dryden had this to say:

While we have several part-time special agents, as indicated on the list, conditions in the State, occasioned by a sparse population widely scattered in small communities, seem to demand this arrangement. It is, however, emphatically true of every representative of the Prudential that he performs a definite service for any compensation received by him. This company makes no advances to agents, and we believe that frequently during a period of education a man who may ultimately make a great success of the business must be permitted to engage in some other employment during a portion of his time. It is always our purpose and that of our managers to develop the part-time agent to such an extent that he will find it advantageous to devote his entire time to life insurance. Our manager, therefore, instructs and canvasses with the agent with this purpose constantly in view and seeks to impress upon him the opportunities of the life insurance field.

William H. Sargeant, vice-president of the Massachusetts Mutual, carefully explained to Commissioner Merrill the attitude of that company on the subject involved. Mr. Sargeant goes into the question so thoroughly that practically the entire text of his letter follows:

It is our opinion that carefully selected part-time men have a place in the field organization of a life insurance company. When one considers that no general agencies of a company—outside of those located in large centers—have more than a limited number of full-time men enrolled in the service, it will be appreciated that to properly serve his own, the public's and the company's interests the general agent must rely on the assistance of helpers or part-time men. In many States, notably New Hampshire, large cities are few and far between, and the population is widely distributed in towns of varying size, many of which are not easy of access, making the expense of travel—railroad, hotel and sundries—of the full-time man, particularly the general agent, heavy in the extreme, if he is to properly cover the field assigned him. In many of the towns or districts in your own and other States there is not enough regular life insurance business to make it an object for a man to devote his entire time to this particular line, with the result that part-time men who are residents of the community and who have other means to assist them in earning a living are enlisted by the general agent, that he may secure a portion of the business which the population of the district affords. As an illustration, take a young attorney, a school teacher or a clerk, all of whom, for one reason or another, have time on their hands, and who are desirous of adding to their income by taking on some special line of work. And such persons are frequently secured by the general agent to represent him in their towns and surrounding country.

Another class of persons who perhaps are less active than would be the part-time man includes the baker, the postmaster, the general store merchant, and even ministers. General agents are naturally attracted to these persons as helpers because of their standing in town; and to secure introductions to prospects from them is a favor for which they consider it proper to make some compensation. To be on friendly terms with such persons as these enables the agent, in advance of a proposed trip, to inform them of his coming, that they may prepare lists of friends and acquaintances to whom he can be presented. This secures for him a saving of time in the various localities where helpers of this kind reside. It enables the agent to go about his work quickly, as his reception is usually more cordial when he is presented by a townsman than would be the case were he to attempt to secure an interview without such assistance.

Right here, we might say, that when general agents seek advice of us as to proper compensation to these persons we invariably recommend a less amount than would be accorded by him to full or part-time men. It is our opinion that the full-time man should be the one to receive the largest compensation; next, in proportion, comes the part-time man, and last the helper. We appreciate the difficulty confronting the general agent in this matter of compensation. We realize that he is not likely to pay more than he is forced to to the men in his employ. He must, however, be governed, to a great extent, by what other general agents are paying for similar work, for if he does not meet them he will lose his men. Good helpers and good part-time men are soon known in the localities in which they work, and their services are eagerly sought for by energetic and hustling managers.

Not infrequently the part-time man will be a young man whose present business connection is unsatisfactory, perhaps to the fact that it offers no future, and he is therefore anxious to make a change to a field more promising. He hesitates giving up a fixed salary for a commission contract, and, consequently, takes this means to study the business and determine whether or not he is qualified to succeed as a solicitor. Frequently men of this class in this way find that life insurance is their field of work, and eventually become full-time men, and even sometimes raised to the rank of general agent. If they had not in the beginning been encouraged in this way they perhaps would still be behind the counter in the bank or the retail store.

The propriety of licensing an officer of a factory or similar institution is a difficult problem from our point of view. I can imagine cases where an officer might with justice be licensed, but on general principles I would view with some suspicion an application from such a person were it stated that the purpose was to solicit among the workmen connected with the plant. My reasons for entertaining this view are that, as a rule, an officer is not on terms of intimacy with his workmen, and many, it seems to me, would be loath to approach them on the subject of insurance whereby they would be the gainer as the result of the transaction.

With the employe in a factory or similar institution the case is, to our mind, different, as a clerk, foreman or other factory employe could with propriety canvass among his fellow-workers during his leisure hours and by well directed efforts add to his resources. Clerks and other employes are on a more equal footing than would be the case with the official and are more likely to be successful in this line than the officer, many of whom do not come in contact with other than those in the office,

Among the Local Associations

Akron.

Fred C. Dibble, general agent of the Massachusetts Mutual, was elected president of the Akron association at its annual meeting held last month. The other officers selected were as follows: Vice-president, W. W. Peters, Prudential; secretary-treasurer, C. L. Harmon, Northwestern Mutual. Executive Committee—F. W. Sweet, John Hancock; M. Wade, Equitable; G. F. Fricker, Connecticut Mutual.

The secretary's report showed that the membership had increased approximately 25 per cent. during the year.

Baltimore.

Opposition to the taxation of life insurance was the keynote of the addresses at the annual banquet of the Baltimore association held at the Emerson in the evening of the 14th inst.

The principal speakers were United States Senator Lawrence Y. Sherman, of Illinois; National Vice-President Edward A. Woods; Ernest Judson Clark, of Baltimore, president of the National Association, and Douglas H. Rose, of Baltimore. William H. Danner, president of the Baltimore association, was the toastmaster.

Among the guests, besides those mentioned, were James McC. Trippe, Speaker of the House of Delegates; Boyd A. Reinhardt, member of the House of Delegates; Rev. Edwin Barnes Niver, rector of the Christ Protestant Episcopal Church; Jacob W. Hook, Tax Collector of Baltimore, and Charles O. Hall, Deputy Insurance Commissioner.

President Clark in his address made the assertion that the United States was the only civilized nation in the world that taxed a man's efforts to protect his dependent ones, in event of his death, from poverty, distress and illiteracy, and that this tax by the several States amounted at the present time to more than $13,000,000 per annum, with a purchasing power of $550,000,000 additional insurance.

Mr. Woods began by saying that it was a fortunate time to discuss this subject, after the victory of last year won before Congress in defeating amendments which would have added at least $6,000,000 and possibly $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 to the burden already borne by American policyholders. The President and both houses of Congress, after a consideration lasting all summer, decided that life insurance was itself a self-imposed tax by the thrifty class of the community, principally to provide for their wives and children and thereby save the State from later dependency, and that it was uneconomic to tax a tax.

Senator Sherman was received with much enthusiasm, and said in part:

"We read in the proverbs of Solomon the following admonition:

"Go to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways and be wise, which, having no guide, overseer or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer and gathereth her food in the harvest."

"The foregoing was written some time before the present income tax law of the United States. The ant seems to be the only prudent, industrious living thing that has escaped its provisions. It undoubtedly is an oversight and the meat this industrious insect provides in the summer and gathers in the harvest will be promptly taxed. It is the ant's earning capacity and frugality that the wise maker of the proverbs had in mind. It was the provident insurance against the time when summer should be gone and no harvest at hand, when the animal and vegetable world furnished no support. It was the earliest form of life insurance observed by the biblical sage and philosopher.

"The income tax law, among other things, provides that the expense of conducting a business is a deduction from the gross income of that business. All interest paid may be deducted. All local taxes on the property employed in the business may be deducted. Machinery or mechanisms of every kind may have something taken out for the depreciation in wear and the like. A dynamo or a steam engine wears out. Worthless debts may be figured out. Loss by storms, fire, flood, elemental accidents of all kinds may be deducted. The net income after the expenses are taken out are taxable in the hands of either an individual or corporate owner.

"A man may insure his delivery wagon horse and deduct the premium. The bank in which he deposits his money carries burglary insurance. The bank is allowed to deduct the premium on a burglary policy in computing its net income. We now come to the earning capacity of the individual man. If he owns the roof that shelters his family, or in which he carries on his business, he may subtract the fire insurance premium from his gross income. He may insure his merchandise and his live stock and take it out as an expense. If he attempts to insure his own life, the greatest economic asset in his family, the premium cannot be deducted as other expenses are. The law encourages insuring a horse and discourages insuring a human being. This happens in an age when some are talking incessantly about social justice. This seems like a legislative sarcasm, but it is a solemn as well as a disagreeable truth.

Boston.

The annual dinner of the Boston association was held in the evening of the 10th inst., in Young's, more than 150 members and guests assembling to honor National President Ernest J. Clark.

President Clarence C. Miller of the local association was toastmaster and at his right and left were seated President Roland O. Lamb, Vice-President A. A. Rand, E. B. Holmes and Walton L. Crocker, of the John Hancock Mutual; Vice-President D. F. Appel and Assistant Secretary Frank T. Partridge, of the New England Mutual; Francis Marsh, President Decker, of the Maine association; James G. White, Col. W. H. Dyer, Elmer E. Silver, Alex S. Browne and Emil Schwab.

President Miller reviewed the work of the association in its 31 years. He said that companies reporting to the Massachusetts Insurance Department alone as of Dec. 31, 1913, exclusive of the industrial insurance, will show about $13,500,000,000 of insurance.

Alex S. Browne, of the New York Life, spoke of the qualities of Francis Marsh, treasurer of the association since its inception, who recently resigned, and presented him, on behalf of his members, a mahogany hall clock. On the inside of the clock door, on a silver plate, was inscribed, "Presented to Francis Marsh by the Boston Life Underwriters' Association, Feb. 10, 1914, in recognition of 31 years of service as treasurer."

"The taxation of life insurance premiums by the different States is a blotch on American civilization," said Mr. Clark. "It appears all the more shameful in contrast with the attitude taken by other civilized nations, and it is surprising that the general public will stand for the injustice of the situation; the people fail, no doubt, to realize that they pay the tax, not the insurance companies.

"It is of the utmost importance for all concerned to educate legislators. Legislatures and the general public in the matter of life insurance. It is to be remembered that next to the ministry we are dealing with the most important question in the world, namely—death—and that notwithstanding all legislation and criticism we are endeavoring as far as it lies within our power to alleviate the poverty and distress which usually follows in consequence of death with all that poverty means in its effect on disease, vice, illiteracy, and even crime."

Thomas A. Mullen paid a tribute to the character of life insurance companies.

The "goodnight" address was cleverly made in rhyme by Col. W. H. Dyer.

Buffalo.

Among the speakers and guests of honor at the regular January meeting of the Buffalo association were W. H. Wall, former president of the Rochester association, and C. M. Brown, field superintendent of the Aetna Life. Four new members were admitted.

A special feature of the meeting was a question box. A considerable number of questions were asked, and the president called upon members for an answer.

Chattanooga.

Louis M. Coleman, United States District Attorney for East Tennessee, declared at the February meeting of the Chattanooga association that it is not necessary in this age to make a legal argument to convince the business man that life insurance is no longer a luxury, but a necessity in the economy of life. "The hazards of every business," said he, "are so great that a man is almost criminal if he does not protect his family by a life insurance policy, or himself as well as his family by an endowment policy which may be collected in his old age or time of adversity."

The meeting was held at the Hotel Patton at noon on the 7th inst. Paul J. Kruesi, president of the Chamber of Commerce, delivered an interesting talk on "The Abuse of Policy Loans."

Chicago.

Edward A. Ferguson, Illinois manager of the Union Central, has been selected by the nominating committee for president of the Chicago association. J. F. Johantgen, of the New York Life, who has been chairman of the executive committee, has been named for vice-president, with B. C. Howes, of the Union Mutual Life, for secretary, and Hervey S. Dale, manager of the Union Mutual Life, for treasurer. P. J. Kraus, of the Metropolitan, is slated for chairman of the executive committee, the other nominees being A. V. Weil, Fidelity Mutual; Joseph Loebe, Berkshire; F. H. Merrill, Mutual Life of New York, and H. E. Tank, Travellers. The election will take place at the February meeting, which will be held in the banquet room of the Auditorium Hotel on the evening of February 19. Darby A. Day, vice-president of the association, will preside.

Cincinnati.

That the taxation of life insurance is wrong and against all economic principles, and that it will not be tolerated for a moment by the millions of policyholders throughout the United States once it is properly understood, were the principal ideas advanced by National Vice-President Edward A. Woods in talks given on the 10th inst. before the Cincinnati association, at the Business Men's Club, and at the University of Cincinnati, before the College of Commerce.

Mr. Woods stated that the 1913 tax on insurance amounted to over $13,000,000, a sum which would have purchased $550,000,000 more insurance. It added 14 per cent. more to the refunds or dividends returned to policyholders, aggregated several times over all the salaries paid to officers of all life companies, took $63 from every $1,000 paid the widow, and kept the total cost of insurance to the policyholder two per cent. above where it should have been.

"Ohio is one of the most culpable States in the Union," said Mr. Woods, "in the tax it imposes upon life insurance policyholders, collecting in 1912 $796,655.55 from life insurance companies to pay the expenses of the Insurance Department—amounting to $35,824.41 for supervision of all insurance companies. The original purpose of taxation of life insurance companies was merely to pay for the cost of insurance, and here is the great State of Ohio taxing its thrifty policyholders some three-quarters of a million dollars over the cost of running the entire department. Out of every $100 paid by a citizen of Ohio for life insurance $2.50 is taken out for the State coffers before the premium ever reaches the home office.

How the original design of the bill, namely, to protect Ohio companies, has been defeated was pointed out by the speaker. Only a fraction of the business of any Ohio company is done in its own State, yet almost every other State has retaliatory laws under which Ohio companies are taxed 2½ per cent. because of the action of Ohio in charging foreign companies that same rate. This gives Ohio the largest taxation rate of any State in the Union and severely handicaps its companies in the other States in which they are operating.

Cleveland.

Charles W. Scovel, of Pittsburgh, was the guest of honor of the Cleveland association at its regular monthly meeting, held on the evening of Jan. 13, at the Hotel Statler. In the absence of President Herman Fellingner, Vice-President A. D. Hatfield presided. Mr. Scovel discussed "The New Family Service of Life Insurance." The substance of his remarks was practically along the same lines as his address on the same subject at the Atlantic City convention.

Colorado.

Commissioner of Insurance Epsten, of Colorado, was one of the principal speakers at a recent meeting of the Colorado association. The Commissioner is opposed to the taxation of life insurance funds and believes that it should be reduced if not removed altogether. He said in part:

"My position on this question can be summarized in thirteen words: I believe that it is fundamentally wrong to levy a tax on insurance.

"I need scarcely assure you that I hold no brief for any insurance company and that my prime interest is the highest good of the public. Why then this definite position on the question? The reason is very simple: the law of Colorado commands me to make such recommendations, in my annual report to the Governor, as I may deem proper upon the subject of insurance. One cannot prepare a recommendation on a comprehensive and important subject as this by sitting in his office with the door locked and communing with himself. He must confer with all interested parties, secure every point of view, learn every phase and study every angle of the situation before he is prepared to make a proper recommendation, as the law commands. I am, therefore, presenting the matter to you to-day and propose to confer also with the Fire Underwriters, the Casualty Underwriters, with our State Tax Commissioners and with representative public men in order to secure as much light as possible before making any recommendation to the Governor of the State of Colorado.

"Is the question important enough to justify all this time and trouble? The statistics speak for themselves. The average life policy in Colorado, as in the United States generally, is about $2,000. There are in the United States about 25,000,000 life insurance policies in force, covering nearly 10,000,000 voters. The number of fire insurance and casualty policies I do not know at the present moment, but believe it is equally great. The total amount of money taken annually from the policy-holders of Colorado by taxation is about $250,000 from the policyholders in all the States it is about $18,000,000; from the holders of life insurance policies alone the total is about $13,000,000 a year."

The election of officers resulted as follows: President, P. H. Showalter; first vice-president, L. G. Mulnix; second vice-president, R. E. Hooyer; secretary-treasurer, C. M. Reich.

Columbus.

Henry H. Steiner, manager of the Equitable of New York, was elected president of the Columbus association at its recent annual meeting. Other officers elected were: Vice-President, M. D. Donham, general agent of the National of Vermont; secretary, Ray Rhoads, special agent of the Northwestern Mutual; treasurer, Ralph W. Hoyer, of the John Hancock. The executive committee will consist of the four officers and Albert Speaks, of the New England Mutual; J. F. Stone, of the Equitable of Iowa; B. L. Lewis, of the Connecticut General; J. I. Behling, of the Northwestern Mutual, and M. C. Tyndall, of the Aetna Life.

Connecticut.

The regular January meeting of the Connecticut association was held at Waterbury. J. A. Jackson, of the literary department of the Mutual Life of New York, demonstrated by means of a chart the component parts of a life insurance premium.

A motion was made to have the delegates of the several New England associations meet the president and secretary of the local association at the annual meeting to be held this month in Hartford.

Dwight G. Holbrook, as chairman of the publicity committee of the association, suggested that every member of the association send to him any newspaper or magazine clippings regarding life insurance which come to their attention. It was further suggested by Mr. Coyle that the members cultivate the acquaintance of their local reporters who were very glad to obtain items with regard to life insurance which would serve as news matter.

The annual meeting of the Connecticut association was held on the evening of the 12th inst., at the Hartford Club, in Hartford. It was decided to prepare for a conference of New England associations in the near future and a temporary organization was formed with the following officers: President, H. S. Waldron, Springfield, Mass.; vice-president, Otis D. Arnold, Worcester, Mass.; second vice-president, E. E. Decker, Portland, Me.; secretary, Lee C. Robens, Hartford, Conn.; chairman of executive committee, C. C. Miller, Boston, Mass. At the banquet the principal speakers were National President Ernest J. Clark; Vice-President E. E. Rhodes, of the Mutual Benefit; W. S. Ashbrook, agency secretary of the Provident Life and Trust; Dr. J. Warren Harper, of Hartford, and Dr. E. T. Bradstreet, of Meriden.

Delaware.

A special meeting of the Delaware association was held on the 9th inst. in the grill room of the Hotel Du Pont, Wilmington. Several amendments to the constitution were adopted as follows:

CONSTITUTION—ARTICLE 3.

Membership.

Any person who is licensed to write life insurance in the State of Delaware or vicinity for any regular legal reserve company, as defined by the Constitution and By-Laws of the National Association of Life Underwriters (revised Aug. 19, 1908, Sections 1 and 2 attached hereto) shall be eligible to membership by vote of the association shall be divided into resident and non-resident members.

(a) The active membership shall consist of active life underwriters representing legal reserve life insurance companies. Should a vote by companies be demanded, in writing, at any meeting, by two members, representatives of different companies, each company represented at such meeting will be entitled to one vote only, each company's delegation present to designate the member authorized to exercise their privilege.

(aa) Non-resident membership shall consist of active life underwriters not engaged in agency work in Wilmington, Del., who may, however, if they desire, be elected to active membership. An applicant for non-resident membership can be elected only after favorable recommendation by the executive committee, who shall decide whether or not the applicant is eligible to be transferred to the active roll by vote of the association upon payment of the prorated dues for the remainder of the fiscal year.

BY-LAWS—ARTICLE 5.

Annual Dues.

The annual dues for general agents, managers of agencies, and superintendents of agencies of life insurance companies shall be $5, to be paid immediately after election to membership. The annual dues of other resident members of the association, not included in the above-named titles shall be $2.50. The annual dues of non-resident members shall be $1. Failure to pay the annual dues within 30 days of election, or of the annual meeting, may cause the forfeiture of membership. The secretary is required to report to the executive committee the names of all delinquent members.

Detroit.

The annual meeting of the Detroit association was held at the Edelweiss Cafe on the evening of the 2d inst. with an attendance of 63. Several new members were elected.

Retiring President Henry Farmer reviewed the work of the past year, stating in part:

"I wish to call special attention to the work of our legislative committee because it demonstrated two things: That members are willing to place their time and money at our disposal for the good of all; and, secondly, that freaky and ill-considered bills aimed in ignorance at the life insurance business may be amended or defeated if only some one competent to speak for the business will show that such measures are not in the best interests of the public. The gentlemen who composed the committee and who procured the amending of several mischievous bills are John J. Oliver, Charles E. Baxter, Col. Will A. Waite, George L. Bahl, H. Wibirt Spence and William Van Sickle. In this connection I would strongly urge that this association endeavor to secure the election of the next legislature of a life insurance man, so that we may have some one to properly represent the interests of our business and defend it against the attacks of possibly well-meaning but ignorant parties.

"The educational movement in life insurance was given a start in Detroit through the efforts of our committee, headed by Lawrence Cameron Hull, who secured the acquiescence of the school authorities in our plan to have lectures delivered in the high schools. Two lectures have been delivered and more are in prospect. The important point is that we have made a beginning."

The following officers were unanimously elected: President, M. H. Zacharias, Connecticut Mutual; first vice-president, J. L. Scott, Prudential; second vice-president, Ernest W. Owen, Sun Life; secretary, John Sibley, Northwestern Mutual; treasurer, Archie G. Richardson, Mutual. Members of the executive committee—Walter Thompson, Travelers', and A. C. Williamson, Prudential; member of the executive committee of the National Association—Henry Farmer. Prior to the election of the latter, William Van Sickle, who had been the representative of the Detroit association on this committee for 12 years, declined to serve any longer. H. Wibirt Spence called attention to the excellent work Mr. Van Sickle has done on the committee and said that this work had been a good thing for both the local and the National Association. He moved a rising vote of thanks to him, which was given heartily, followed by the singing of "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow."

District of Columbia.

The District of Columbia association held its annual meeting last month at the Raleigh Hotel, Washington. National President Clark was the guest of honor and urged the passage of the bill, which has been on the House of Representatives calendar for two years, for a new insurance law. Mr. Clark stated that the present insurance code is out of date and probably the worst in the country. The bill now pending, as described by Mr. Clark, is designed to regulate field practices, providing penalties for rebating, misrepresentation on the part of agents, stock jobbing, embezzlement and part-time men.

"The National Association," said Mr. Clark, "favors a number of specific insurance bills rather than a new code to supplant the one now in force."

Erie.

M. H. Zacharias and Colonel W. A. Waite, of Detroit, and Judge Paul A. Benson were guests of honor at the annual meeting of the Erie association, held in the Reed House in the evening of Feb. 13. Following dinner the members of the association elected officers and listened to speeches by their guests.

The officers chosen are: President, V. W. Doolittle; first vice-president, E. F. Randall; second vice-president, R. H. Howell; treasurer, W. E. Leonard; secretary, J. C. Crittenton; executive committee, W. H. Riley, J. M. Dickey, C. B. Bambaugh, R. W. Hughes and J. F. Brown.

Mr. Zacharias delivered the principal address of the evening. He and Colonel Waite came from Detroit especially for this occasion. In his talk Mr. Zacharias touched upon the manner of meeting competition in the insurance business and dwelt at some length upon the ethics of the business. His address was greatly appreciated by the 35 underwriters present at the meeting. Colonel Waite, Judge Benson and J. M. Dickey also talked upon matters incident to the insurance business.

Florida.

The meeting of the Florida association, held on the 11th inst., was declared to be one of the most successful of the association. One point on which the association took a stand, which will be further developed by a committee before the next session of the Florida Legislature, was the protest against the high license taxes which insurance agents and companies, both life and fire, must pay in this State.

Dr. S. L. Lowry, who was named secretary and treasurer, and chairman of the committee on legislation, said it was a matter not only for the insurance men, but for the people of the State to interest themselves in. "It puts a tax on the man who wishes to protect his home, to guard his family in the event of his death, for when the insurance companies are taxed higher they must ask more from the policyholder," said he.

Mr. Lowry went on to explain how the dividends paid back in this State diminish because of the higher license required of the companies, and how some companies which are the strongest and pay the highest dividends do not operate in the State because it costs so much to do business in Florida.

Any company writing policies in Florida must pay $200 to the State, and $10 on top of that for each agent. If an agent travels in any county other than his own he must pay $25 more. There is a county license of $2.75, and in Tampa a city license of $65 to pay, and when all are paid there is a further tax of two per cent. on every dollar's worth of revenue.

The State needs new laws and a different system of licensing so that the companies, while paying for supervision by the State, need not pay prohibitive fees, and contribute to the State's revenue out of proportion to other lines, Mr. Lowry says. It should also have—and he says it is one of the few States which has not at present—a bureau of insurance.

At present the duty is a minor detail of the State Treasurer's work.

At the meeting, in addition to electing the officers, the association voted to have a quarterly meeting instead of each year. The new officers of the association are S. F. Wooten, Tampa, president; J. Will Gardner, DeLand, vice-president; F. E. Broadnax, Jacksonville, second vice-president; S. L. Lowry, Tampa, secretary-treasurer; executive committee, S. F. Wooten, A. C. Harlee, Tampa; R. Jeter Jones, Jacksonville; P. T. Richardson, Walter Platt; membership committee, R. A. Ellis, O. A. Ayala, A. C. Harlee; press committee, R. A. Ellis, Walter Platt, A. C. Harlee; committee on legislation, Dr. S. L. Lowry, R. A. Ellis, S. F. Wooten.

Georgia.

Oscar Palmour, general agent of the Connecticut Mutual, was elected president of the Georgia association at the annual meeting held at the Ansley Hotel in Atlanta recently. J. H. Byrly was elected vice-president and Thomas Daniel, general agent of the Union Central, secretary-treasurer. The executive committee for the year consists of W. E. Hawkins, Aetna Life, chairman; R. L. Foreman, Mutual Benefit; R. F. Shedden, Mutual Life of New York, and Hugh M. Willett, Penn Mutual. Mr. Willett made an interesting address on "Education and Conservation." Harry I. Davis, the newly appointed general agent of the Massachusetts Mutual Life, was elected to membership.

Grand Rapids.

The Grand Rapids association is planning to make Grand Rapids and western Michigan one of the largest insurance fields in the country and to bring there for its monthly dinner meetings as many leading men in the insurance world as possible to discuss questions of interest not only to insurance men, but to the general public.

The association is now endeavoring with good prospects of success, to secure for the March meeting National Vice-President Edward A. Woods.

It is explained that in Michigan there is a tax of 2 per cent. of every $1 of premium of the old line companies, which is said to be altogether too high and that the State insurance department could be run for much less than the amount, $400,000 or so annually taken for this purpose, and that one-half of one per cent. would in all probability be a sufficient rate of taxation. It is pointed out that the rate of taxation hits the people, who consequently have to pay more for their insurance.

This question is due for more attention from the local association this year, and it may ascertain what would be a proper rate of taxation and take measures, including a campaign of public education, to bring about a reduction in the insurance tax.

John T. Winship, State Insurance Commissioner, is in view as the speaker for the February meeting.

W. P. Lovett was the speaker at the January meeting, which was held in the Association of Commerce cafe Saturday. His topic was "Optimism for 1914," and the prospects for the year were discussed by members of the organization.

Harrisburg.

National President Ernest J. Clark was the guest of honor of the Harrisburg association at a meeting held on the evening of the 6th inst., at the Engineers' Club. What the affair lacked in attendance was more than compensated for in enthusiasm. Several new underwriters were elected to membership immediately following Mr. Clark's address.

Mr. Clark discussed various phases of the profession, and in conclusion he said:

"Think of the millions of fatherless and orphaned children whose intellectual, moral and physical natures have been dwarfed through poverty, in consequence of the death of a father who had neglected, through procrastination or indifference or ignorance (they all amount to the same thing), to make provision for them against his death."

Indiana.

At the Claypool Hotel, Indianapolis, on the 3d inst., the Indiana association held its regular monthly meeting with 50 members present. President Brewster introduced Archibald M. Hall as presiding officer and toastmaster of the occasion. On taking the chair Mr. Hall made a few remarks of appreciation in accepting the honor. He introduced Rabbi Arthur A. Zinkin, of Lafayette, who gave an address on the subject of "Life Insurance and Democracy." The Rabbi's address was scholarly and inspiring, full of the milk of human kindness and brotherly love.

Following Rabbi Zinkin, Toastmaster Hall introduced Darby A. Day, manager of the Mutual Life at Chicago, who gave an inspiring and practical talk on "The Life Insurance Man." His remarks were full of life, work, energy and optimism.

North Indiana.

Preparations for more intensive organization were made by the members of the Northern Indiana association at the annual banquet held on February 4 at the Anthony Hotel, Fort Wayne. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, J. F. Conway; vice-president, Julian F. Franke; secretary, Arthur Young; treasurer, Jacob Hartman.

W. P. Cooper, retiring president, acted as toastmaster. Among those who responded with brief talks were Charles W. Orr, S. D. King, C. B. Fitch, A. J. Wilson and D. C. Fitch.

Iowa.

Henry S. Nollen, vice-president of the Equitable Life of Iowa, delivered an address on "The Income Tax" at the February meeting of the Iowa association, held on the evening of the 7th inst. at the Grant Club, Des Moines. It was resolved that each member who brings a guest to a meeting should pay a dollar for the supper of said guest. Other than the address of Mr. Nollen, there were a few matters of routine business which were briefly disposed of.

Kansas City.

M. F. Belisle was unanimously elected president of the Kansas City association at its meeting, Jan. 19. E. M. Somerville, former secretary, was elected first vice-president; R. J. Liddane, second vice-president; William J. Cardwell, secretary-treasurer, and J. P. Miller, chairman of the executive committee. A framed and engraved set of resolutions was presented to C. C. Courtney, a retired agent, who had been made a life member of the association.

Knoxville.

At the annual meeting of the Knoxville association in the private dining-room of the Cumberland Club Building, on the evening of Jan. 24, Dr. J. N. Ellis was elected president of the association for the ensuing year, succeeding J. E. Lutz, the retiring president; first vice-president, W. B. Henderson; second vice-president, J. V. Rymer; secretary-treasurer, Geo. F. Harrison.

The new members of the executive committee to serve for 1914, in conjunction with the officers, are Elihu Anderson, J. W. Prevost, T. S. McKinney, E. R. Lutz and F. W. Flenniken.

Five new members were elected to membership in the association. They are Charles Mitchell, Prof. Charles C. Himel, J. Ed. Lavin, N. C. Llewellyn and Frank Heart.

Reports from the officers and standing committees showed that the association has had a very prosperous year under the leadership of President J. E. Lutz, having an increase in membership of 60 per cent., as well as the attendance on the monthly meetings having increased.

A report from the committees on anti-taxation was read by the chairman, J. N. Ellis, stating that a public meeting would be held some time in March, to which the public would be invited, also members of the legislature and congressmen. Among prominent speakers on this occasion will be former Insurance Commissioner Reau E. Folk.

T. S. McKinney, chairman of the committee on publicity and education, made his report in regard to contracting for sixty inches of space in a daily paper for a period of one year, the space to be edited by the association and appearing once a week. The members present were heartily in favor of this move and authorized a committee of three to confer with members not present, and complete all arrangements to start this educational campaign March 1 and report at the next meeting.

A letter was read from Warren M. Horner, chairman of the committee on education and conservation, of the National Association, in regard to all members contributing toward a $25,000 fund to be used in the publication of a text-book on life insurance for use in public and high schools, and a general publicity campaign of education and advertising now being launched by the National Association. This was endorsed by the local association, and members present agreed to personally contribute to this fund on the basis of 5 per cent. per $1,000 of business written in 1913.

George F. Harrison, secretary-treasurer, read his annual report, which was accepted. It showed all moneys received and disbursed, and a balance left in the treasury.

A vigorous campaign will be carried on by the association to enroll every local life insurance salesman in the city and in surrounding territory as a member. The association is two years old, and has done a remarkable work in elevating the profession of life insurance writer. President Ellis says that the unquestioned advantages of membership in the local association are such that no life insurance salesman should remain outside.

Louisiana.

There was an unusually large attendance of the members of the Louisiana association at the regular monthly meeting held Jan. 30 at the residence of Frank L. Levy, general agent of the Equitable Life, 1524 Seventh street. President Crawford H. Ellis presided. The resolution adopted at the previous meeting providing that at the end of one month the association take such action as it might deem necessary to correct the practise of some general agents and managers in giving rate books indiscriminately to clerks, bookkeepers and others who are not regularly engaged in the work of life insurance, was rescinded. This action was taken after the resignation of J. M. Goldsmith, of the Prudential, and Robt. G. Crump, of the Germania, had been read, these gentlemen claiming the right to employ part-time men or brokers. A general discussion showed the sentiment to be against the violation of the law by giving books to men without a license and to protect the legitimate agent as far as possible against the introduction of the man from the outside given a rate book for some special case.

The following resolution introduced by Frank L. Levy was unanimously adopted:

"Be it resolved, That this association deprecates the practice that exists in New Orleans on the part of some general agents and managers in giving rate books indiscriminately to clerks, bookkeepers and others who are not regular full-time agents or legitimate part-time agents."

"We believe that the profession of life insurance should be conducted on a high plane and that the regular producer should be protected against the indiscriminate placing of rate books with and the acceptance of business from so-called agents where appointed to cover the placing of one or more risks, but who are not, in a reasonable interpretation of the term, active agents, whether whole time or part."

"This association hereby places itself on record, while recognizing in many instances the necessity for the use of the legitimate part-time agent, as deprecating and decrying the abuse of the so-called part-time agents and as discountenancing the practice by any company of accepting business from so-called part-time agents in competition with their full-time agents."

The sentiment of the meeting favored the ideas advanced by William Henry Brown, of the Equitable, that punitive measures disrupt associations and that the good accomplished by life underwriters' association is done entirely by moral suasion.

Mr. Crump withdrew his resignation and the resignation of Mr. Goldsmith was not accepted.

At the suggestion of Mr. Smither it was decided to invite non-residents of New Orleans to become members without the initiation fee at a cost of $1 per year for dues. This action will be taken through the motion of Mr. Brown giving notice of an amendment to the by-laws to be voted on at the next meeting. Mr. Levy was tendered a vote of thanks for his hospitality in entertaining the members.

The invitation of W. J. Hannon, of the Mutual Life, to hold its next monthly meeting Feb. 28, at his residence, 2809 Esplanade avenue, was accepted.

Louisville.

At a meeting of the Louisville association, at Hotel Henry Watterson, in the evening of the 9th inst., National Vice-President Edward A. Woods, of Pittsburgh, Pa., said American life insurance was not an institution for making profits, but for distributing losses.

"The billions represented in insurance is the striking answer of the American nation to the world's charge of extravagances and lack of thrift," he said. "Yet the United States is the only country which seizes this very loss distributing machinery to levy, collect and have handed over to the governments of the various States and nation enormous funds in the guise of taxes."

Mr. Woods called attention to the fact that not less than $12,000,000 annually has to be paid by life insurance companies for supervision alone. He declared this was six times as much as in 1890. He also referred to additional burdens placed upon companies by the Federal Government. It is unfair to have the regular life insurance companies singled out, while fraternal and assessment organizations are exempted, he said. In 1860, he declared, the States took only 70 cents from each $100 paid by policyholders, while at present $2 is exacted.

Other speakers were W. W. Dennis and Marshall Bullitt. Mr. Dennis presided as president of the local organization and Mr. Bullitt explained how impossible it was to have unit accounts in insurance offices. He also stated that fraternal insurance organizations cannot survive unless they change their methods. The only way, he said, that insurance companies could be conducted was by the application of the principle of average.

Appeals were made by all the speakers for a strong organization. More than half of those in attendance were not members of the association.

Eastern Maine.

President F. L. Ryan of the Eastern Maine association has appointed the following committee on education and conservation: Charles R. Dunton, Northwestern; Lawrence Rooney, Metropolitan; J. T. Taylor, Penn Mutual.

Central Massachusetts.

The annual meeting of the Central Massachusetts association was held on Jan. 22 at Worcester. Edgar C. Fowler, superintendent of agencies of the State Mutual, was elected an associate member. President Woodrow Wilson and Governor David I. Walsh of Massachusetts were elected honorary members. The new officers elected are as follows: President, Edward A. Robertson; first vice-president, Eli Bouchard; second vice-president, Charles H. Sagar; treasurer, Guy F. Wheeler; secretary, Otis D. Arnold. Executive Committee—Chairman, Eli Bouchard; Charles H. Sagar, Otis D. Arnold, Dana M. Dustan, E. A. Robertson, Guy F. Wheeler, B. B. Snow, William James Hogg, William C. Cerie.

Minneapolis.

The annual meeting of the Minneapolis association was held on January 31 with a good attendance. Three new members were admitted. The officers submitted reports covering the year's work. Report of the treasurer, C. N. Patterson, showed an increase of 40 per cent. in funds on hand. The association has adopted the use of a membership card.

Warren M. Horner, chairman of the National Committee on Education and Conservation, spoke of the value of the text-book being prepared by Dr. S. S. Heubner. He also assured the members that they might look forward to a successful termination of the proposed plan of institutional advertising.

New Hampshire.

A special meeting of the New Hampshire Life Underwriters' Club was held at Manchester on Jan. 31. The speaker of the occasion was Stuart Anderson, of the literary department of the Massachusetts Mutual. Mr. Anderson delivered an address on "Commercial Insurance."

Nebraska.

The monthly meeting of the Nebraska association was held on the 7th inst., in Omaha. N. K. Van Huesen, of the agency force of the Mutual Benefit, delivered an address on "The Development of Liberty," tracing its progress for 20 centuries.

New York.

It has been said that a New York audience is not easily surprised, yet Edward A. Woods, vice-president of the National Association and general agent of the Equitable at Pittsburgh, caused an unusual degree of astonishment by certain statistics which he presented in the course of his address delivered at the regular January meeting of the New York association, held at the Press Club at noon on Jan. 27. "New York City," said Mr. Woods, "pays $75,000,000 a year for various forms of vices, more than it does for women's independence, women's virtue and even for the family and the home through life insurance."

The speaker's remarks were principally confined to an argument against the taxation of life insurance funds. The figures and statistics quoted proved conclusively the inequity and inequity of the present system of taxation. "The proposition," said Mr. Woods, "that life insurance ought not be taxed is a very simple matter. Let us imagine a body of neighbors, one of whose members has died, leaving a widow and children. Let us imagine that those neighbors clubbed together and collected a thousand dollars for that widow, to provide a little fund for her and her children. What would happen if a tax gatherer of the State were to walk into that room by the coffin and demand $63 of that money? This is what taxation of life insurance is.

That is a simple proposition and because it is simple we can understand why no other civilized government does not tax it. Even Japan does not tax it. And this country where the citizens provide voluntarily more insurance twice over than all the rest of the world put together."

In Mr. Woods' introductory remarks he dwelt briefly upon the part-time question, and once or twice during his address took a good-natured fling at the slim attendance at the meeting, referring to a recent meeting of the Pittsburgh association, where there was an attendance of 400 and at another meeting of the St. Louis association, where 300 members and guests were present.

President Allen appointed the following nominating committee: M. E. Goulden, chairman; Charles Jerome Edwards, Bernard R. Rose, Conrad V. Dykeman and J. S. Tunmore.

The next meeting of the association will be the annual dinner and will be held at the Hotel Astor on the evening of Feb. 24. The speakers will be Mayor John Purroy Mitchel, James E. Cropsey, District Attorney of Kings County; William W. McClench, president of the Massachusetts Mutual, and Royal S. Goldsberry, president of the Pittsburgh association and representing the Northwestern Mutual in that city.

North Carolina.

The annual meeting of the North Carolina association was held on the evening of the 10th inst., in Raleigh. The principal speakers were Hugh M. Willet, chairman of the executive committee of the National Association, and Insurance Commissioner James R. Young.

Oklahoma.

At a meeting of the Life Underwriters' association of the Eastern District of Oklahoma, at Tulsa, on the evening of Feb. 2, Insurance Commissioner A. L. Welch was the principal speaker. His address was received with much interest. "You are engaged," said he in his introductory remarks, "in a great business, the influence of which extends to every aspect of finance and trade. But most important of all is the relation of insurance to the family. Life insurance as a social institution primarily contemplates the certain, and effective protection of widows and orphans. As has been said, 'Death may lay low the household head; creditors may quarrel over the financial remains; the sheriff may step in and settle disputes; riches may take to themselves wings and fly away; but life insurance suspended on the brittle thread of human life, like a benison of blessing above the heads of the helpless, suddenly loosed by the snapping of the silver cord, drops into the lap of the widow as surely and as certainly as the point of the needle swings to the pole.' All this and more does life insurance do, and you are its ambassadors. Without you this great business would not be what it is today—the agent is indispensable."

Oregon.

A large attendance characterized the January meeting of the Oregon association. President Hubert H. Ward reported that Seattle had the lead in the membership contest, with Los Angeles a close second. A feature of the evening's entertainment was an address by C. W. Helser, general manager of the Continental Life, a visitor from Salt Lake. Mr. Helser spoke of the work accomplished by the Utah association.

The executive committee announced the following names for officers for the ensuing year: President, D. C. Herrin; vice-president, F. M. Bradley; secretary-treasurer, Joseph H. Gray.

One of the interesting features of the meeting was a debate on participating insurance and non-participating insurance. A. S. Rothwell opened the discussion for the affirmative side and Harry Richey took up the cudgels for the negative. Monthly income insurance will be the subject for discussion at the February meeting.

Philadelphia.

"Life insurance is not a business; it is the foremost of all the professions," said Dr. Lee K. Frankel, 6th, vice-president of the Metropolitan, in his address to the members of the Philadelphia association at their annual dinner held on the evening of Feb. 2 at the Continental Hotel.

His subject was "The Extension or Conservation of Human Life," and asserted that his company was endeavoring virtually to carry out the idea of prolonging the life of its almost 11,000,000 policyholders by teaching them to live cleanly and morally, and by instilling in them a kinship, a solidarity of brotherhood wholly for their own benefit.

"We employ trained, graduate nurses to visit our sick policyholders," said Doctor Frankel, "give picnics and outings for the children and babies of the insured and by every method known to science strive to prolong their life. Thirty years ago the average life was 34 years; to-day it is approximately 45 years. Conservation of life is so important that a company has just been organized for the purpose of periodically re-examining the insured, and the larger insurance companies will lend their heartiest co-operation to this company.

"It is better to re-examine and help the policyholder to live longer than it is to pay a death claim."

James Mapes Dodge, chairman of the Link Belt Co., spoke on "Efficiency," and emphasized the fact that "scientific management is spreading all over the world, and every establishment which introduces this system is automatically free from labor troubles. It removes friction and is the universal forerunner of peace on all questions between capital and labor."

The following officers were elected for the year: John R. Fox, president, Metropolitan; E. O. Mosier, vice-president, Equitable; Thos. L. Fansler, vice-president, Northwestern; Louis F. Paret, vice-president, Provident; Clarence A. Wray, treasurer, Home of New York; John William Clegg, secretary, Penn Mutual.

Pittsburgh.

In the English room of the Fort Pitt Hotel at noon on Jan. 24 the Pittsburgh association held its regular monthly meeting. Three hundred and thirty-five members and guests were present, and the special guests of honor were: Rev. William A. Sunday, Mrs. Sunday, Mr. Rodeheaver, Bishop Perry, of Philadelphia, and Rev. Russell, of Westminster College. President Goldsbury, who presided, announced that the University of Pittsburgh would distribute cards asking for a subscription, and urged all present to pledge their individual support, as the college desires to raise three million dollars and has arranged for a course on life insurance.

Mr. Rodeheaver made an enthusiastic talk and gave a fitting introduction to Rev. Mr. Sunday by teaching the evangelistic hymn, "If Your Heart Keeps Right," Mr. Rode-heaven singing the stanzas and the audience joining in the chorus.

Mr. Goldsbury then introduced Mr. Sunday. Mr. Sunday said that he did not have any special message on the subject of life insurance, except that he believed in it; that he carried life insurance policies and would just as soon think of going to bed at night without the protection of life insurance as he would without asking God's protection for the night.

The speaker declared that men must be right with the world as well as with God, and to be right with the world he must think of and provide for the care of his family. He spoke on the wonderful progress made along the lines of discoveries in electricity, steam, and inventions of all kinds, saying that great as are all of these and wonderful in their effect upon the development of civilization, nothing had ever been discovered or ever been approached that had the same lasting effect upon the civilization of the world as the religion of Jesus, which has stood for twenty centuries and which has withstood the derisions and criticisms of all sorts of skeptics.

In closing he said: "What manner of man are you? It was William McKinley who said, 'He who serves his Master best serves man best, and he who serves truth serves civilization.' Nothing in this world counts for so much as godly living or lasts so long, or wears so well, or is of greater value."

Mrs. Sunday was then introduced, after which President Goldsbury presented Bishop Perry, a personal friend of Mr. Sunday. The Bishop spoke briefly, highly commending the work of Mr. Sunday, saying that Philadelphia is most anxiously following every detail of his progress in Pittsburgh.

The only business proceedings of the day was the election of the following new members: William E. Graham, Equitable of New York; D. Bruce Martin, Provident Life & Trust; P. G. Mooney, Metropolitan.

After Bishop Perry's talk Mr. Rodeheaver rendered, as a trombone solo, "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," after which the meeting adjourned.

Rochester.

A professional spirit or the desire for specialized knowledge is making rapid strides among life underwriters. This was evidenced from the address of National President Ernest J. Clark before the members of the Rochester, Buffalo and Syracuse associations at a banquet held on the evening of the 7th inst., at the Rochester Club, Rochester.

Mr. Clark declared that the broad spirit of service and a large fund of technical knowledge is needed by the successful life insurance man of to-day. To meet the need for this, effort is being made to increase the number of courses in life insurance that are given at colleges and universities. The speaker urged upon the members of the association the need of a new kind of advertising. Statistics fail to interest the public, he said. It is the human interest appeal that goes home, and as one means of securing this kind of advertising he suggested that an effort be made to have news articles published on life insurance themes in the daily newspapers.

The attendance was 164. Of 84 members of the Rochester association 78 were at the dinner. The Syracuse association sent 39 delegates and the Buffalo association was represented by 20.

One of the stunts at the beginning of the dinner was the presentation by the president of the Rochester association to the president of the Buffalo association of a gift as a reminder from the largest association to the smallest represented. The gift was a tin can and the Buffalo leader was not allowed to forget the incident during the evening, albeit he took it good naturedly.

Walter S. Hubbell, a prominent attorney of Rochester, gave an address on what he termed "The Heart of an Insurance Man." He said that the chief qualification for the business, as for any business, was a character that would carry weight beyond anything that one might say and the lack of which would nullify, to intelligent men, what one might say.

Greetings were extended to the visiting associations by

All men are prospects for more than one line of insurance; the agents who can supply their several insurance needs possess the greatest opportunities to increase their incomes.

LIFE INSURANCE. The Travelers, with its remarkable yearly increases in Life Insurance in force, is the leading exponent of GUARANTEED LOW COST LIFE INSURANCE, which is growing most rapidly of all forms in public favor. The Travelers also offers in connection with its life policies a Disability Clause unequaled in liberality.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE. The Travelers continues pre-eminent. Its increase in Accident and Health premiums alone in 1913 exceeded the total writings of many companies, and was greater than its two leading competitors combined.

LIABILITY and COMPENSATION INSURANCE. The Travelers leads in service, experience and premiums.

We offer direct contracts to reliable and successful men, and thereby give them an opportunity to increase their incomes and make certain their future.

ALLY YOURSELF WITH THE TRAVELERS. Share its activity. Profit by its prestige.

Seize the opportunities it offers to develop your business.

Ball Bearing—

THE IDEAL OFFICE ASSISTANT

An employer hires a bookkeeper, stenographer or clerk to relieve him of—not to add to his cares.

He asks the same thing of his writing machine.

He wants it to "stand up," to do its work, to be reliable, quick to respond, ready for emergency or long continued work.

These qualities make the L. C. Smith & Bros. typewriter prominent in the typewriter world.

The ball bearings at all frictional points place it in a class by itself from a mechanical standpoint.

Viewed from the HUMAN angle, the operators of this typewriter do more work and are less tired at the close of the day. If you look into the matter closely, you can't reach any other conclusion. Send for free book.

Accident and Health Insurance

This Company issues policies which are unexcelled for brevity, clarity and the Complete Protection they give policy-holders.

It issues Special Disability Policies not requiring confinement to house for disability from disease, paying for partial as well as full disability, and doubling the accident Weekly Indemnity after the first year. This policy is a winner. Any agent can, with benefit to his other lines, make his expenses by placing this unusually liberal policy with the leading men of his community.

Excellent opportunities exist for agents of standing, who wish to handle policies which completely protect against every contingency and are unequalled in their benefits to policy-holders, to procure direct contracts in territory not now covered.

Inquiries invited.

The Columbian National Life Insurance Company BOSTON, MASS.

Arthur E. Childs,
President.

William C. Johnson,
Vice-President and General Manager.

Farley J. Withington, president of the local association, and responses were made by Frank W. Tracy, president of the Buffalo association, and H. B. Husted, president of the Syracuse body.

Two other addresses of note were made. One was by Royal S. Goldsbury, president of the Pittsburgh association, who told the diners that success in the service they could give could come only through knowing what to do, how to do it and having the energy to do it. The other was given by Glover S. Hastings, superintendent of agents for the New England Mutual.

One of the things suggested by Mr. Clark was a competitive membership campaign between the three cities, to close June 1. He also discussed the non-resident membership, which had been established at the last convention of the National Association in Atlantic City. This is designed, he said, to draw the life insurance underwriters in small towns surrounding those in which associations exist into the benefits of association with their fellows.

St. Louis.

At the recent annual meeting of the St. Louis association the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: James M. Bloodworth, president; W. E. Anderson, first vice-president; W. E. Bilheimer, second vice-president; Earl Layman, secretary; J. L. Hass, treasurer; Frederick N. Cheney, national committeeman; George L. Dyer, W. O. Andrews, Fred B. Miller, George Benham and C. C. Dyer, executive committee.

The constitution was changed reducing the annual dues from $10 to $5 for general agents; $5 to $3 for agents and a new classification of $2 for outside agents was made.

St. Paul.

The regular monthly meeting of the St. Paul association was held on the 2d inst. A splendid address was delivered by Senator James E. Denegre, of St. Paul, chairman of the insurance committee of the last session of the Minnesota

Legislature. Mr. Denegre claimed that there is no question demanding more serious consideration than life insurance and the problem of taxation. "The premium tax," said he, "was originally intended to cover only departmental expenses and was purely a licensed tax; but as the business grew and money poured into the State treasuries the tax was permitted to increase and multiply to such an extent that to-day it amounts to on the average of two per cent. of the gross premiums, which is for every thousand dollars of capital invested in insurance the State takes twenty."

The next meeting of the association will be held on March 2, at which time Jerome W. Wheeler, president of the Capital Trust Co. of St. Paul, will deliver an address on the subject of "The Commercial View of Business Life Insurance Protection from a Banker's Standpoint."

San Francisco.

W. H. Matson, of the Mutual Life, was elected president of the San Francisco association at its annual meeting held last month. James S. Osborne, of the Phoenix Mutual, was elected vice-president, and E. W. Armstrong, of the Reliance Life, secretary-treasurer. The executive committee selected was as follows: George B. Scott, Metropolitan Life; R. L. Stephenson, Union Central Life; William J. Bell, Massachusetts Mutual, and C. M. Smith, Northwestern Mutual.

The meeting was held at the Hotel Stewart with a fair attendance. Retiring President George B. Scott submitted his annual report outlining the progress of the association during the year. According to that gentleman, the membership had increased from 57 to 74. Mr. Scott thanked the members for the honor they had paid him and the co-operation they had given him, and in closing introduced President-elect Matson. Mr. Matson stated in part:

"A natural regard for social amenities—a desire to stand well with our fellowman, especially in our own social circle—and a wholesome self-respect based upon a knowledge of right-doing, especially toward those of our immediate associates, have in my opinion accomplished more for the advancement of civilization than all of the laws that were ever put upon statute books.

"And in looking over this association's past history and future possibilities, I feel that the same rules must unswervingly apply, and that the same results, in the main, will flow from our intercourse through this association as in other matters of human endeavor; consequently, I believe that 99 per cent. of the good that will come to us individually and collectively through this association movement is embodied in the above principles, and that this good is more apt to be retarded than advanced by the occasional desire of some individual to enact and enforce certain limited rules by which he wishes us all to live and do business, and by which, in the case of such a man, it is pretty fair to assume he is not guiding himself.

"Let us try to get every man who is in the life insurance business in this part of the State into this association, and not try to drive anybody out, and we will then become an organization that has a part in the affairs of our city and State commensurate with the interests which we represent."

In concluding he made reference to the World's Insurance Congress in 1915. "We are right on the beginning," said he, "of the world's greatest exposition, and perhaps no other part of the world will come here in such great numbers in 1915 as the insurance community, and we are going to be measured, not only by our local community, but by the visiting insurance world as well, by the solid front that we put up as an association. Our undertaking and our obligations are too big to be discharged in any individual sense, and we can only hope to make the creditable showing that we should by each individual member pledging himself that he will bury petty grievances for the good of the cause as a whole, and not want to ask every man, now in this association, or that may come into it during the year, to help me and the other officials to make this a year of get-together—a year of tolerance, and predict that at the end of the year many of the grievances that have come up in the past will have entirely disappeared in the aurora of good-fellowship that will be the result."

H. R. Hunter, the retiring secretary, delivered his annual report and told of his work during the past two years. Hon. Warren R. Porter, ex-Lieutenant-Governor of California and president of the Western States Life, was then called upon by President Matson. Mr. Porter thanked the association for the opportunities given to the representatives of the new companies to join the local body.

Francis V. Keesling, second vice-president of the San Francisco Life, was next called upon and declared that his company believed thoroughly in the association movement.

Julian Sontag, second vice-president of the West Coast life, was the next speaker. Mr. Sontag declared that he was confident that the American Life convention would be well represented at the World's Insurance Congress. He also spoke of the efforts of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents and the National Association and the desire to get together for the common good of insurance as a whole.

Garner Curran, of Los Angeles, told of the work of the Los Angeles association, which had recently made a large increase in membership by admitting the companies' medical examiners.

A resolution was unanimously adopted extending a vote of thanks to retiring President Scott and Secretary-Treasurer Hunter.

An interesting feature of the program was a stereopticon lecture on the Panama Canal and Panama-Pacific Exposition given by Dr. Fisher of the Exposition Company.

Savannah.

At the eighth annual meeting of the Savannah association, held in the office of E. H. O'Connor, the election of officers for the ensuing year resulted as follows: Edward S. Stoddard, president; O. E. Stewart, first vice-president; Aaron Ferst, second vice-president; R. L. Schley, secretary-treasurer. The executive committee is composed of the retiring president of the association as chairman and four other former presidents of the association, Julien Schley, Cornelius F. Moses, Laurence T. Doyle and William J. Harty.

South Dakota.

Endorsing R. J. Woods, of Sioux Falls, for Congress the South Dakota association met at the Cataract Hotel in the evening of Jan. 17 for the annual business conference of the organization and the election of officers. The officers elected were:

President, George R. Douthit, Sioux Falls; first vice-president, Geo. A. Mabbot, Aberdeen; second vice-president, R. J. Woods, Sioux Falls; third vice-president, E. L. Bramble, Watertown; secretary, C. J. Harris, Sioux Falls; treasurer, M. R. Brown, Sioux Falls; chairman executive committee, B. C. Shaw, Sioux Falls.

Following the completion of the business meeting and after the dinner B. C. Shaw, announcing that it was the fiftieth anniversary of the birth of R. J. Woods, the best known life underwriter in the Northwest, outlined "Dick's" work in the insurance business and called attention to the fact that "Dick" is a candidate for Congress from the district. L. C. Campbell, following Mr. Shaw, said R. J. Woods is to be the first insurance man in Congress and called for his endorsement. Every life underwriter present pledged himself to Dick Woods' candidacy.

Southern West Virginia.

At the annual meeting of the Southern West Virginia association, held at Huntington on the evening of Jan. 31, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Dan H. Holton, Penn Mutual; vice-presidents, D. E. Lloyd, Prudential; H. G. Burchett, Northwestern Mutual; secretary, Walter H. Eager, Connecticut Mutual; assistant secretary, D. H. Alexander, Prudential; treasurer, John Patrick, Penn Mutual. Executive Committee—Chairman, Walter L. Voshell, Metropolitan; C. P. Marshall, Connecticut Mutual; C. W. Cammack, John Hancock; Harry F. Gray, Connecticut Mutual; R. A. Bickel, Home Life; T. B. E. Spencer, Pittsburgh Life & Trust; R. G. Turney, Mutual Life; J. G. Ramsey, Union Mutual.

Syracuse.

The January meeting of the Syracuse association was held on the 17th of that month and several new members were admitted. L. Louis Hanson, superintendent of agencies of the Germania Life, was the guest of honor. Twenty-five members accepted the invitation of the Rochester association for its annual banquet on the 7th inst.

A general discussion was held on the subject of part-time men, but the whole matter was referred back to the executive committee and will be taken up at some future meeting.

Utica.

The Life Underwriters' Association of Utica held a well-attended and enthusiastic meeting on the evening of Jan. 19 in the banquet room over the Seneca Lunch, Seneca street. The annual report of Secretary-Treasurer J. A. Hayes showed that during the year the membership has increased from 11 to 37, and the treasury balance from $2 to $61.

The annual election of officers resulted as follows: President, Seymour Hart; first vice-president, W. F. Wallace; second vice-president, Walter S. Butler; secretary-treasurer, James A. Hayes; member of executive committee, James P. Mulhall, the retiring president.

The subject of instalment settlement of life policies was again discussed, led by J. Q. Barcus, of Albany, a member of the local association.

Youngstown.

The regular January meeting of the Youngstown association was held at the Hotel Ohio. President Myron Eckert presided, and there was a lengthy discussion on the education and conservation program of the National Association. A committee, consisting of President Myron Eckert, Leo Guthman, F. B. Hawkins, P. J. Burke and R. L. Hartzell, was appointed and given the power to take action in this matter as soon as expedient. This committee has several plans in view in this regard following the various suggestions and programs carried out in the larger cities by the Underwriters' associations, one of them being a plan of institutional advertising in the daily newspapers, in which the association does the advertising and eliminates from the ad anything pertaining to figures and the individual companies.

The National Association's annual convention this year will be held in Cincinnati, and in order to assure a large delegation to this convention a Cincinnati club was formed at the meeting, and there will be no less than ten delegates from the Youngstown association in attendance.

THE INJUSTICE OF LIFE INSURANCE TAXATION.

WHY SOCIETY SHOULD NOT PENALIZE THE SACRIFICES OF MEN WHO CAPITALIZE THEIR FUTURE EARNING CAPACITY BY BUILDING UP A BARRIER AGAINST THE UNCERTAINTY OF LIFE.

A Burden Carried by the Provident Man as an Additional Price for the Protection with Which He Endeavors to Cover Those Dependent Upon Him.

By United States Senator LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN, of Illinois.

We consider it a great privilege to reproduce herewith, excerpts from the address which Senator Sherman delivered at Annual Banquet of the Baltimore Association. Our only regret is that provision was not made for a verbatim report. Direct results of the Senator's opinions may be observed in the facts that a proposed bill for the increase of taxation on premiums, in the State of Maryland, has not been heard of since; also the Robertson Bill will probably receive a unanimous unfavorable report from the House Insurance Committee.—Editor's Note.

We read in the proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, King of Israel, the following admonition:

"Go to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways and be wise, which having no guide, overseer, or ruler provideth her meat in the summer and gathereth her food in the harvest."

The foregoing was written some time before the present income tax law of the United States. The ant seems to be the only prudent, industrious living thing that has escaped its provisions. It undoubtedly is an oversight, and the meat this industrious insect provides in the summer and gathers in the harvest will be promptly taxed. It is the ant's earning capacity and frugality that the wise maker of the proverbs had in mind. It was the provident insurance against the time when summer should be gone and no harvest at hand, when the animal and vegetable world furnished no support. It was the earliest form of life insurance observed by the biblical sage and philosopher.

Capitalizing Future Usefulness.

Modern life insurance has taken counsel of providing food in the harvest time. The head of a family who has not accumulated income-producing property now capitalizes his future usefulness. He builds up a barrier against the uncertainty of life. He provides a sinking fund against the certainty of death. His earning capacity during his vigorous years is pitted against nature's limitations on human life. His earning capacity is the economic harvest between his maturity and old age. A guarantee against accidents by the immaturity of the young and the disability of the aged is life insurance. It is the matured contract of prudent reflection. The heedless and the improvident did not invent it. Foresight and wisdom patiently gathered statistics. A mortality table was discovered. The laws of human life are its basis. The law of averages was deducted. The first step was taken. Longevity probabilities were reduced to a certain cash value and its purchase price distributed through a period of years and put within reach of the average man's income. Human earning power was underwritten at its present cash value covered by averages of death. It is one of the greatest triumphs of business acumen and financial wisdom in modern life.

Life, by this process, is made stable for the maintenance of the family and business purposes. It is as essential as the roof that covers dependent ones. It is an expense that every wise man incurs. It is a sacrifice because, in most instances, he himself receives no pecuniary benefit. It is the consciousness that those who rely upon him for support are made secure that sustains him. If this sound belief leads him to secure his family and incur the expense, why should not general society promote, instead of penalize, his sacrifice. General society exercises its influence through the agency of civil government. Therefore, government ought to encourage on insurance contract that secures financial stability to the head of a home and gives a present pecuniary value to prolonged and certain life. The income tax ignores the contract of insurance built on longevity tables and interest rates on fixed investments. Those investments are not the company's funds. It is the trustee of those investments which are the accumulated payments of all who buy insurance and pay their share into the fund.

Taxing Earning Capacity.

The income law taxes earning capacity. That earning power, if it come from mind or hand of the worker, is not a certain source of income. It depends upon the life and health of its possessor. He is unlike income-earning property investments. When his mind and hand are disabled by sickness or death, the earning power of the man is gone. It has been the sole principal. The income and the principal both vanish from the earth. There is nothing to fill this chasm but a life insurance policy. Such earning capacity ought to be exempt from taxation. The life insurance policy covering the loss ought to be made as easy for the man as sound economics will permit.

The income tax law, among other things, provides that the expense of conducting a business is a deduction from the gross income of that business. All interest paid may be deducted. All local taxes on the property employed in the business may be deducted. Machinery, or mechanisms of every kind, may have something taken out for the depreciation in wear and the like. A dynamo or a steam engine wears out. Worthless debts may be figured out. Loss by storms, fire, flood, elemental accidents of all kinds, may be deducted. Rents on property, the possession of which is necessary for carrying on the business, heat, light, power and the thousand and one incidents of an expense in the conduct of a business may be deducted. The net income after the expenses are taken out are taxable in the hands of either an individual or corporate owner. Suppose a man or corporation manufactures shoes. The machinery, the rent on the building, the heat, the light, the power, the payroll, the operating expenses of every kind, down to the oil that lubricates the bearings of the machinery, are deducted. The wear on the machinery lessens its value. The physical depreciation so produced may be deducted as a part of an operating expense.

Every prudent man insures against fire, explosion, lightning, winds and the like. Casualty insurance against the loss of life or limb in hazardous industries are covered. The premium is a part of the operating expenses. Fire insurance may be taken out in like manner as local taxes. Many thousands of dollars of premium may be deducted from the gross income of the business. The shoes go from the factory to the shoe merchant. He pays rent on his building, clerk hire, transportation, drayage, janitor service, interest on borrowed money to discount his bills, taxes, maintenance of his fixtures, furniture, adding what is necessary, laying off something for depreciation, and all may be deducted as an expense. He may insure his delivery-wagon horse and deduct the premium. The bank in which he deposits his money carries burglary insurance. A burglar is about as disastrous to a well-filled bank vault as death is to the earning power of the head of the family. The bank is allowed to deduct the premium on a burglary policy in computing its net income.

A Great Economic Asset.

We now come to the earning capacity of the individual man. His years of health and strength are the harvest mentioned in the proverb. If he owns the roof that shelters his family, or in which he carries on his business, he may subtract the fire insurance premium from his gross income. He may insure his merchandise and his live stock, and take it out as an expense. If he attempts to insure his own life, the greatest economic asset in his family, the premium cannot be deducted as other expenses are. This government of the people does not permit him to deduct a penny of that premium. The law encourages insuring a horse, and discourages insuring a human being. This happens in an age when some are talking incessantly about social justice. This seems like a legislative sarcasm, but it is a solemn as well as a disagreeable truth.

In England.

By an Act of Parliament June 28, 1853, England permitted life insurance premiums to be subtracted from a person's income to an amount equal to one-sixth of the whole amount of the profits and gains of such person. All the person taxable for an income is required to do is to produce a receipt of this annual payment of life insurance premium, and on proof of the fact to the satisfaction of the commissioner the deduction is made. Under the industrial insurance act of Parliament of 1911 a variety of companies are authorized, upon legislation, to carry such risks. A subsequent act of Parliament of Aug. 7, 1912, entitled the company itself to be exempt from income tax in respect of the income derived from any funds or credits applied in effecting such insurance.

The question naturally arises why States levy taxes on the income of life insurance companies. Every such license fee or burden laid on the volume of business done in effect is a tax. Over $12,000,000, it is estimated, is levied by the several States as taxes on the insurance companies of the country. This charge is added to the cost of insurance and ultimately must be loaded upon the premium and paid by the person who procures the policy. The great income tax levied upon insurance companies must at last operate in like manner.

Income taxation, therefore, in the last analysis becomes a burden to be carried by the provident man as an added price for the protection with which he seeks to cover those dependent upon him. Some of these enormous burdens ought to be greatly reduced and some entirely removed. It is difficult to justify much more than a property tax. The income tax is not laid upon labor organizations, agricultural societies, mutual savings banks, building and loan associations, religious, charitable, scientific or educational undertakings. Life insurance is in reality the most intelligent of all forms of organized relief. It enables its responsible source to contribute a certain sum to guard against uncertain events. It is an assembling of resources that, in effect, become great civic agencies to reduce want, to supply funds for public undertakings where large sums are required, and is an aid in the struggle that organized society makes against crime, vice and pauperism. It is a great accumulation of stable investments that is an ally of church and school and public and private charity.

Valuable Assets.

The business system of to-day has no place in it for discourtesy, and least of all is there a place for it in the insurance business, where the agent comes in direct and close contact with men; so close that every word, every motion, even the expression of the eyes and upon the countenance has its bearing and effect.

The manner and bearing of an agent as he comes in contact with his prospect has much to do with the ultimate result. How important is it, then, that the bounds of courtesy be not overstepped. This does not mean any manifestation of servility, because that is as distasteful as is rudeness. An agent can be dignified yet courteous, can maintain his ego yet be suave, be impressive yet pleasant, and by so doing can quickly establish a bond of friendship and confidence that will make of his prospect a client.

There is a species of indirect discourtesy which is almost, if not quite, as fatal as direct rudeness. Personal appearance goes a great way, and the agent who is indifferent in manner, indifferent in dress, unshaven, and careless in appearance, is badly handicapped by such indirect discourtesy.—Col. G. F. Potter.

Preparedness.

"No man can succeed in any business if he does not know how, and no matter how hard he tries he will inevitably fail. Learning how to do is preparation work, and this preparing must begin at the bottom. A man who opens a store without any knowledge of the kind of goods he proposes to sell will never make a success, and equally the agent who takes up the business of insurance without any knowledge of its requirements, of the kind of goods he has to sell, must fail of success. No man has ever been able to decide when the point 'well enough' has been reached, and even though it were possible to determine it the 'well enough' cannot be let alone, but must be constantly looked after, bolstered and propped up in order to keep it up to the standard. Every successful man's business bears the impress of his individuality, and success can only be maintained through keeping the impress fresh and making it indelible, which cannot be accomplished through any 'let alone' process. The attainment of the standard 'Well Enough' is through character and clean methods, and business secured through clean methods is the only class of business to which the term 'well enough' can ever be applied."—Preferred Pilot.

Insurance is the only way of getting even a partial laugh on death. The ingenuity of man has harnessed death in many cases and has made it a wage-earner for thousands of families. While a man goes on, his insurance policy stays behind and sticketh closer than a brother or a hundred admiring friends. Many a man has left a hundred relatives in this lugubrious vale and has gone on sad and worried because he fears his widow will not be able to command high wages over the washtub. But the man who leaves a $10,000 insurance policy in a cool, dry place has nothing to worry about but his own future. One of the easiest ways to secure sorrow at one's demise is to become a total loss with no salvage.—George Fitch.

LIFE INSURANCE EDUCATION.

Since Everyone Enjoys the Advantage of Life Insurance, or Misses the Protection It Affords, There Should Be a Popular Knowledge of Its Fundamental Principles.

By Willard Done, Commissioner of Insurance, State of Utah.

Commissioner Done is well qualified to speak on this subject, having been a school teacher, an insurance solicitor and a supervising official. His address, which was delivered at the Semi-Annual Meeting of the American Association of Accident Underwriters, is a remarkable exposition of the necessity of a universal knowledge of life insurance. In a few minor points we do not agree with him, and we regret that he has made no mention of the work of the National Committee on Education and Conservation. However, a slight difference of opinion, and what is evidently an unintentional omission, does not detract materially from his argument.—Editor's Note.

A subject of universal application should be an object of universal knowledge. Such a subject is insurance. Since everyone is at some time interested in insurance, and either enjoys the advantage of it or severely misses the protection that should be there but is lacking, everyone should be familiar with its fundamental principles. To learn these principles is to be armed against unsafe schemes and dishonest agents. It goes without saying that these have been largely responsible for the present misunderstandings regarding insurance, and the many serious difficulties in which people have found themselves while considering this subject.

It is clear that everybody should know something of that which is of so vital interest to all. Men in their prime, with lengthened years before them, with every prosperity confronting them, may treat this subject lightly, may discuss it without thought. But what man on his deathbed, facing the inevitable and looking with heart-break at his family left unprotected for and facing an uncertain future, can so regard it? What widow and her orphans can view with anything but alarm the inevitable want that will come to them? To no one of these is the subject of slight moment. To such indifference is impossible. Either they enjoy the protection or they do not. The difference is almost the same as between life and death, independence and beggary.

Hopeful Sign of the Times.

Yet men approach this subject in a flippant or antagonistic attitude. There is only one thing that will contribute to a different approach and that is education.

I am glad that insurance education is receiving universal attention, not only from insurance men and others directly interested, but from educators and the general public. It is a good omen. I welcome it as one of the best and most hopeful signs of the times. We should all pledge our best efforts to further the movement.

It seems to me that we have been approaching this matter of insurance education from the wrong angle. So far as I know there has been no concerted attempt to popularize the subject. Text-books written and courses prepared have been of, for and by insurance companies and their present and prospective representatives. While it is very desirable that these books and courses shall be by insurance experts, the results of their work should be for the people. We have been treating this great subject from the actual and the technical side, and I believe that it is time for us to approach it from the popular side.

For example, there is the justification for insurance; its essentially co-operative character; the fundamental fact that practically all insurance is in the last analysis mutual in character. There is also the fact that instead of the policyholders and the company being at war the policyholders are indeed the company and the company means the policyholders. Then the fundamental principle that losses make rates, policyholders make losses, and therefore they are the only ones who can reduce rates. Impress the fact that burdens added to the company through excessive expenses, undue taxation, etc., are really burdens added to the insuring public; that there is no such thing essentially as profit in the insurance business, as the word is generally understood, but that it is merely a system of collection and distribution, under proper safeguards of organization and legislation; that the interests of one are the interests of all; the injury of one the injury of all.

Other fundamentals can also be taught. The law of average, on which all insurance is based, must be made the foundation. The immutable law by which happenings in great number are regulated almost to a certainty is most fascinating to the child fond of research. The theory of probability, simplified so as to come within his understanding, will appeal with resistless force to the young person of mathematical mind. I have found the application of this law to losses in fire, life and miscellaneous insurance one of the most interesting of topics to present to the young.

Essentially Co-operative.

The essentially co-operative character of insurance as a business, because it is based on an exact science, can next be made impressive. The young should grow to manhood not with the idea that the insurance company is an immense, greedy, destructive octopus, strangling and devouring the hapless public, but with the thought strongly impressed that it is composed of fellow-insurers, each contributing small amounts to a common fund, from which are taken the larger payments made to the small number who suffer loss. Let them know that this is the case, no matter what kind of insurance is involved. As a corollary to this truth will come the thought that if one would diminish his contributions to this fund he must help lessen the losses, and lo! the whole great and magnificent subject of conservation is introduced!

The sociological and economic side of the question can be impressed. The youth can be made to know that pauperism, dependency, helplessness, poverty and a host of similar ills are prevented by wisely selected and carefully continued insurance, of whatever kind. Teach them that there is no finer system of philanthropic finance devised. Make the impression so strong that when the high official of a great insurance company says, as one stated in the New York investigation of 1905, that insurance is essentially an eleemosynary institution, the statement will be greeted with approval and not with derision. For the words this official uttered were true, and have been proved, and should be impressed and accepted.

People Should be Informed.

These things have been earnestly advocated in addresses by insurance executives and others, but these addresses, with the valuable lessons they convey, have not been brought strongly and effectually before the general public. They have been used for limited distribution among insurance people, but they have not reached the great common people. Yet the common people should know these things. They are part of the fundamental principles underlying all insurance. No man can really understand the technical details of the science of insurance without knowing these things.

Hence my idea is to start this movement with simple elementary instruction on these and other fundamentals, with the school children, even as low as the eighth grade. The work should be prepared so simply that the teacher of the eighth grade or the high school or the business college, though entirely lacking in technical insurance education, can take the work up with the student and get at a proper understanding of these fundamentals. The only place where this has so far been attempted is in the text-books prepared by some of the large life insurance companies and distributed to their agents. Here the right idea has been caught and followed. What is needed now is general work of a similar character properly simplified and amplified for universal use. It is a matter partly of text-book and partly of teaching, the one dependent upon the other.

Let the boy be taught to realize that the only method of saving effectual with the average young man is the systematic and persistent payment of life insurance premiums. Teach the girl the advantage of insuring her own life. Teach her also that when she becomes a woman she must not regard her husband's first life insurance policy as his death warrant, but as a warrant of future safety and independence to her and her children. Teach the future business man the indispensability of insurance in every incident of his business career.

Growing out of these are many valuable elements. Conservation with all its diverging and converging lines is one of these. The personal element in fire prevention, accident prevention and life extension will be properly manifested. Previous treatment of these has been too impersonal. I am not so much interested in what the nation loses as I am in what I lose or my neighbor loses. Scrooge could speak very glibly about death reducing the surplus population until application was made of his general remark to Tiny Tim, the crippled child of his own clerk. So we may speak very glibly, with perhaps a certain pardonable pride, of the great fire loss and accident record and homicide record of our country, but when my neighbor's house burns or he is injured or dies the personal element enters and I see how this general loss is after all of special and local application. Then let it be understood that my fire insurance rate and my accident insurance rate is high because somewhere, perhaps everywhere in this great nation, fires and accidents are occurring when they should not, and I am going to join the general movement to reduce them. And I shall be very insistent that my neighbor shall be as careful in these respects as I.

Insurance Long Misrepresented.

Let these fundamentals be impressed with vivid strength on the minds of growing children; let this and future generations grow up side by side with these vital ideas, and you will find the material and moral welfare of our future citizenship greatly enhanced.

Insurance has long been misrepresented through the various media of publicity. It is now time for it to be represented. A course of study in vindication and justification of insurance is now necessary and opportune. If the present generation has been trained up in ignorance and antagonism, future generations must be trained in understanding and friendliness. While the mass of insurance text and teaching is so great as to be overwhelming, and as valuable as these treatises and treatments are and have been, they lie on library shelves or live only in highly technical institutions. They can and must be adapted to the mass, to the many. Insurance is not a subject for the few or the class. It touches too intimately the lives and fortunes of all to be restricted to any certain number.

Legal Reserve Insurance.

Why are assessment insurance advocates heeded in their attacks on the old line system? Because the public does not understand the fundamentals of legal reserve insurance. Why do demagogues succeed in inflaming the public mind by declaiming against the "immense accumulations in the hands of life insurance companies in Wall Street"? Because the people have not been told that without these reserves belonging to the policyholders and administered to their interest every company would be bankrupt. Why are men so fearful of the possible misuse of these funds to the detriment of the common people? Because they do not understand the strict regulation of these funds and their custodians by the laws of 48 States. Why has sectionalism been encouraged and fostered by unscrupulous agitators and promoters in the sacred name of insurance? Because people have not been given to understand that insurance is so general that it belongs to the people as a whole and not to any locality.

Why do gentlemen meet with the unfair competition of organizations which appeal to members to carry their own insurance and save the expense of company management and State supervision? Because the people do not know the difference between present and permanent solvency, and the manner of preserving this by strict supervision, financial skill, and reserve accumulations. So shall the citizens of the future be induced to approach this subject from a friendly, not an antagonistic standpoint. So shall the propaganda of the agent be made easier and more fruitful. But this work of advertising and teaching will never supersede the agent. Him we shall always have with us. He will always be, a necessary adjunct of the business. He is the point of contact between the company and the public. If there is no point of contact between the dynamo and the machine, no direct power is applied, no effective current passes. So your effective insurance current is cut off or fatally weakened without the agent. And by the same token this point of contact must be bright and clean, and tainted or tarnished.

Will this educational work reduce percentage of commissions paid to the agent? This may be possible if the volume of business is increased. Both of these are desirable conditions. Both would be welcomed. They are of value and fully in line with economic improvement.

Fitting the Policy.

Much has been said of late about fitting the policy to the policyholder. While reference has been made chiefly to life insurance, the arguments advanced have some weight and apply in some degree to fire, accident and other lines as well. There are misfit policies of accident and health and liability and fire and other forms. These cause most of the trouble that arises in the relationship of the policyholder to the company and the agent.

Not much and therefore perhaps not nearly enough has been said in this discussion regarding the importance of educating the insured to know the class of policy best suited to his needs. If men can be trained to choose wisely their life, health, accident, liability, fire and other policies of insurance, they will cease to be blindly dependent upon agents who, no matter how well meaning and honest, can not be fully advised as to the conditions and needs of prospective clients. The physician who prescribes medicine must first become intimately acquainted with the symptoms and the entire physical condition of the patient. His diagnosis depends upon this intimate knowledge, and his prognosis and prescription on the diagnosis. It would be considered criminal malpractice for him to make a haphazard guess as to the disease and blindly prescribe a remedy.

So with the lawyer in advising his client. He must spend, if necessary, weeks or months going into the intricacies of the case to be assured that he is making no mistake in the advice he gives. If he fails to fit the advice to the case he also is open to the charge of incompetency.

Advantage to the Public.

Yet because an intimate knowledge of a man's insurance needs cannot always be gained by the agent, his professional treatment of the case may be faulty. This is evidenced by the fact that many men find their policies poorly adapted to their needs. Because of the small amount of commission involved and perhaps the element of competition and the impossibility within the short time allowed for the agent to become intimately familiar with surrounding conditions, it is found rather difficult for him to fit the policy closely to the applicant's needs. Hence the advantage that must accrue when the man himself can intelligently choose with the help of the agent the policy best suited to his condition, which he necessarily understands much better than he can explain it even to the friendly and sympathetic physician of finance, the insurance man. And the difficulty in which the uninformed prospect finds himself is magnified when he is surrounded by a number of agents, each clamoring for his particular company or policy.

I have found in my experience that the twister in life insurance and in accident insurance frequently excuses himself the ground that the policy he is helping to lapse is poorly adapted to the man's needs. And here is his most fruitful field. I think that most of the work of this gentry would be prevented by a fundamental knowledge on the part of the insured of the principle on which his insurance is based. There is another light so effectual in discouraging this form of piracy that which streams from the enlightened mind of the insured victim.

It may seem a little presumptuous for me to make a suggestion somewhat parallel to what has been cited. It often happens that the young man, ignorant of insurance and yet anxious to secure its greatest benefits, goes to the successful farmer or merchant or lawyer or doctor for advice on the subject. You who have had experience, especially in life insurance, know that the average person of the classes named needs a little, a very little, knowledge of insurance. Pope says: "Little knowledge is dangerous." It is especially so if the knowledge is of the wrong kind. It has occurred to me that in the young seeker after insurance guidance goes to one of these prominent men he is about as wise as if he went to a banker for medical advice or to his merchant for legal advice.

A Little Knowledge Dangerous.

For he is likely to gain only the point of view of the one who seeks, and that will probably not be the insurance point of view. He may get the idea that low cost is the ultimate desideratum when in reality it may be the least desirable of all elements connected with the subject. At any rate, he runs the risk of finding a man poorly equipped to aid him with counsel. To use such men are prominent, they are likely to be used (recently perhaps) by unscrupulous promoters of question-bag schemes of insurance as decoys for less prominent persons. And their advice will probably be colored with that of the promoter. At any rate, it cannot be highly professional. With universal insurance education fewer men will allow themselves prominence to be thus misused and fewer persons will blindly follow such leadership.

Hence will come this demand for insurance education? It cannot come with so much grace from interested as from disinterested sources. For the insurance company or the insurance agent to be its strongest champion is to give ground to the suspicion of selfishness. For no matter how much they may try to inculcate the truth that insurance is essentially cooperative in its character, there will still be many among influential who will regard with suspicion and hamper with opposition the attempt on the part of companies and their representatives to establish in the schools and elsewhere courses in insurance teaching.

The Insurance Commissioners.

While, therefore, representatives of the companies can help, initiative must be taken by those not so directly interested, and this is to meet with a high degree of success. I know of no class of men better situated to lead this movement and more interested than the insurance commissioners. They occupy a unique ground. They are representatives of the people, but at the same time they represent them only so far as they are interested by the insurance companies. The reason for their disinterest is the existence of insurance companies, which have dealings with the people, whose servants the insurance commissioners are.

This disinterested relationship peculiarly qualifies the commissioners to establish the need of insurance education and determine its character. They cannot be justly accused of having a great interest in the companies' welfare, and they must have a certain interest in the people of their respective States. Since they are disinterested and yet honestly and anxiously anxious that their people shall understand, and not misunderstand, the great institution on which so much of public and private welfare depends, they would naturally be regarded as those best fitted to take the lead in this important movement.

Hence the great significance of the occasion when the able commissioner, Hon. J. A. O. Preus, of Minnesota, delivered an address last year before the national convention of Insurance Commissioners, in which he urged those officials, individually and collectively, to do everything in their power to secure the establishment of courses in insurance in the schools of the various States.

The insurance journals can be of great assistance. I am glad to see the assistance they are giving to the movement, because it fits with my idea and gives clear and striking expression to a fundamental truth.

To summarize: There is need of insurance education. It must be popularized. The child must be taught insurance in order that the man may know how best to insure. Enlightenment must be our protection against malice and ignorance. The movement for insurance education should be fostered by insurance commissioners, insurance journals and insurance men, and your own splendid organization may well take a leading part. And the result we may confidently expect is enlightened public sentiment, reduced burdens, satisfied policyholders, friendly supervision, effective conservation and the co-operative effort by which all good is accomplished and every right established.

Commissioner McMaster on Competitive Literature.

We have from time to time given considerable attention to the use of competitive literature by companies and by agents. This is a phase of field work which frequently is brought to the attention of State supervising officials, and generally the rulings given point to the abuses which follow in the wake of unfair or misleading comparisons. The most recent utterance on this subject is from Commissioner McMaster, of South Carolina, who has expressed his views on the subject to companies and company representatives operating in his State. It has been suggested by a contemporary that the text of Mr. McMaster's letter might well be taken by the National Association as an ethical platform governing competition. The Commissioner said:

"To the Company or General Agent, Addressed: Most earnestly do I seek your co-operation in enforcing not only just treatment of all companies licensed in this State, but also only wholesome and courteous competition as between the agents themselves, to the end that solicitation of insurance may become indeed a profession.

"The purpose of this letter is to try to put an end to the use of so-called competitive literature and comparative tables. An insurance agent in South Carolina is licensed to work for a particular company; he is not licensed to work against any other company.

"If any company licensed in this State, on account of weakness, bad management or past conduct is not worthy of the confidence of the people of the State, the first information should come to the Insurance Department, to the end that the license of such company may be revoked and the people protected from it. If such showing cannot be made as would warrant the revocation of the license of the company, then it may be asserted that the use of competitive literature or comparative tables, creating distrust and suspicion of such company in the minds of citizens of this State, is unwarranted, and, under the law, may be denominated as wilfully deceiving and dealing unjustly with a citizen of this State, which, after hearing, would require revocation of the license of the agent so doing."

A Man's Work: Not a Boy's.

These are beautiful spring days, and it is a temptation to come to stick around home and dig in the garden; now, a garden is all right—you can get a boy for a dollar a day to do that work, but you can't get anyone to write business for you for a dollar a day—that's your work.—E. C. Budlong.

REACHING OUR IDEALS.

The Standard Set by Others Not the One We Should Take For Our Ambitious Ideals. Man a Master of His Own Destiny.

By Charles J. Rockwell, Field Supervisor, The Edward A. Woods Agency of the Equitable Life Assurance Society, Pittsburgh, Pa.

In every line of endeavor, profession or business there is a certain standard of visible results fixed for us to accomplish, whether by mental or manual labor, to exceed which marks us as successful, and to fall below which stamps us failures. This standard is not one of our own making or choosing, but is set for us by others, and is based upon three things: possibilities, comparisons and expectations. The possibilities of the profession or business, the possibilities of our territory, the comparisons with others now engaged in like work under like circumstances, and the expectations others have of us, knowing our ability and the possibilities. And the insurance business is no exception to this rule. There is a standard set for us by the things I have named; and this we must measure up to, as individuals, or fail in the estimation of our peers.

Mental Attitude.

But, having the right mental attitude, we may fail in our own estimation, even though others know it not, thinking we have accomplished the standard they have set for us. Because the standard thus set for us by others is neither the one we should take for our ambitious ideal, nor the very minimum imposed upon us by our bare necessities. Therefore, though we exceed our minimum, and equal our implied standard, we still fail when, knowing more intimately than others can our possibilities and our ability, we fail to reach our ideal. Such a failure, if we have set that ideal upon the pinnacle worthy of it, is a glorious one. A striving for an ideal unattained is elevating ethically, profitable materially, and strengthening professionally in its results; but a failure to reach the standard automatically imposed upon us, by having entered a certain field of endeavor, should be, and is, a shame.

How to reach this standard is not the purpose of what I have to say; I would project your ambition beyond that, toward the ideal; toward what you would like to be; and, if possible, assist you in the endeavor to exceed it, professionally and practically, making of you, instead of standard and sub-standard men only—just good enough to pass muster—luminaries of a higher magnitude of brilliancy, successes to be admired and pointed out with pride, not to mention the more sordid basis of measuring success in acquiring larger worldly possessions.

A Master of Destiny.

"As a man thinks so he is"; not master of his ultimate destiny entirely, it is true, but to grow upward and outward we must think upward and broader; cultivate this mental attitude within ourselves and impress it on others. But we cannot do it within ourselves; the influence must come from without, and be assimilated by us, and be nurtured within us. We must give ourselves over to a fuller realization of the magnitude of the possibilities afforded by our profession; awake to a conception of its aims, ideals and works, and observe the accomplishments and methods of others whom success has marked for its own.

I know of no other profession (for our calling is a profession) in which professional attainment and personal profit march so closely hand in hand. The doctor and the lawyer, after long and expensive years of collegiate preparation, must wait with gnawing impatience the chance opportunity to prove and profit by their knowledge, and its extent may never be tested nor rewarded; the banker serves an apprenticeship of long study, and, for lack of financial backing to mature what his training has taught him, dies poor; but the insurance man, as his professional education grows and further equips, turns it to greater and immediate profits. He is free to seek clients, tender his services and demonstrate his knowledge if he has it, and the profits follow quickly. This being an undeniable fact, it is established that a higher education is mental to maximum success.

In what does higher education in our profession consist? In a closer acquaintance with our rate-books and our company? To an extent, yes, but not too much. Our rate-books are nothing but tabulated price lists of remedies for human problems, and a constant study of them is no more fitting for high professional attainment than the constant study of a drug catalogue would make us a physician. Not all that is good and perfect and noble is contained within our own group company, grand though it is; such study is narrowing.

Our Field of Growth.

Our field of growth is within ourselves; our hopes, and our ambitions; our studies must be our fellowmen; their problems, responsibilities and objectives. Our usefulness broadened only in the proportion that our ability to conceive, understand and solve the problems of our fellowmen is increased, and our ability to assist them grows with our ability to better plan with them, and for them, higher ambitions and ideals to reach, and to guarantee their success interrupted by death. Only the amateur insurance man is content to take the business lying on the surface of the field; that crumb which unthinking men let fall from the table of their present plenty to be nurtured for the future need of their families. The educated professional insurance man plans with his client for a life financial program in which the cornerstone is a guarantee policy of insurance, assurance of ultimate completion. This cannot be hastily nor ignorantly done; it takes time and thought and must be the outgrowth of education and experience, and its ultimate result is mutual satisfaction. Satisfactory service to client and satisfaction to the advisor.

This is a peculiar calling, this one of ours, and the man who would be successful in it must develop a dual personality. He must at once be an idealist, a dreamer, a self-starter, a professional man and a reformer; without failing to be practical, a forceful personality, a banker, lawyer or salesman. But as material success so closely follows on professional attainment we may safely develop the latter without danger of loss in the other.

A New Desire.

I would then suggest, without losing sight of that standard which is fixed for you by others, and which you cannot evade, that you dedicate yourselves and your minds to the following of ideals; that you create for yourselves a new desire; that you loathe the ordinary and strive for a higher plane; that you take a fuller appreciation of your possibilities for doing greater things; that you grasp every opportunity afforded you to pull yourselves out of your comfortable rut to the high plane of restless ambition; that you realize that you are not merely a salesman; that this is not a money-making scheme; that it is not sordid in its aims, but that it is a grand national movement for the conservation of wealth and happiness, the guarantor of success in cherished hopes, the foundation of financial programs, while never failing as the protector of the homes and the morals of the widows and orphans; that you are its representative.

May you measure fully up to its ideals, its possibilities; may you prove competence to apply its services, and prove example your worthiness and the success of its teachings. May your education be broadened your opportunities for being of service will multiply; as they multiply, and as your income compels the tender of your services, and your training teaches you to demonstrate their value, more and more will you be sowing the seed of thrift where wastefulness grew, making dignity in the place of selfish indifference, making for high ambitions in your community, reckoned as a man of affairs and influence, and showered by the blessings of those whom you have faithfully well served.

SOME CURRENT LIFE INSURANCE PROBLEMS.

Pertinent Discussion of Important Topics from the Viewpoints of the State, Company, General Agent, Solicitor and the Public.

By S. Epstein, Commissioner of Insurance, State of Colorado.

Commissioner Epstein delivered this address at the Annual Banquet of the Utah Association. In it you will find nothing startling or sensational. It is a honest study of questions which must be solved and it will broaden your outlook by giving you an idea of the various phases of the profession which are brought to the attention of supervising officials.—Editor's Note.

The average citizen does not realize the vast importance of insurance in our modern business, economic and private life. Without insurance, business would be almost at a standstill, industry could not thrive, and the dependent portion of the population—women and children—would have but a dreary prospect before them if the father and bread-winner should die. From some points of view insurance is a great, unified, whole. From other points of view it is as detailed and varied as the most complex living organism known to biology under powerful microscopes and by the most subtle chemical analyses.

It is not my purpose this evening to talk to you regarding insurance as a whole, nor is it my purpose to go into the minutiae of the business. I shall try to find a middle ground to discuss the situation from three points of view: (1) from the point of view of the State; (2) from the point of view of the company; (3) from the point of view of the individual.

THE STATE.

Taxes Should Not be Increased.

What are some of the leading insurance problems before the State? Ask the politician and he will tell you: "Raise the taxes." Ask the enthusiast and he will tell you that the State should require from the companies more detailed statistics and more frequent reports. Ask an office-seeker and he will tell you: "Curb the corporations." But none of these is right. The taxes on companies are already too high. Every dollar taken from a company means a dollar less returned to the public in the form of dividends, in the form of paid-up insurance. Insurance taxes should not be raised—they should be lowered. The enthusiast is wrong, too. We do not need more statistics and more detailed information. Every question you ask a company means a salary to a clerk and perhaps to a fully paid actuary. Every time the commissioner writes a letter to a company it means an expense to the policyholder. The requirements of States are too numerous, and frequently nonsensical. Proper supervision is needed—even rigorous supervision is needed. But it must be scientific supervision, well thought out, methodical, effective. Supervision of this kind we have, but unfortunately we have also haphazard supervision—supervision which is not methodical, which is not well planned. This latter sort of supervision must be improved.

So many people seem to think that an insurance department exists for the purpose of burdening and repressing insurance companies. This is not the case. Insurance departments exist for the purpose of helping and guiding and aiding insurance companies, so that they can give better and more efficient service to their policyholders.

An insurance company is a public servant—a public servant in the highest sense. It averages up the inequalities of human life. While the State must see to it that irresponsible companies and fake concerns are eliminated, it must, on the other hand, see to it that the good and reliable companies are encouraged and assisted in the fulfillment of their public functions.

The office-seeker who shouts, "Curb the corporations!" is a biased individual. He sees the world through colored spectacles. True, there are many corporations which have needed curbing, but this does not apply to the standard insurance corporations of to-day. Corporations are like individuals—some men are good and some men are bad, and some men are neither very good nor very bad. Some insurance companies are good; these do not need any curbing. Some are bad, but there are not many of these, and they must be reformed. Some are neither very good nor very bad, and these must be helped to come within the fold.

As I look over the list of the 362 companies operating in Colorado I find that fully 350 of them are in good shape and deserve the commendation of the State Insurance Department. The remaining ten or twelve are on the road to becoming excellent companies, and with proper help and encouragement will make good.

The Sherman Anti-Trust Law.

You see, therefore, from these figures that insurance companies should not be classed among those organizations which are being fought by the national government under the Sherman anti-trust law. And, indeed, I am glad to be able to say that no one who knows anything about insurance takes this position as regards insurance companies. This attitude, so far as I can see, is without justification, and exists only among professional reformers and professional politicians.

II. THE COMPANY.

What are some of the leading problems before the life insurance companies? The number is vast. One could spend an hour in enumerating them without making a single comment on any one of them. I shall, however, select a small number and say but a word on each.

(A) Legislation:

Every time the Legislature meets the companies are compelled to exercise vigilance—to safeguard themselves against radical, unwise and harmful legislation; harmful not only to the companies, but through them to the public.

In a larger sense the companies have a constructive problem before them in the way of legislation, namely, to secure uniform legislation in the several States, and thus to avoid the numerous variations in the requirements of the different commonwealths.

(B) Agents:

The Viewpoint of Agents.

Every company is striving to secure a better class of agents. Some of them even conduct training schools for their agents. It is an ever-present problem to develop the agency forces of the companies.

(C) Policy Loans and the Consequent Lapsing of Insurance in Force:

This problem cannot be overlooked and is one which must be met. True, the companies have themselves somewhat to blame for this, by permitting their agents in the past to educate the public on the opportunity of borrowing money on insurance policies. However, it is useless to discuss "what might have been." We must not look to the past; we must turn our eyes to the future. The evil of policy loans must be brought under control.

(D) Conservation:

The problem of conservation of life and health is an important one, and is receiving more attention every day from the companies. It is a large problem and involves questions which at first seem to have little connection with an insurance company, but which are in reality vital to the business and of untold value to the public at large.

(E) Investments:

The question of investment of assets is an ever-present one. Which securities are safe—which are unsafe? What is the interest rate? Which securities are readily marketable? Should one lend on city property or on farms, or on both? Should the market value or the amortized value be reported? And so on.

(F) Group Insurance:

Is group insurance a good thing? Should it be universally adopted? How should it be applied, and how operated?

I ask your indulgence for not commenting on this topic. On Monday, upon my return to Colorado, I am to make a formal address on this subject. Further, it is not necessary to speak on this topic in Utah. Your own commissioner has written on it. The best analysis I have ever seen of the subject of group insurance was the one published by Commissioner Done last summer.

III. THE AGENT:

The problems of the agent I shall take up under two sub-headings—the general agent and the solicitor.

The General Agent.

A good general agency is almost an insurance company in itself. Its problems are as numerous and as varied, its troubles and difficulties as great. The general agent must be a man of character and of force. He must not only be well versed in insurance; he must be a student of men, a financier, an organizer, a man of tact, and a man of talent.

He must know how to organize and maintain an office; not merely an office which will run smoothly while he is present, but one which will run even when he is called away for days and weeks at a time. He must be able to sell insurance himself. He must know how to organize a field force; and when it is organized he must know how to conserve and maintain it permanently. He must know how to take the young, green recruit and teach him to become an efficient insurance solicitor.

He must teach his men not to knock their competitors—to work in harmony with the other insurance men. It does not pay to knock a competing company. It does you credit to think that yours is the best company in the world, but down in the bottom of your heart you know perfectly well, if your general agency were canceled and you received a general agency for another company, you would be equally loyal to it and you could just as conscientiously recommend its policies. Knocking is wrong, and is not and cannot be sincere.

The general agent must teach his solicitors the enormity and futility of rebating. He must convince them that twisting is wrong and that misrepresentation is criminal. He must be able to impart to his solicitors the knowledge how to fit a policy to the needs of the applicant.

What every general agent wants is business—quality and quantity, but quality first. Business which does not stick is not only worthless, but it is a distinct loss. The greatest asset to a general agent as well as to a company is a satisfied and contented policyholder. The general agent must, therefore, be able to get business himself; to teach his solicitors how to get business and to be able to conserve the business which has been acquired. To do all this requires qualities of a high grade. A good, successful general agent is, and must necessarily be, every inch a man.

The Solicitor.

Probably the best way to rise in the insurance business is to begin in the field, rate-book in hand, as a solicitor. The problems of the solicitor are different from those of the State superintendent, from those of the company, and, in a lesser degree, from those of the general agent. But if his problems are different, they are none the less strenuous and important. While all are needed—State supervisor, company, general agent and solicitor—I am of the opinion that the solicitor is the most important of all. It is the solicitor who gets the business; he is the original producer—the man with the hoe. Without him, and without the personal soliciting of the general agent, company executives would have nothing to do, commissioners would have nothing to supervise.

A good solicitor combines many qualities. He is an educator, for he educates the public to the need of thrift, of protection, of economy, of looking into the future and facing, with vision, old age and death. He is a preacher, too, for he preaches the gospel of insurance; he preaches on the duty of protecting those who are near and dear against the death of the family bread-winner. He is a manufacturer, for his work is creative; he creates the want for insurance in the mind of the prospect, just as a manufacturer creates a finished article from the raw material. He is a newspaper man in sense, for he collects and disseminates insurance news; he collects the current events by actual observation in the field and he spreads about the news if a company is weak, if it is insolvent, if it is remiss in the payment of claims. He is a salesman, and, as you all know, a salesman of the highest grade. One can get a good job as salesman for any kind of firm if he merely proves that he has been successful in selling insurance. He is a psychologist, too—a practical psychologist for he must be able to read men's minds and guide their thoughts along the lines he has mapped out. It requires considerable understanding of psychology and human nature to "close a case."

Conclusion.

I have discussed a few of the current problems of life insurance in a brief manner. Some of them are permanent problems and some of them are transient problems. The discussion has been from the point of view of the State, from the point of view of the company, from the point of view of the general agent, and from the point of view of the solicitor.

Were I the only speaker on the program and had a greater amount of time at my disposal I should be glad to talk at length on the problems of insurance from the point of view of the public. In reality, however, I have already done so implicitly if not explicitly. The interests are all interwoven and identical. If the State supervision is faulty, the public suffers. If the State supervision is good, the public gains by it. If a company is badly conducted, the public suffers. If a company is well conducted, the public gains by it. If an agent is a rebater, a twister, if he makes misrepresentation, the public suffers. If he is honorable, straightforward, conscientious, the public gains by it.

For these reasons it is apparent that, in discussing the problems of insurance from the points of view already enumerated, I have been in reality discussing them from the point of view of the public and with the public welfare in mind.

Service.

That life insurance is something much more than a mere business out of which a group of men make their livings is a notion that is showing remarkable vitality and growth. General ideas of this character become public opinions only very slowly, but thereafter exhibit great tenacity. The day has passed when a life insurance company was judged by its size; it is passing when judgment is solely based on how cheaply a stipulated sum can be paid at death. The time is rapidly approaching when a life insurance company and the life insurance business will be judged not only upon its financial strength and efficiency in reducing the cost of insurance, but also upon the skill with which its managers are able to meet the legitimate social and business needs of the public.—Field Notes.

Don't Build Up by Tearing Down.

Success that is worth anything must come as the result of one's own efforts, and not at the expense of someone else's. Successful business enterprises are seldom built up by tearing others down. When a person allows deceit to become a part of his working capital, all that is good in him withers and dies. A man who deceives others, deceives himself, and he who undertakes to secure a great fortune regardless of HOW is his own worst enemy.—V. I. M.

"AS LONG AS SHE MAY LIVE."Keeping Abreast with the Times by Paying Attention to the Necessity for Life Income Insurance.

By H. C. Fetsch, General Agent, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, Portland, Ore.

In connection with the march of progress that we are witnessing to-day I am going to take the liberty of asking ourselves this question: Are we keeping abreast with the times? After some thought I am forced to give the following paradoxical answer: We are, and we are not. We are in so far as the individual companies which we represent are concerned, but we are not in so far as our own individual efforts are concerned. This, I admit, is a serious rebuke. Is it justifiable? I think it is. Pick up any of the leading insurance journals and you do not have to turn over very many pages before your eyes will meet these words in bold type: "Gentle reader, do you appreciate the full value and urgent need of the application of the idea of income insurance? Do you hear the urgent cry for better protection and lasting protection to the insuring public?"

Income insurance is not altogether new. We have had it for some 20 years past, but we have been asleep. If not, why this clarion call and concentrated effort to sell real life insurance, this new family service of life insurance? Insurance men sold the old forms in the past because they and many of the companies knew no better. Now, however, with his new service we haven't that excuse. We usually sell that which we understand and which we believe in. We have only lately begun to understand the income feature of life insurance. It is reported that one of the big life insurance companies has followed up its death losses of $5,000 or more. The result of this investigation brings out the astounding fact that after seven years 90 per cent. of the beneficiaries have lost or spent the entire proceeds of the insurance, and in 10 years' time all, or 100 per cent., of the beneficiaries have lost or spent the entire proceeds.

Three Types of Insurance.

In this modern age we have all the types of insurance. Foremost of all—life insurance. Then follow fire, health, accident, marine, boiler, plate glass and many others. And now we add another which I am pleased to call insurance insurance. In other words, we can now insure insurance. This is the income policy. Lump sum insurance is no longer the real thing for family protection. The new service is here. It begins where the old service left off and carries protection as long as the family exists. We are enlightened. Our duty is plainly before us, enlightenment of the public.

Let me submit a few figures. A policy of $3,000 in any American old line company will guarantee about $20 a month or 15 years. By way of comparison, consider a $10,000 policy. The company owes $10,000 cash at death. In lieu hereof it will pay $652 a year for 20 years. (Payments increased by surplus interest dividends in some of the companies.) The earnings on $10,000 at five per cent. are $500 annually. The difference between this and $652 is $152, or 30 per cent. of $500. Again, on a four per cent. investment the earnings are $400, making a difference of $252, or 63 per cent. of $400. Therefore you improve condition of beneficiary from 30 to 63 per cent. by using the income feature of a policy contract on the above basis.

Men segregate themselves into two classes—the underinsured and the uninsured. The income policy is applicable to both. Men carrying fairly large lines of insurance will listen to this type of insurance when efforts to place additional amounts on the old forms fail. We know this to be true. It may mean greater effort, more time and more education to sell the uninsured this type of protection, but the result is worth the additional effort, since larger lines are usually sold on this form.

In presenting monthly income insurance the following method, I think, is feasible, as it gives a good idea of the returns to be expected. Take the insured's age about 40, beneficiary about 18, 20-payment life continuous monthly income policy $60 per month. The case being where father desires to protect the daughter "as long as she shall live." Your presentation should be as follows: In consideration of your paying to the company $432 for a maximum period of 20 years (you may, of course, pay no more than one premium), the company agrees to pay to your beneficiary $720 a year for a minimum period of 20 years and as much longer as she may live; or, again, you pay the company three per cent. of $14,400, the sum insured, for 20 years, at the most, and the company agrees to pay to your beneficiary five per cent. of the same sum for not less than 20 years and as long thereafter as the beneficiary may live. This gives the prospect a good idea of the proposition, as it states a relationship between the amount paid to the company and the amount to be received by the beneficiary.

When we examine a continuous monthly income contract we come across the following phrase, one to which I wish to dedicate a few words, namely, "As long as the original beneficiary shall live." As long as she shall live. Does it appeal? I need not answer. Show the prospect that his beneficiary may outlive an investment, friends, counselors and almost any other human contingency, but she cannot outlive the monthly income. I propose a twentieth century slogan, "As Long As She Shall Live."

We owe to our daughters and future generations that same defense which our forefathers knew they owed us when they fought for our political liberties. Let us be true to our convictions and work intelligently and faithfully, so that each and every one of our daughters may know that protection is hers "as long as she may live."

The Survival of the Fittest.

If you can do anything exceptionally well, there is a berth in this work-a-day world for you. The public is not your enemy. It is even willing to be your friend and is desirous of helping you in its own way. It will lend you its influence and reward you with its hard earnings, just in proportion as you serve and are valuable to it. If you shirk work and manifest no desire to serve, the inexorable law of the survival of the fittest will bear down upon you and you will be out of the race.—General Accident.

Two Classes of Agents.

There are two classes of agents, to wit: Those who are in the business with regard solely to present commissions. Those who have taken up life insurance with the serious earnestness that they would direct to the pursuit of any other profession. These latter are far-sighted men, who see in our business a dignified field of labor and a means of securing a comfortable competency for life. To these men the commission is an important incident in their work, but not the chief end of it. Their aim is to attain to the highest degree of efficiency possible. With them success has a value which cannot be measured by money. They can safely leave the material reward to take care of itself. It is a certain sequence to such work as theirs.—Pointers.

During the past ten years, according to Bradstreet's, there have been over 100,000 commercial failures, with liabilities of over $1,500,000,000. During the past ten years 600 banks and trust companies have closed their doors, with liabilities of over $380,000,000.

During the past ten years there have been railroad receiverships, with stock and bond issues involved of over $600,000,000. While of life insurance it can be said that for more than thirty years there has not been one failure of an old-time life insurance company which has been conducted on the legal reserve basis.—Travelers' Agents Record.

INSTITUTIONAL ADVERTISING—SOME OBJECTIONS.

Limited only by the provisions of the Constitution and By-Laws of the National Association, local associations enjoy complete autonomy. A resolution may be passed at an annual convention of the National Association, contemplating certain definite and prescribed activities, but the National body has wisely and justly never attempted to coerce any local association into adopting any specific action thereon. Its authority can go no further than to recommend to local associations a course of action carefully planned for the greatest good to the greatest number of its individual members.

So far as we have record, every local affiliated with the National Association approved the recommendations promulgated by the National Committee on Education and Conservation, at the Atlantic City convention, but it is quite impossible to conceive that in a National organization of approximately 4,000 men there are not a certain percentage who are inclined to enter a dissenting opinion. Critical and particular opposition to a campaign of Institutional Advertising has occasionally appeared on the surface, and the attitude of such members has been exhibited by a refusal to contribute their quota, together with a public declaration of the reason for their refusal.

We welcome criticism because it not only gives us an opportunity to detect a weak spot in the ranks, but also tends to assist us in finding a flaw in our arguments. Incidentally, in this respect, all expressed opposition to the proposed campaign has thus far been of small value to us.

It is reported that at a recent meeting of one of the New England associations a prominent member of that particular body expressed himself as being of the opinion that Institutional Advertising was so well adapted to promote confusion that he could not see the real need of it, and therefore was in doubt as to its ultimate value. We admire the man who disagreed with us; for, in justice to ourselves, we need his viewpoint. It has been declared times innumerable that a company could not succeed without successful field work, and this was one of the statements made by the member whose observations we are now considering. It seems, however, that he reversed his opinion by means of a hypothetical situation, stating, in substance, that, with an enlightened public, agents would not be required. Nevertheless, it was his belief that if Institutional Advertising would work out advantageously to field forces, it would simply be a matter of common business prudence to enter into it.

As to this phase of the situation, this must be said: The solicitation of life insurance is a desperately difficult branch of salesmanship. This is an admission which naturally we put no stress upon, because it would militate against securing new agents. However, this is merely between ourselves; and, as the News circulates almost exclusively among experienced life insurance men, an honest admission of this character should do no harm. Actual results in the field have been accurately calculated, and the work of the average agent is about nine policies sold to 130 actual interviews per month. The number of calls made to secure these 130 interviews but give a vague idea of the indifference of the public as to the benefits of life insurance. Institutional Advertising, it is believed, will tend to materially lessen the arduous duties of the solicitor. With a field more susceptible of cultivation, there could be no other outcome.

"Institutional, or, in other words, educational advertising," said the party of the first part, "by a combination of interests does not seem to harmonize with the great foundational principles of publicity upon which have been built world-wide reputations for business houses that are little known in their own community; nor does institutional advertising seem to be the kind used by our business organizations. Evidently they do not think it necessary to carry forward to a desired enlargement the interests they have in hand. Many illustrations of this might be taken in the wide realm of the business concerns of the country. But one may stand for all and may suffice. Take a single one, in the business of banking, in our own city or country, and what do we find? Do we find any combination of interests for the purpose of carrying on a nation-wide scheme of advertising? Who knows of anything of this sort, unless, forsooth, it is in the interests of a trust or a monopoly? Is there any such thing in use anywhere?"

Institutional Advertising is a new idea, but it should not, for this reason, be condemned. Much of the opposition to the proposed campaign is based upon objections no more solid than the novelty of it, and because it has but recently been discussed.

In direct and specific answer to the statements quoted above, we would call attention to the following interests, which have all recognized the benefits of this plan of publicity. The Oyster Growers and Dealers' Association of North America clubbed together last year in their advertising, and it is understood that the results secured were very satisfactory. A similar campaign was instituted by the manufacturers of glazed kid, and the only reason it was discontinued was because the advertising brought such excellent results that the manufacturers could not see the necessity of further immediate advertising. The National Association of Tile Manufacturers have advertised on an institutional basis, while the Dominion of Canada is now planning for a country-wide campaign of publicity in the United States, the expense of which is to be paid out of the Immigrant Department of the Dominion. The gas companies of the various large cities of the United States have now under way an Institutional Advertising scheme, and $100,000 has already been subscribed for the initial movement. The Apple Growers' Association of the United States is now preparing an advertising propaganda, and educational articles with regard to the use of apples will be published in the leading papers of the country. It will be remembered that, at the Atlantic City convention, sheets were distributed by the Philadelphia North American, setting forth the Institutional Advertising of the florists and the electric power interests. Many other examples might be quoted, but these should suffice.

If these facts had been known, certainly the dissenting member would not have had reason to say: "If Institutional Advertising is really the best way for these thousands and thousands of businesses to promote their individual interests, it would seem as though some of them at least would, ere this, have found it out and by some system joined together to give the general public educational information about the trade. But they have never done so and we venture to conjecture they never will."

The gentleman whose opinions we are discussing believes that by means of competitive advertising a given company would have a field largely its own. There are companies who believe in competitive advertising and doubtless much good has resulted. But let us ask the question: How much greater would be the results with better tools and more perfect equipment?

To quote further from the address in question:

"Another thought. Suppose the public to be enlightened in life insurance, suppose the public indoctrinated with the importance of it and the value of it, until every man you meet is 'wise to it,' would it be likely to make the work of the field men of any single company easier or more successful? Furthermore, suppose, if you can, the public to be thus aroused from their lethargy, until every man should be thinking of life insurance and inquiring about it, how long would it be before the field workers would be looked upon as 'go between,' middle men making the expense of life insurance unnecessarily large and their factorship considered with disfavor? Men desiring insurance, instead of negotiating it through these agents, would go directly to the company."

Are we to believe that an enlightened public means the elimination of the agent? Would it not be just as consistent to discourage all suggestions to people of this country as to hygiene and sanitation, for fear that there would be no further work for the physicians? Should we not insist that tooth brushes be discarded because they make less work for the dentists? Why should the people of New York advocate the observance of regulations conducive to order and decency? Surely 12,000 policemen should not be deprived of a means of livelihood. Statistics show us no decrease in the number of doctors, dentists, or policemen, although it would seem that there is at the present time an almost universal knowledge of the subjects that have to do with their specific ministrations.

It was President Joseph A. De Boer, of the National Life of Vermont, who said:

"Without personal solicitation business will fail, without honest solicitation business booked will be impaired, without agency care of business it will fail of its proper renewal, and without agency support satisfactory adjustments of business and corporate reputation must suffer both in character and results.

"Appreciating the fact from every standpoint that all human institutions, political, religious, industrial and social, must rest upon their ultimate claims to self-preservation, upon the service they render to the average man, upon the principles of a just and equitable share in the gifts of nature and the results of work, and upon that count it is reasonable to base the claim of professionalism and permanency of the life agent's work.

"The agent in any profession, commerce, law, divinity, or insurance, who induces the establishment of a service which promotes mutual advantage among men, is well and nobly occupied and among such agents none, in my judgment, hold higher rank than the life insurance agent because of his indispensability to advancing and enforcing its service and because that service itself is of unspeakable value to society."

Should we cease to live in accordance with the ten commandments because the observance of the decalogue might deprive clergymen of their profession?

The greatest campaign of Institutional Advertising in the history of the World has been Christianity. More money has been contributed and disbursed in this cause than for any other one purpose of which history has record. Think of a propaganda having to its credit a record of approximately 2,000 years of continuous effort. Think of its magnificent textbook, the Bible, portions of which antedate the birth of Christ by hundreds of years. Consider the schools, colleges, monasteries, nunneries, churches, missions, missionaries, the Young Men's Christian Associations, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Salvation Army and all the other various instrumentalities for the spread of the Gospel. All these for institutional publicity in its purest sense. Has all this developed conditions which means the elimination of the minister or the priest?

Salvation, or soul-assurance, is a simple proposition depending largely upon faith; Life Insurance is highly technical and demands the stimulation of volitional mental activity to a degree which precluded the acceptance of any dogma. The proposed campaign of Institutional Advertising of Life Insurance is fundamentally altruistic, and the advantage to the agent, though certain, should be looked upon as a by-product.

Therefore, it is infinitely more illogical to imagine the elimination of the Life Insurance agent, through the means of a universal knowledge of Life Insurance, as there would be to contemplate the passing of the clergyman, because of the rapid increase of the believers in Christianity.

The Renewal Income Tax.

The question as to whether renewals, whenever paid, but earned prior to February 27, 1913, are subject to the income tax, was argued on February 19 by Hon. A. I. Vorys and Charles A. Woods, Esq., at Washington, before Hon. Ellis C. Johnson, solicitor for the Income Tax Division of the Treasury Department. Though overwhelmed with work just at the close of the period when making returns expired, he gave a full and courteous hearing to counsel, lasting over an hour and a half, and, in addition, promised to carefully consider a brief which was left by counsel.

Mr. Johnson took a great interest in the question submitted to him and asked many pertinent questions. At the close of the argument he frankly admitted that a very strong case had been made out and stated that he would endeavor to give an opinion before the date for filing the income tax papers, March 1. So far we are not informed whether Solicitor Johnson, with the great press of duties before that department of the Government, has been able to furnish an opinion or not. Late Saturday night, February 28, the following telegram was received from Commissioner Osborne:

As at present advised, this office holds that renewal commissions received by insurance agents are income subject to tax for the year in which received, or in which they become to such agents an enforceable claim.

Whether the Commissioner, in the rush of duties, was unable to come to a final conclusion, as might be intimated from the telegram, beginning "as at present advised," or whether Solicitor Johnson has yet been able to go thoroughly into the case, we cannot, at the time of going to press, state.

Even if Commissioner Osborne and Solicitor Johnson should hold, for the sake of adjustment with the Government, that renewals are income, it is proposed to endeavor to secure the consent of the Government to submit a test case, so that it will not be necessary to pay the tax June 1 and sue the Government for its recovery.

The further the case is gone into by counsel, the stronger does the justice of the case appear, the decisions having been numerous that a renewal income property acquired at the time the original insurance was effected, even although payment therefor by way of renewal commissions is deferred, and those familiar with the subject seem quite confident that a favorable decision will finally be secured.

Executive Committee.

RELIGION AND LIFE INSURANCE.

Though Commercial in Its Immediate Aim, Life Insurance is Immensely Social and Moral in Its Reaction on Society.

By Dr. John E. White, Pastor of the Second Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga.

This is a synopsis of a sermon delivered by Dr. White to the insurance men of Atlanta. When we consider that there are over 35,000,000 communicants to the various churches of the United States, it gives us an idea of a tremendous influence which might be used to good advantage. No class of men know more about the practical advantages of Life Insurance, unless it be undertakers.—Editor's Note.

A preacher of the gospel, who appreciates the advantage of minds prepared for his message, should feel very confident of his audience whenever it is his privilege, as it is mine to-day, to stand before a large assembly of insurance men. The points of contact in sympathy and the angles of analogy in principle between the preacher and the insurance agent are most striking and instructive. Personally, you are persuaders of men. You deal with the individual in direct appeal. You have an argument to make, a story to tell, a message to deliver, and you aim for a verdict.

In the intelligent understanding of your profession you are also the prophets of a propaganda which, though commercial in immediate aim, is immensely social and moral in its reaction on society. Your proposition is one that makes for individual well-being and social integrity, and inures us to the moral advantage of civilization.

Your business is built upon sound economic doctrines, with the added weight of philanthropic consequences. You preach the doctrine of mutual aid and your fundamental moral appeal is "bear ye one another's burdens." You offer to men an investment which promotes the comfort of the mind and the sense of security which follows forethought and assured provision. You argue from the standpoint of experience and common sense that men may assure their peace of mind by insuring their lives and property, and thus to quell the earthly qualms of doubt and dread and disaster. You proclaim the promise and the pledge of benefits to character through a conscientious attitude toward the realities of life and benefits to conduct through the practise of thoughtful thrift and self-denial. You proffer the guarantee of postponed benefits accruing and accumulating against the ordeals of the future, when further human effort is over and the end has come.

The Social Value.

Perhaps the public, and perhaps insurance men themselves, have not been sufficiently impressed with the social value of their business. The motive of gain is, of course, immediate and urgent, but to a thoughtful insurance man the social and moral motives may rightly furnish the impulse of a broader and nobler attitude toward his life's work. Insurance as a business has emerged from its earlier history of hazard and financial venture. It has evolved into a world-wide Providence. Who can estimate the vast volume of comfort the human race has received and is receiving from the insurance business? It would require a colossal imagination to figure out the psychological deposit, the mental emotions and the tears and smiles born of an inward gratitude, which are being produced in the world to-day through its operations.

Milton said, "Only good men can do good work." The insurance man who gets an intelligent comprehension of his opportunities to do good is bound to be a better man. He need not parade his conscience, nor protest his moral motives, for the world is cynical of commercial philanthropy, but there is an honest and sincere purpose toward his business. As a contribution to the welfare of humanity he has the right and the duty to exercise, and thereby to gain a nobler courage and a finer conscience in his daily task.

To promote the moral earnestness, which it is my duty to do, and to assist in lifting the avocations of life to the highest levels of moral obligation, I venture to submit to you the insurance man's creed:

First.—Confronting the stern facts of human life and in view of the unyielding liability of human experience and in sympathy with those who are tempted to improvidence and those who suffer by neglectful inattention to wise forethought, I believe it is my duty to help create a better individual and social spirit of prudence and thrift through the insurance business

Individual Character.

Second.—I believe it is to the improvement of individual character for men to practise frugality and self-denial, and also a contribution to the integrity of family life for responsible men and women to assume the obligations which an honest insurance policy imposes.

Third.—I believe that sickness, misfortune, disaster and death in the reign of an all-wise and inscrutable Providence are the common liabilities of mankind, and that they may serve a good end when men are brought to face them thoughtfully and to act according to the dictates of necessity and reason by providing as far as possible against their sorrows.

Fourth.—I believe that mutual aid through the organization of individuals who thus consciously or unconsciously may help to bear one another's burdens is a sound principle of a permanent social order and in keeping with the highest and best wisdom known among men, and I believe that insurance is one of the great modern modes of thus socializing society on a basis of honesty and fairness without laying unjust tribute upon the man for the benefit of the few.

Fifth.—I believe that insurance combining the sound principles of investment and protection is a good man's job, and that the man on the job ought to make a good conscience his work, speaking the truth and despising lies, practising what he preaches for a wholesome example and willing to accept for himself the moral and religious logic to which the basic principles of his daily employment may direct him as an intellectually honest man.

Keeping Your Money at Home—How It Can't be Done.
Space in the daily newspapers is generally supposed to be valuable, and it is. But when a Southern or Western newspaper, in a spirit of local pride, devotes several columns to an old plea of "Keep your money at home," in an attempt to stir up the service offered by a purely local life insurance company in contradistinction to the old line companies, then the case becomes cheap and argumentation specious.

It is an old, old story, this "keep your money at home" position, and a worthless waste of printer's ink. It is to be regretted that those who are responsible for its publication are not conversant with the actual facts of the case. We might be well content to occasionally permit an editor to believe the truth of the old adage, "Where ignorance is bliss, folly to be wise," were it not for the fact that daily newspapers have readers, and the public should not be misled and mislead on a subject of such vital interest as life insurance.

But a few months ago our attention was called to a case in which a cartoon appeared in the Wichita (Kan.) Beacon attempting to convey the impression that the people of Kansas were policyholders in Eastern companies were contributing their money to the Kings of High Finance of Wall Street, that for every dollar so paid in premiums Kansas suffered corresponding commercial loss. H. W. Allen, president of the Wichita association and State agent of the Mutual Benefit, on this occasion to reply to the president of one of the local companies, who, it was said, was responsible for the cartoon. The principal points brought out in Mr. Allen's communication were to the effect that: (1) The prejudice and misunderstanding which at present exists in the public mind with regard to life insurance is so great that there should be no deliberate attempt to create more of it. (2) No successful life insurance company long remains a local proposition, and a company is as extensive as the territory it covers. (3) In 1912 one Western company collected nearly $7,000,000 of premiums in New York alone, and for all practical purpose this company is just as much a New York company as any with home offices there.

In times of financial depression enormous demands are made upon all companies. High-class bonds fluctuate very much, because of their world-wide market, but a Kansas man is not listed in London, Paris, Berlin or New York. Hence the embarrassment of any company endeavoring to find its assets within any given State.

Just One Way.

Can money be kept at home? Yes, there is one way. Get out the old blue woolen sock, Hiram, or pry out the loose brick from the kitchen hearth; and you, Mandy, fetch down the cracked teapot outen the cupboard. Thar ain't no other way to keep your money to hum.

Spend a dollar in Seattle and some of the change soon comes in the pocket of the Man on Broadway. Buy a Hood River apple at a Broadway fruiterer and you, with thousands of other men in the East, contribute to the bank account of the Oregon farmer.

Speaking of Oregon brings us down to the subject we had in mind in our introductory remarks. The Oregon Daily Journal rather recently devoted considerable news and editorial space in urging the people of that State to patronize Oregon life insurance companies, to the exclusion of old line companies. There can be no objection to a resident of Oregon securing his life insurance in an Oregon company, provided, of course, the Oregon company is in a position to render service which is equal to that of an Eastern company. Whether or not premiums are paid to an Oregon company, all of the money is not kept at home.

But let us consider certain facts of the situation as elucidated by a contributor to the Insurance Field. We have substituted "The Oregon company" for the actual name of a company. Compare, for example, the following expense ratios of an Oregon company with those of one of the best known Eastern companies.

Ratio of Expenses, Less Taxes.

	To premium income.	To total income.	To average insurance.
The Oregon company.....	$34.93	$30.96	$1.31
Eastern company	16.04	10.58	.60

Naturally one would suppose that if the Eastern companies are so extravagantly managed they could hardly furnish the Oregon citizen with as cheap protection as does this Oregon company. It will be interesting, therefore, to compare the net cost of the two companies above referred to on the three leading forms of policies, as follows:

Age 35, Policies $1,000 Issued in 1910, Net Cost in 1913.

	Ordinary life.	20-payment life.	20-year endowment.
The Oregon company.....	$23.38	$32.83	$47.00
Eastern company	22.18	30.93	42.77

With some of the statements of the Oregon Daily Journal we are fortunately able to exhibit an illuminating parallel, which in this case is an inconvertible refutation to the assertions of the Oregon newspaper.

Oregon Daily Journal.

More than $2,000,000 annually goes out of Oregon to pay the life insurance premiums on policies of outside companies held by Oregon policy holders. Some of this sum is returned in death losses and dividends, but only a small fraction of it, the vast bulk of it being forever lost to the people of this State.

Insurance Field.

A fallacious argument of the Oregon papers is that while $2,000,000 a year in premiums are paid out of the State every year, "only a small fraction" returns in death losses, dividends, and other payments. Such a statement is full of either deception or ignorance. * * * One thing is sure, that all death losses represent enormous profits carried into a State and laid down there. The premiums paid to companies outside of Oregon last year were probably near $3,000,000. If losses were $1,000,000, as reported, then the dividends, surrender values and other returns to policyholders probably amounted to $500,000 or $600,000 more, being in all one-half the current premiums, although they are the returns on much smaller premiums paid years ago.

More than $25,000,000 has accumulated and is being held in trust by the life insurance companies of other States as a reserve on the insurance in force for Oregon policy holders. A portion of this fund is loaned out in Oregon, but it is a trifling sum compared to the enormous amount that is withheld from the State.

We will continue the parallel by quoting from a copyrighted article by Floyd Elmer De Groat, which was published several years ago in this journal. The excerpts from Mr. De Groat's essay apply in principle only; they are not intended to be in specific connection to the situation in Oregon. However, as the Oregon cry of "Keep Your Money at Home" is based upon the same arguments as similar outbursts from other Western localities, the comparison serves its purpose most admirably.

Oregon Daily Journal.

Thirty years ago there were no life insurance companies organized and operating exclusively in Oregon and it was impossible to have kept all this money in Oregon. But the conditions are different now. There are strong companies in this State now organized and owned by Oregon people and it is possible therefore to keep within the State nearly all of the $2,000,000 that annually goes East to pay premiums on life insurance policies issued by outside companies.

It is just as much the duty of every citizen of this State who has at heart the advancement and prosperity of Oregon to buy his life insurance of a home insurance company as it is to buy his dry goods and groceries from a home merchant or to buy his factory made needs from the home manufacturer.

Buying life insurance issued by a life insurance company, organized and owned within Oregon, means boosting Oregon. It means keeping money at home instead of sending it East to swell the already bursting vaults of the big Eastern companies. It means keeping money in Oregon, to be reloaned in Oregon, thereby keeping the annual interest in Oregon. It

How much of the reserves held in suspense are invested in Oregon we do not know, but if all the railway and other securities are considered, Oregon doubtless gets her share of the investments, as her enterprises appeal to the open market.

Floyd Elmer De Groat.

With great skill does the promoter paint his word-picture. Cleverly concealing, artfully revealing, he makes winsome appeal to curiosity. And be it remembered, "Curiosity is and has been from the creation of the world, a master passion. To awaken it, to gratify it by slight degrees, and yet to leave something always in suspense, is to establish the surest hold that can be had in wrong, on the unthinking portion of mankind." But his eloquence transcends when he makes his final appeal, to pride, local pride. Whether in West, East, North or South, the peroration is, keep your money at home! Why send it to New York, Milwaukee, Cincinnati or San Francisco? That is the appeal that persuades.

Yet is not this an appeal to ignorance of a great economic law? Do not economists agree that money is simply a commodity, a fluid commodity? Of all commodities money flows most obedient to the law of supply and demand. Were our currency system perfect, money would be absolutely responsive to that great law. Freedom of trade as between nations, in theory or in pracmeans contributing to Oregon's growth and enrichment.

The trend of the times is best illustrated by the following: Prior to 1905 enormous sums of money flowed every year from the West back to New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Wisconsin and other Eastern States to pay premiums on life insurance policies. This money swelled the bank clearings of the East to an enormous proportion.

But Oregon still sends $2,000,000 a year back East to pay premiums on the life insurance policies of outside companies. New York's bank clearings are swelled every year by this sum of money, nearly all of which could easily be kept at home by buying the life insurance of home companies.

tise may have its critics; but free and untrammelled exchange of commodities as between towns, counties or States, should find no opponent in the American Union. The purchase of an insurance policy is a transaction in which two commodities are exchanged, nothing more, nothing less.

But the assets of a New Jersey company are not invested in New Jersey. Nor are those of a Massachusetts company invested in Massachusetts. The Newark, Hartford, New York City home offices of great insurance companies are simply points from which life insurance funds are distributed. Money is received there; it flows thence obedient to the law of supply and demand. The existence of the United States Treasury at Washington does not give that city more money than Baltimore. Nor does the Sub-Treasury at San Francisco give that city more money than Los Angeles. The existence of a very large old-line life insurance company in Milwaukee does not enrich that city beyond Cleveland, which has no great company. A certain old and successful company domiciled in Connecticut has bond and mortgage investment of nearly three millions in Nebraska, more than five in Missouri, over six in Iowa. Its similar investment in its home State plus the rest of New England, is less than $20,000.

A Wisconsin company has more mortgage investment in the State of Washington than at home. It has five times the investment in Illinois that it has in Wisconsin. The field for conservative investment of life insurance funds is constantly changing. The law of supply and demand determines. Georgia, Oklahoma, Texas may or may not in any given year or series of years, furnish the demand, that is, offer the full normal interest rate coupled with most perfect security, tax, foreclosure laws, certainty of crops, permanency of population, all properly considered. The field in which to conservatively invest life insurance funds is in nowise enhanced by the promotion of a new company in any community.

Place your insurance at home and keep your premiums in Oregon, that they may be utilized in the development of Oregon; that they may be loaned here to Oregon enterprises that from time to time go into the market to secure money to carry on business.

But test a little further this proposal to keep money at home. Is not the St. Louis branch office or general agency of a New York company, whether or not mortgage investments are locally made, in a true sense a home institution? That office either owns its quarters, or pays rent. It pays taxes, insurance-wise and otherwise. It pays commissions, medical, and inspection fees. It pays cash values, dividends, endowments, makes policy loans. And the death claim is ever present. Each individual in its employ is a citizen, voter, consumer and taxpayer.

Every man and woman in Oregon with an interest in Oregon's future and sharing Oregon's growth and prosperity is in duty bound to place his or her life insurance with a home company. The time has come to wake up to the value of home support, for home institutions and home products.

The proposal to keep money at home has its analogy in the purchase of any commodity. Let the citizen of Tacoma, by all means, price, durability, quality, other things being equal, buy his clothing in his own city. Yet he succeeds in keeping his money at home only so far as the profit part. He has really patronized an agency. The balance, the investment part, must find its way to the wooler, mills of the East or the cotton fields of the South, to supply another demand. If it be urged that clothing is manufactured also in the home city, very well then; the intelligence of the community will test, by observation or experience, and will render its patronage according to merit.

But the insurance promoter has declared that the new company will make all investments in the home city or State. Does not this theory by its very narrowness, deny ultimate success to the enterprise? How can a life insurance company grow permanently upon the practice of keeping its money at home? What business-getting argument shall a Toledo company employ when extending its operations to Detroit? How shall a Denver company attract policyholders at Salt Lake City? Must not merit be the test as in other commodities? Now, risks, widely distributed throughout the healthful regions of the United States, are essential to favorable or non-fluctuating mortality experience. Scattered, widely distributed investments are an indispensable requisite to non-fluctuating interest, and permanent security. Have not Galveston and San Francisco demonstrated tremendous changes of real values in city property? Do not the abandoned farms of New York and New England furnish an object lesson as to country property? Have not other cities, other States, unexpectedly and unwarned, demonstrated tremendous fluctuations of the mortality law?

A city can never be built, nor can a State ever thrive and grow to greatness if its citizens turn away from local interests and play directly into the hands of their competitors. Don't overlook the fact that every dollar sent out of Oregon to pay for life insurance hurts the State and helps competitors of home life insurance companies that are bidding for the life insurance of Oregon's citizens.

But does a man keep his money at home when he buys a Government bond? A railroad bond? Has he impoverished the community by so doing? May he, perhaps with wisdom, prefer the bond of a distant city to one of home issue? Yes, oftentimes. May our great banks and trust companies wisely buy English consols, French rentes, Japanese bonds, loan money to China? May one not wisely, perhaps for the ultimate good of the community in which he lives, place his fire insurance with the local branch of a reliable British company rather than with one just being promoted in a neighboring street? Unfortunately, the promoter's activities are rapidly extending to insurance in all its branches.

But how does the theory of keeping money at home through the promotion of local life insurance companies work out in practice? Contemporary history furnishes illustrations. One may read in a recent journal, that a new company in Philadelphia has re-insured in New York; that a new company in Chicago has been taken over by a concern in Springfield; that a Minnesota company is being reinsured by a Canadian; that a Seattle company four or five years old has just re-insured in St. Louis. These are not isolated cases. Examples abound. Indeed, he was not altogether a cynic who cried that his life effort to keep money at home had met with poor success.

IMPORTANT BILL INTRODUCED IN THE NEW JERSEY LEGISLATURE.

New Association at Atlantic City Responsible for Introducing Measure Intended to Minimize Various Forms of Misrepresentation.

As previously announced in the NEWS, a new association was recently organized at Atlantic City. Through the influence of its leading members Senator Walter E. Edge, representing Atlantic County, has introduced a bill in the New Jersey Legislature similar to the Pennsylvania Anti-Twisting Law. Efforts will be made by the Atlantic City organization and the New Jersey association, with headquarters at Newark, to secure favorable action at Trenton. The bill in question reads as follows:

An ACT to prevent misrepresentation or misleading estimates intended to induce the taking of a policy of insurance, or misrepresentation or incomplete comparisons of policies intended to induce the lapse or forfeiture of policies of insurance; prescribing penalties for violations of this act; making provisions for compelling the production of evidence.

Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey.

1. No insurance company, association or society, or any officer, director, agent or broker, or solicitor thereof, shall issue, circulate or use, or cause or permit to be issued, circulated or used, any written or oral statement or circular misrepresenting the terms of any policy issued or to be issued by such company, or make an estimate, with intent to deceive, of the future dividends payable under any such policy.

2. No insurance company, association or society, officer, director, agent, solicitor or broker, or any person, firm, association or corporation, shall make any misrepresentation or incomplete comparisons of policies, oral, written, or otherwise, to any person insured in any company, for the purpose of inducing or tending to induce a policyholder in any company to lapse, forfeit, or surrender his insurance therein, and to take out a policy of insurance in another company insuring against similar risks.

3. Upon satisfactory evidence of the violation of the first or second sections of this act by any insurance company, association or society, its officers, solicitors or agents, or any insurance broker, the insurance commissioner shall revoke the certificate of authority of such offending company, association, or society, its solicitors or agents, or any insurance broker; and he shall have the right, in his discretion, to refuse, for a period of not to exceed one year thereafter, to issue a new license to such offending company, association or society, agent, solicitor or broker.

4. Any insurance company, association or society, agent, solicitor or broker, or any person, firm, association or corporation, violating the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be sentenced to pay a fine of not more than five hundred dollars ($500) for each and every violation, or, at the discretion of the court, to imprisonment in the county jail of the county in which the offense is committed for a period of not more than six months, or both.

5. No person shall be excused from testifying or from producing any books, papers, contracts, agreements or documents at the trial or hearing of any person or company, association or society, charged with violating any of the provisions of this act, on the ground that such testimony or evidence may tend to incriminate himself; but no person shall be prosecuted for any act concerning which he may be compelled so to testify, or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, except for perjury committed in so testifying.

6. This act shall take effect immediately.

What the Local Associations Are Doing

Life Association News has no paid correspondents. We depend entirely upon the secretaries of local associations to send us stories of all meetings of their respective associations. If an account of the last meeting of your association does not appear in this department, ask the secretary of your organization why he did not send us the particulars.

Immediately after each meeting, on the same day if possible, secretaries of local bodies should send us a full account of the business transacted, including copies of all speeches, or extracts from the most important of them.

Arkansas.

Members of the Arkansas association decided at the recent annual meeting of that body to change the name of the organization to the Little Rock Life Underwriters' Association. This change was made because there is another association at Fort Smith, and possibilities of organizing other local bodies at Texarkana and Pine Bluff. It was also decided that the association will hereafter hold regular monthly luncheons at the Marion Hotel.

President R. C. Bright refused to be re-elected for another term, and C. G. Price, of the Union Central, was elected his successor. The other officers chosen were: Joseph A. Hogan, of the Metropolitan, first vice-president; J. D. Arnold, Pacific Mutual, second vice-president; Howard Conley, New York Life, secretary; T. M. Cory, Equitable Life, treasurer. There was a discussion as to the attitude of the Insurance Department on the question of exercising greater care in the licensing of agents, and a committee, consisting of R. C. Bright, J. D. Arnold and C. G. Price was appointed for the purpose of conferring with L. L. Coffman and H. C. McCain, candidates for the State Insurance Commissionership.

Birmingham.

It was demonstrated at the annual meeting of the Birmingham association that the year just closing had been a prosperous one in the history of the association. The meeting was held on the 10th inst., at noon, in the Chamber of Commerce. Several new members were admitted and it was planned to make an effort to increase the membership by securing not only every general agent, but every solicitor in the city. It was also suggested that every member of the association have printed upon his business card, "Member of the Life Underwriters' Association of Birmingham." The following officers were elected: President, P. C. Ratliff, Penn Mutual; vice-president, Lucien C. Brown, Germania Life; secretary-treasurer, Lucien M. Harris, Germania Life; executive committee, Albert C. Chesney, Metropolitan; W. L. Sessions, Prudential; G. T. Sibley, Equitable.

Buffalo.

The annual meeting and election of officers of the Buffalo association was held in the private dining room on the fifth floor of the Chamber of Commerce building in the afternoon of Feb. 14.

Following are the new officers: President, Joseph E. Gavin; first vice-president, P. G. Lapey; second vice-president, D. W. Cherrier; secretary-treasurer, George J. Eckhardt; executive committee, C. E. Adams, C. D. Buckpitt, G. R. Jones, W. A. McCormick, W. J. Shepar.

Capital District.

Through an unfortunate series of disappointments as to securing speakers, the Capital District association decided to postpone its annual banquet from Feb. 16 to a more favorable date. However, the election of officers and other routine business was transacted. The meeting was held at the Albany Club, and James Q. Barcus, general agent of the Mutual Benefit, and Carl W. Veeder, of the Travelers at Schenectady, were elected to membership.

The association found itself handicapped last year by the fact that a provision in the original constitution made the dues payable semi-annually. Therefore an amendment was adopted at this meeting providing for the payment of dues on an annual basis as follows: General agents and managers, $10; resident members other than general agents and managers, $5; non-resident members residing outside of the city of Albany but within 20 miles thereof, $4; all other non-resident members, $2.50.

The nominating committee made its report, after which the election of officers took place, with the following result: President, Seward V. Coffin, Provident Life and Trust; first vice-president, C. C. DeRouville, Penn Mutual; second vice-president, D. S. Barradale, Metropolitan; secretary, Charles R. Tripp, Fidelity Mutual; treasurer, W. A. Baker, Jr., Massachusetts Mutual; executive committee, Henry H. Kohn, Phoenix Mutual; J. W. Clark, Jr., Equitable; Jesse Barnet, Mutual Life; G. L. Buck, Provident Life and Trust; J. P. McGarrahan, New York Life; William J. Powers, John Hancock, and M. W. Rix, Travelers.

The same committee having charge of the annual dinner and speakers for that occasion was continued, and it is expected that this affair will be the largest gathering of life insurance men ever held in the city of Albany.

Chicago.

Entering upon the twenty-sixth year of its existence, the Chicago association held its annual meeting on the evening of Feb. 19 at the Auditorium Hotel. Evidence of practical results accomplished during the past year was made evident by the facts brought out in the report of the executive committee by J. F. Johantgen, its chairman. Mr. Johantgen called attention to the fact that early in the year it was considered whether or not it would be possible to take care of the $2 per capita dues to the National Association and give five good dinners for $6 a year. By careful management this had been accomplished, with the result that the association now numbers 378 members and the balance in the treasury is larger than ever before. Sixty-five members secured one or more applications for new members.

E. A. Ferguson, Hervey S. Dale, Jules Girardin and Dr. H. C. Castor informed the executive committee that 100 per cent. of their respective agency forces are now members of the association.

The ticket presented by the nominating committee was unanimously elected, and the officers are as follows:

President, Edward A. Ferguson, of the Union Central Life.

Vice-president, J. Frank Johantgen, of the New York Life.

Secretary, Byron C. Howes, of the Union Mutual Life.

Treasurer, Hervey S. Dale, of the Union Mutual Life.

Chairman Executive Committee, P. J. Kraus, of the Metropolitan Life; members Executive Committee, Alex. N. Weil, of the Fidelity Mutual Life; Henry E. Tank, of the Travelers; F. H. Merrill, of the Mutual Life of New York; Joseph Loebe, of the Berkshire Life.

With the conclusion of the routine business, retiring President Robert F. Palmer turned the gavel over to retiring Vice-President Darby A. Day, who introduced the speakers. Glover S. Hastings, superintendent of agencies of the New England Mutual, greeted the assemblage on behalf of the Boston association. Mr. Hastings believed in the part-time man and stated that he had himself started out by devoting but a portion of his time to life insurance. The speaker claimed that what the part-time man needed to develop his capabilities to a full-time man was practical co-operation and aid from district and general agents.

Melville W. Mix, president of the Dodge Manufacturing Company at Mishawaka, Ind., spoke on "The Human Power Plant." It is said that Mr. Mix practically controls the operation of more mechanical power plants than any other man in the United States, and he took this occasion to compare the human power plant to the steam. "Don't be a runaway power plant," said he, "making a noise like a hundred miles an hour, and only making ten. The knocker in the business is as sure sign of trouble as the knock in the engine."

Mr. Day then introduced Archibald M. Hall, head of the Archibald M. Hall Company, manufacturers of automobile parts at Indianapolis. Mr. Hall had spent twenty years of his life in the ministry, and his address was one of the most brilliant to which the association has ever listened. He said that he had had the mortality, interest and other tables of life insurance so frequently elucidated that he now knows nothing at all about the subject. He claimed that he had taken his life insurance like medicine, on the recommendation of some prescriber in whom he had faith.

Cincinnati.

The March meeting of the Cincinnati association was held at the Business Men's Club. It was preceded by a noon-day luncheon, with 32 in attendance. In accordance with a letter received from National Vice-President Edward A. Woods, the president appointed a special committee on taxation consisting of M. W. Mack, E. R. Ferguson, W. A. R. Bruehl, J. L. Shuff and J. W. Mackelfresh.

The subject of the annual convention was discussed and a general convention committee was appointed with power to add to and appoint sub-committees. This committee consists of Messrs. A. F. Sommer, M. W. Mack, J. L. Shuff, W. A. R. Bruehl, J. W. Kirgan, Charles J. Stern and E. R. Ferguson.

It was suggested by Ralph Holterhoff that the bar association be placed upon the mailing list for the next lecture at the University of Cincinnati, on "The Legal Phases of Life Insurance," by George F. Noyes, general counsel of the Northwestern Mutual.

Cleveland.

President Herman Fellingner, of the Cleveland association, has recently appointed a committee on taxation, and the names of the members will be announced at the next meeting of the association. Mr. Fellingner is chairman of the Committee on Insurance in the Ohio House of Representatives. It will be the duty of this committee to collect statistics with regard to the amount collected by the State from the various insurance companies, the amount required annually for the expenses of the State Insurance Department, and the amount collected annually in other States. It is believed that these statistics will be instrumental in securing a reduction of the tax on premiums.

"The insurance tax originally was imposed to pay for the running of the State Insurance Bureau," said Mr. Fellingner. "When the present rate of 2 per cent. on gross receipts of life companies and 2½ per cent. on gross receipts of other companies was fixed, it brought into the State Treasury annually just about enough to pay for the upkeep of the bureau. But since, the insurance business has grown to such dimensions that the tax brings into the State's coffers about $1,400,000 a year. Of this amount, only about $10,000 annually is needed to maintain the bureau. The balance, about $1,360,000, is turned over to the State's general revenue fund."

Connecticut.

Far surpassing the annual banquets of the past 22 years was the Connecticut association's 23d, at the Hartford Club. For the first time since Ernest J. Clark, of Baltimore, Md., was elected president of the National Association, the Connecticut association had an opportunity of hearing his outline of the progressive work planned by the National Association for the welfare of local associations throughout the country, and the success thus far attained in working these plans out. A defense of "just policy loans" was forcibly made by E. E. Rhodes, vice-president of the Mutual Benefit of Newark, N. J., William S. Ashbrook, agency secretary of the Prudential Life and Trust, dealt with the fundamental prerequisites of the successful insurance agent, Dr. J. Warren Harper, of Hartford, afforded his hearers pleasure with several snappy readings, and Dr. Edward T. Bradstreet, of Meriden, kept the banqueters in a state of hilarity until he had finished telling his yarns. The new president, Lee C. Robens, of Hartford, was the last speaker, and he sought the hearty co-operation of every member of the association in the coming year, thanking them for the honor bestowed upon him in the afternoon.

Retiring President Harry H. Anderson was toastmaster, and he gave a resume of the Connecticut Life Underwriters' Association. He said that while the membership is made up largely of representatives of outside companies, the Hartford companies have always given the association their hearty co-operation.

National President Clark said he was glad to be in Hartford, the town which grows big life insurance companies, and the guest of the association that has among its members "Uncle Eli" Weeks. Throughout the country there has never been such intense interest in the association as is evident at the present time. The work the National Association has cut out for itself will be accomplished much more quickly than had been expected.

He recited the responsibilities that were closest to the interests of life insurance companies. It was his hope that the Connecticut association might increase its membership three or four times by procuring the applications of all the agents selling life insurance in the State. He would have a contest for new members to close June 1, 1914, and urged the impression on life insurance agents of the professional standing of life insurance solicitors.

"The association is not only improving conditions in the field," he said, "but is decreasing the mortality of the life insurance companies." Statistics were quoted to illustrate where there remains great need for active solicitation in this country. These figures were appalling because of their accuracy. He said a new era was being entered by life insurance men. A more systematic training of agents was advocated to work in the field. The campaign of education promulgated by the National Association was referred to for the purpose of illustrating the scope of work that remains to be done. He said the committee in charge of this campaign was making good headway. Another branch, that of conservation, received the careful attention of the speaker, who said the lapsation of policies was appalling, and he credited the situation to the tremendous loans that were made on policies. He made the statement that 94 per cent. of outstanding loans would never be paid back. He believed that the taxation of life insurance premiums, which he said were excessive, might well be reduced by our legislatures. In his opinion dividends should not be taxed, and to bear out his statement he cited the Government's decision that these dividends should not be taxed.

Dr. J. Warren Harper said he was a doctor by profession, a fisherman by degression and a writer by transgression. Whereupon he read several snappy outdoor poems, remarking there must have been some fishermen among his hearers.

E. E. Rhodes said it was embarrassing for him to come to Hartford. He spoke of two phases of the life insurance business—competition and policy loans.

It seemed to him in the effort to obtain the lowest possible cost a company should not seek the lowest death rate, for if it does many are deprived of insurance who need it most. He did not mean the taking of men diseased, there was a middle ground.

"A company might in its efforts to maintain large dividends fail to maintain a sufficient contingency reserve. Any increase not obtained in this manner you ought to deplore. So much for that. It might be well for me to go into the history of policy loans. Policy loans were made before a certain company made them. In those days when a policyholder wanted to borrow money upon his policy he had to go to a loan shark and sign an iron-clad agreement transferring his policy to other than the beneficiary.

"If the companies do not make loans on policies, the holders of policies will procure loans from some trust company," said the speaker. He considered it unsafe to agree to make policy loans upon demand. Policy loans have been abused, and he would be the last one to deny it, but policy loans have their value, and he cited one case to illustrate a policy loan at its best.

William S. Ashbrook paid a tribute to the life insurance agent of the past generation for what he had done to bring the business to its present high level for the present day solicitor. He advocated a thorough knowledge of the fundamentals of the business for the agent who would secure names on the dotted line.

Dr. Edward T. Bradstreet said his text was that everything had defects of its qualities, that his theme applied to everything, even to life insurance. An agent had to be a strenuous man, that in the earnestness of the present day one shouldn't do away with the best things in life.

Lee C. Robens, the new president, assured his hearers that in assuming the position bestowed upon him he appreciated fully the duties that went with the honor, and requested the co-operation of every member of the association. He added that the association had great work to perform which needed the enthusiastic co-operation of every member during the coming year.

The banquet committee consisted of Oliver W. Gaines, of Hartford; Lee C. Robens, of Hartford; Richard O. Dunkum, of Hartford; James L. Coyle, of Hartford; Harry H. Anderson, of West Mystic, and Dwight G. Holbrook, of Hartford.

Music was furnished by Sutherland's orchestra.

After reports of officers had been read, in the afternoon, the election of officers for the ensuing year resulted as follows: President, Lee C. Robens, of Hartford; vice-presidents, Maximilian Stein, of Bridgeport, and Eli D. Weeks, of Waterbury; secretary and treasurer, George W. Green, of Waterbury. Executive committee: George L. Hunt, Hartford; Oliver W. Gaines, Waterbury; George W. Green, Waterbury; James L. Coyle, Hartford; A. J. Edgar, Bridgeport; Jonathan Adams, New Haven.

Detroit.

The annual ladies' night banquet of the Detroit association was held on the evening of the 2d inst., at the Hotel Ponchartrain, with an attendance of 192. With the exception of the secretary's report and the election of eleven new members, there was no business of a formal nature transacted.

President M. H. Zacharias presided as toastmaster, and the first speaker he introduced was Hon. James V. Barry, assistant secretary of the Metropolitan Life, and former Insurance Commissioner of Michigan. Mr. Barry's address was a remarkable mixture of wit and wisdom. Other speakers of the evening were J. F. Weston, general manager of the Imperial Life, of Toronto; Rev. W. H. Boyle, D.D., pastor of the Woodward Avenue Presbyterian Church, and Edgar

A. Guest, of the Detroit Free Press. The banquet was followed by dancing.

Georgia.

At a recent meeting of the Georgia association it was decided to increase the membership by making it possible for every reputable life insurance man in the State to join the association. Action was also taken upon the question of annual dues, and it was decided that a reduction be made from $10 to $6. Plans are now being formulated for a special meeting in April or May. This meeting will be held at some central point of the State and final arrangements are in the hands of W. E. Hawkins, State agent of the Aetna.

Grand Rapids.

In addressing the February meeting of the Grand Rapids association, John T. Winship, Insurance Commissioner of Michigan made a number of statements of general interest in the insurance world. One of his special points was that concerning policy loans, which, he said, called for definite legislation.

"The policy loan was the outgrowth of progress and competition," he observed, "and has been listed as one of the benefits which a company puts out in the development of insurance to a high state of perfection, but it is a grave question whether or not it is a benefit such as it pretends to be. That it has been abused no one will deny. There is not an agent here of years of experience who does not know of cases where the policy loan feature has been a detriment.

"The truth is that a husband or father does not realize that in burdening his policy with loans he is really borrowing from the beneficiary. According to a report made to the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, a half billion dollars in policy loans and premium notes are now out against the policies carried in this country, and through this a large amount of protection will be lost to the widows and orphans of the country. For experience shows that a very limited amount of policy loans are ever repaid.

"If I had my way I would modify the policy loan feature required by the laws of our State so that the loan should be made only for the payment of a premium, or for some other good cause."

Harrisburg.

The Harrisburg association held its regular monthly meeting on the 3d inst. and admitted the following new members: John T. Shirley, Frank O. Donaldson, Walter H. Cummings, William Hoffman, R. F. Baker and P. B. Price.

Kansas City.

M. F. Belisle, president of the Kansas City association, has announced the appointments of the following members to the executive committee: J. P. Miller, Royal Union Mutual, chairman; J. P. Mullane, Columbian National; Edward Villmore, Kansas City Life, and Fred L. Chesney, Union Mutual.

Knoxville.

The February meeting of the Knoxville association was held in the private dining-room of the Cumberland Club at noon on Feb. 28.

The session was called to order by President J. N. Ellis, and the minutes of the last monthly meeting, as well as the minutes of the executive committee, read by the secretary, G. F. Harrison, and approved.

The applications of A. A. Chable and Thomas Hart for membership had been approved by the executive committee and they were elected.

Rev. H. Clay Risner, pastor of Broadway Baptist Church, has accepted an invitation to preach a sermon on life insurance to the members of the association, and Sunday night, March 15, was selected as the date. Every life insurance salesman in the city and vicinity was invited. J. V. Rymer, Allan Watson and R. W. McAllister were appointed to arrange all details.

The anti-taxation committee made its report. This committee consists of J. N. Ellis, J. V. Rymer and W. J. Anderson. It was decided to hold this meeting on the evening of March 28. Reau E. Folk, ex-insurance commissioner, will be the speaker. Many prominent policyholders will be invited to this meeting.

T. S. McKinney, chairman of the committee on publicity, made his report, and a motion was made and carried recommending that sixty inches of space be contracted for in a daily paper for a period of one year.

H. L. Woodward, of the Knoxville Business College, made a talk along the line of instructing the students in a contemplated insurance course in his college. He also made some timely remarks on a "square deal" in insurance salesmanship, and related some personal experiences that had made him a strong believer in life insurance.

Lima.

A meeting of the Lima association was held on the 10th inst., the principal speaker being W. D. Yerger, general agent of the Provident Life and Trust at Cincinnati. Mr. Yerger's address was one of the most interesting heard since the organization of the association. The association completed arrangements through the publicity committee to make use of the press once a week for life insurance educational items. Each member of the association will contribute to the expense.

Central Massachusetts.

There was a good attendance at the February meeting of the Central Massachusetts association, which was held at noon on February 28, at the Automobile Club in Worcester. The principal addresses were made by Leon J. Barrett, of Barrett & Snow, Worcester County General Agents of the State Mutual, and Guy F. Wheeler, of the Worcester office of the Provident Life and Trust. Brief remarks were also made by President Waldron, of the Western Massachusetts association, and President Miller, of the Boston association. Both of these gentlemen were present at the meeting as representatives of their respective associations in making arrangements for the New England Congress of Life Underwriters, to be held in Boston in April. The New England delegates present for this purpose other than Mr. Waldron and Mr. Miller, were: Lee C. Robens, Hartford; A. W. Childs and C. A. Parks, Manchester; Leon F. Foss, Boston; M. H. Stearns, Providence, and O. D. Arnold, of the local association. This committee held a session before the regular meeting of the association and decided to hold the proposed congress on April 27 at the Parker House in Boston.

Edward A. Robertson, who was recently elected president of the local association, briefly welcomed the members and guests, and in doing so, made a plea for an increased membership and earnest co-operation throughout his year.

Mr. Barrett was the next speaker, and his subject was "Institutional Advertising." Mr. Barrett, in expressing his views upon this subject, took occasion to criticize the proposed campaign of institutional advertising, which is now well under way under the direction of the National Committee on Education and Conservation. It was his belief that institutional advertising by a combination of interests was not in harmony with the fundamental principles of publicity upon which had been built world-wide reputations for business houses, which were little known in their own community. "If any insurance company has the goods," said he, "by which I mean everything of the company, of the contract, and of the field force, why need it fear to enter, or forbear to enter, the field of competitive advertising! * * * The average public might be slow, probably would be, to 'catch on,' but eventually they would grasp the matter in an intelligent way."

In concluding his remarks he said that in his opinion institutional advertising seemed to be well adapted to promote such confusion that he could not escape the conviction that there was no real need of it.

Guy F. Wheeler addressed the members on "Scientific Insurance Salesmanship." He developed his subject under three heads: apperception; the point of contact, and the importance of being non-combative.

Western Massachusetts.

The annual dinner of the Western Massachusetts association, held in the Nayasset Club, at Springfield, in the evening of Feb. 20, showed strikingly the growth of the association during the last few years. Over 60 members and guests were present at the dinner, which was generally considered the most successful ever held by the association. Among the speakers were Joseph A. DeBoer, president of the National Life; William W. McClench, president of the Massachusetts Mutual, and Roland O. Lamb, president of the John Hancock. William D. Wyman, president of the Berkshire, and Burton H. Wright, president of the State Mutual, were unable to be present. Mr. Wright's place was taken by Edgar C. Fowler.

Optimism as to the business conditions in the country during the coming year was the prevailing tone of the speeches, although the existence of discouraging elements in the situation was not denied. The speakers also discouraged in emphatic terms the practice of securing loans on life insurance policies. Opposite opinions were expressed on the movement for the elimination of the "part time" underwriter, Mr. Fowler defending his usefulness, while Mr. DeBoer argued that any man engaged in the business should devote his whole time to it. E. B. Ranshousen, retiring president of the association, presided at the dinner and introduced the speakers.

Officers for the association for the coming year were elected at a business meeting before the dinner. The new officers are as follows: President, A. B. Franklin, Jr.; first vice-president, F. W. Fuller; second vice-president, Harry Chittim; secretary, E. N. Worthen; treasurer, C. B. Cone; executive committee, E. B. Ranshousen, E. Milton Allis, Henry S. Waldron, Lowell E. Bailey, A. J. Norton, D. W. Bridgeman, T. E. Trombley. After the business meeting the dinner was served in the dining room, beginning at 6.30 o'clock. Music was furnished by the Janser Trio and by Clair M. Waterbury, whose solos, including "The Stein Song" and a number of popular songs, were heartily applauded.

The speaking began with a review by E. B. Ranshousen of the work of the association during the last year. He told of its study of the occupation of life insurance as compared with other occupations, of the effects of the new currency law and of other subjects connected with the improvement of the profession. He then introduced Mr. McClench, who, after telling a few humorous stories that were uproariously received, gave a brief summary of the business situation for the coming year. Among the good elements of the situation he mentioned the plentiful crops, and among the bad elements the new tariff, the currency bill, the uncertainties of pending legislation and the industrial disturbances. These, he said, are counterbalanced by the general confidence in the resources and future of the country.

President Roland O. Lamb of the John Hancock praised the work of the association and similar organizations in doing away with the old enmity between different insurance companies, and bringing about the present era of free discussion of methods of work and fair treatment. He urged the underwriters to discourage loans on policies. Insurance, he said, can be sold as well by dwelling on the advantages of the policies themselves as by using as an argument their availability for the purpose of securing loans. In conclusion he reminded the men that the reputation of a company depends upon the conduct of the men in the field, and agreed with Mr. McClench that prospects for the year were good. Rev. Dr. W. W. Weeks, of the First-Highland Baptist Church, was the next speaker. He joined with the other speakers in condemning loans on policies, and illustrated his remarks with aptly-chosen stories.

Edgar C. Fowler, the next speaker, opposed the movement for the elimination of part-time men, showing by examples how such men could work into the business and make a thorough success of it. He also disapproved of the movement for having the advertising expenses paid by the companies, that is, by the policyholders, holding that this expense should fall on the underwriters themselves.

President Joseph A. DeBoer of the National gave a closely reasoned analysis of present tendencies in the insurance business, illustrated from a wide range of experience. He praised the influence of Massachusetts companies upon life insurance. The argument against loans on policies, he said, was not generally conducted along the right lines. A man has just as much right to put a mortgage on a policy as on a house. The just objection to policy loaning is that it is unilateral—that it makes the borrower a trustee in the care of the assets of the company, without laying on him any corresponding obligations.

Mr. DeBoer delivered a warning against a company's burdening itself with too many protections against ill-health, etc., in life insurance policies. A company's status depends upon its treatment of policyholders at the lowest possible cost consistent with the strength of the company. Nevertheless, a life insurance policy is the best investment on the American continent to-day, he said, because of its ingenious adaptability to the investor's circumstances. In closing he argued for the elimination of the part-time man, saying that life insurance was one of the finest possible businesses, that there are too many soldiers in it at present, and that the men engaged in it should put into it all their time and talents.

Memphis.

Col. R. P. Lake, of the Memphis association, recently entertained the members of that body at his home. R. Henry Lake assisted Col. Lake in entertaining. Following a number of selections on the Victrola, addresses were delivered by Col. Lake, J. L. Ewell, W. G. Erskine and others.

Leslie M. Stratton, president of the Stratton-Warren Hardware Co., was a guest and delivered a splendid address on the benefits of life insurance both to the home and to business. Mr. Stratton modestly admitted that he carried more than $300,000 worth of life insurance.

At the next regular meeting of the association the subject of discussion will be "The Conservation of Business and the Advantages Accruing to the Agent." W. G. Erskine and R. Henry Lake will report upon the co-operative plan of educational advertising.

Minneapolis.

A joint meeting of the Minneapolis and the St. Paul associations was held in Minneapolis on Feb. 28 at the West Hotel. The members of the St. Paul association were welcomed by President C. J. Carlsen of the local body, who introduced the principal speaker of the occasion, J. Edward Meyers. Mr. Meyers spoke on "The Rights of the Beneficiary." His speech indicated that he had given the subject a great deal of thought and he predicted that in the future all companies would place more restrictions about the granting of loans and surrender values. He also maintained that the wife is vitally interested in her husband's insurance and that policies should be so written that it would be necessary for her to join in signing a loan note to surrender receipt. Hon. M. C. Tift spoke on the same subject. State Insurance Commissioner J. A. O. Preus was present as a guest and spoke briefly upon several matters of interest to his audience.

George W. Harrison, president of the St. Paul association, also gave a short address, followed by Charles J. Hunt, of the same association. Mr. Harrison invited the members of the Minneapolis association to St. Paul on the following Monday to hear J. W. Wheeler, president of the Capital Trust Co., of St. Paul, speak on "The Value of Commercial Life Insurance to Credits."

Montana.

Representatives of several companies operating in Montana held an informal meeting at Missoula on the 16th of last month and took steps to organize a State association. A committee was appointed to draft a constitution and by-laws. I. M. Robertson was elected temporary president and S. W. Hoover temporary secretary. Among those present were: W. I. Fraser, Cuthbert Peat, E. E. Harriott, F. M. Lawrence, T. H. Sawyer, C. E. Burnett, H. K. Rouzer, C. E. Vealey, I. M. Robertson and S. W. Hoover.

New Hampshire.

The annual meeting of the New Hampshire Life Underwriters Club was held on Feb. 16 at Manchester. The election of officers resulted as follows: President, R. W. Cheney, Mutual Life; vice-president, C. E. Merritt, John Hancock; secretary-treasurer, C. A. Parks, Massachusetts Mutual; executive committee, A. W. Childs, Travelers; J. A. Wellman, National Life of Vermont; B. O. Baker, Fidelity Mutual.

New York.

L. U. A. N. Y.

Here we are—

Sis! Boom! Sis! Boom!

Rah! Rah! Rah!

We're for clean work,

Always on the square,

Down with the Twister,

And REBATERS BEWARE!

This was the slogan of the 28th annual banquet of the New York association, which was held on the evening of Feb. 24 at the Hotel Astor. Perez F. Huff, a prominent member of the association and associate general agent of the Union Central, was responsible for the words and music of the slogan and directed the cabaret stunts during the dinner. The music of the slogan was remarkably apropos to the ideas it sought to convey, starting off with a sonorous, buoyant swing and gradually descending the scale to a funereal and lugubrious climax which would have struck terror to the hearts of rebaters or twisters had any such individuals been present.

Retiring President Edward W. Allen called attention to the good fellowship which was manifest and this was evidenced by the remarkable attendance, fully 250 members and guests being seated at the tables. Mr. Allen was particularly happy in his reference to the large attendance of Northwestern Mutual men. He complimented T. Reid Fell, who was chairman of the dinner committee, and Perez F. Huff, who was chairman of the music committee. According to the speaker, there had been but a gain of six in membership during the year, but the association had upon its roster a paid membership of 289. The retiring president touched lightly upon the part-time question and briefly discussed rebating.

Two cases, he said, had been brought to the attention of the State Insurance Department and the department had taken no further action than to reprimand the agents involved. The companies were then appealed to and the responses were to the effect that the companies were satisfied with the decision of the Insurance Department. The executive committee, Mr. Allen said, had raised a fund and employed legal counsel, and charges of 21 cases of rebating had been placed in the hands of the district attorney. He felt confident that conviction would follow during the administration of his successor.

President-elect Julian S. Myrick was then introduced, and in the course of his felicitations made mention of the fact that he felt particularly gratified in the wisdom displayed by the nominating committee in proposing a staff of officers which was characterized with an admirable mixture of progressiveness and conservatism. "As a concrete example," he said, "if Lawrence Priddy as chairman of the executive committee becomes too aggressive the other officers will properly sit upon him." Mr. Myrick made a plea for increased membership and referred to the days of 1905-1906 and the work that was accomplished by the local associations at that time, stating that had it not been for the work done, first and second renewal commissions would be much less than now.

Royal S. Goldsbury, general agent of the Northwestern Mutual at Pittsburgh and president of the Pittsburgh association, discussed "The Advantages and Influences of Life Underwriters' Associations." The serious portion of Mr. Goldsbury's remarks was prefixed by a series of snappy and witty stories told in the dry humor so characteristic of the speaker. He referred to his experience as an agent in New York 15 years ago, during which time he knew very few life insurance men and practically nothing about the association movement. He said that he had tried three methods of trying to sell life insurance, but had come to the conclusion that a man cannot measure up to the maximum of his possibilities if he neglects to take advantage of the co-operative spirit of the association movement. In concluding Mr. Goldsbury said:

"I want to leave this thought with you:

Think what is true;

Do what is right;

Make what is beautiful;

And give your service to humanity."

Mr. Allen then introduced William W. McClench, president of the Massachusetts Mutual, who had as his subject, "Co-operation of Home Officers with Life Underwriters' Association." Mr. McClench said that the desirability of such co-operation needed no argument; that in life insurance home and field officers met on a common ground in which all were vitally interested. It was his opinion that many home officers evidenced practical approval of the association movement, and that membership in local associations was of a positive value. He spoke of his personal attitude toward the field man, and stated that he was always glad to meet field representatives, and, in fact, has issued instructions that he be given an opportunity of having a chat with every agent who came to the home office.

Mr. McClench also discussed policy loans. "The companies started policy loans," said he, "and the laws now compel these loans. We hear much in the papers to-day about robbing the widows. Possibly this argument might hold good, but not all beneficiaries are widows." He claimed that loans were frequently of great practical value and had served many times to protect homes, and to ward off bankruptcy of firms. "I feel," said he, "that I am not personally concerned in policy loans and think no solicitor should be criticised because he emphasizes the value of such provisions."

Hon. James C. Cropsey, district attorney of Kings County, followed Mr. McClench and discussed the police bills which were then pending before the Legislature.

Edward D. Duffield, fourth vice-president and general solicitor of the Prudential Insurance Co., was the last speaker of the evening, and his subject was "The Enforcement of Life Insurance Laws Relating to Rebating and Twisting." As the hour was late, Mr. Duffield spoke briefly but pertinently. He claimed that the laws on the statute books should be the highest expression of the people's will, but something more was required than the mere enactment of a law, because of the fact that laws are not self-operative and the effect of a law depends upon the manner in which it is enforced. "I do not believe," said Mr. Duffield, "that life insurance should be the dumping ground of those who have failed in every other line of business, but all our efforts are futile, our existing laws are worthless if we fail to drive out the twister and the rebater."

Mayor Mitchel, who had accepted an invitation to address the association, was unable to be present.

During courses William F. Atkinson, C. F. Donnelly, F. F. Simpson and W. E. Selph, led by coryphee Huff, danced with inimitable grace among the tables, singing parodies of popular songs, of which several prominent members of the association were made the butt.

The officers elected for the year 1914 were as follows: President, Julian S. Myrick; first vice-president, William H. Ryan; second vice-president, R. M. Simons; third vice-president, John S. Tunmore; secretary-treasurer, William F. Atkinson; executive committee, Lawrence Priddy, chairman; F. H. Rhodes, Alfred Siebert, Perez F. Huff, R. K. Stowe and Samuel S. Voshell.

North Carolina.

The annual meeting of the North Carolina association was held in Raleigh, with Hugh M. Willet, chairman of the executive committee of the National Association, and Insurance Commissioner James R. Young as guests. The following committee on education and conservation was appointed: Milton McIntosh, chairman, Charlotte; T. S. Franklin, Charlotte; Mr. Reynolds, Ashville; Arthur Watt, Greensboro; J. D. Boushall, Raleigh, and W. L. O'Brien, Winston-Salem. The election of officers resulted as follows: President, J. P. Quarles, Charlotte; vice-president, J. E. McIlwaine, Charlotte; secretary-treasurer, T. S. Franklin, Charlotte.

North Dakota.

A meeting of the North Dakota association was recently held at Grand Forks. Hon. Tracy R. Bangs, of Grand Forks, was the principal speaker. A banquet followed a brief business session at the Columbia Hotel.

Oregon.

Twenty-eight members and guests of the Oregon association attended the annual meeting of that body. The following officers were elected: President, D. C. Herrin, Union Central; vice-president, F. M. Bradley, Provident Life and Trust; secretary-treasurer, Joseph H. Gray, Germania Life; members of the executive committee, S. P. Lockwood, Columbia Life and Trust; William Goldman, Manhattan Life, and Hubert H. Ward, Pacific Mutual.

An announcement was made by William Goldman that the executive committee had succeeded in inducing the Portland Oregonian to devote, once a week, two columns on the subject of life insurance. Dr. A. E. Awde, superintendent of agencies of the Union Mutual Life, spoke on "Institutional Solicitation of Life Insurance."

Hubert H. Ward called the attention of the members to the fact that the local association had a splendid opportunity to lead in the Pacific Coast membership contest because of the large number of managers and agents who were not members of the association.

W. D. Mead, of Seattle, Wash., discussed the Northwest Insurance Congress which is to be held in Portland in June. Mr. Mead made reference to the success of the conference held last year and was confident that the 1914 meeting would be far more successful.

Harry E. Fetsch, of the Pacific Mutual, delivered an address on "Life Income Insurance." Edgar W. Smith, of the Equitable Life, discussed the same subject, and other speakers were William J. Seroy, field superintendent of the San Francisco Life, and Secretary Gray.

Pittsburgh.

Royal S. Goldsberry, retiring president of the Pittsburgh association, presided as toastmaster at the twenty-eighth annual meeting of that association, held on the evening of the 6th inst. at the Fort Pitt Hotel. The election of officers resulted as follows: President, William M. Duff, Equitable Life Assurance Society; first vice-president, H. T. Sawyer, National Life of U. S. A.; second vice-president, A. S. E. Kinsey, Metropolitan; secretary, George W. Ryan, Providence Life & Trust; treasurer, J. M. Kistler, Pittsburgh Life & Trust. The executive committee is headed by William M. Wood, United States Life, and the other members are: James C. Biggert, Penn Mutual; C. K. Brust, State Mutual; F. C. Pierson, Prudential, and Chauncey O'Neil, National Life of Vermont.

Reports of the retiring officers were read showing the work accomplished during the year. Harry T. Sawyer, the retiring secretary, in making his report, stated, in part:

"The association during the year just closed has been very successful, and I am pleased to report that we now enter upon the twenty-ninth year with total membership of 283, as compared with 267 this time last year—a gain of 16 members. It must be taken into consideration that the association suffered normal loss of members either for non-payment of dues, changes in business or address. As a matter of fact, 74 new members were elected during the year.

"I feel that the best way to report the progress of the association during the past year is to briefly review the meetings held.

"At the April meeting, with an attendance of 110, three new members were taken in. A number of interesting talks on 'Soliciting Efficiency' were made and proved of great value.

"The May meeting, with an attendance of 109, was featured by a talk on 'Health Conservation,' and by the use of a stereopticon we were shown the many advances being made in developing manufacturing industries in Pittsburgh and this community. Also, some interesting points were brought out regarding twisting and competition. It was at this meeting that the suggestion was made to appoint a committee to select members of the association to handle the insurance course at the University of Pittsburgh. Three new members were elected.

"Five hundred and eighteen persons, including members of the association and their friends, attended the annual June outing, which proved a most enjoyable affair, the steamer Sunshine being chartered and a trip taken up the Monongahela River.

"The September meeting, although small in attendance, only 80 being present, proved very interesting, as the question of insurance legislation in Pennsylvania, new laws, etc., were thoroughly explained, and the practical subject, 'Policy Loans—Their Use and Abuse,' was thoroughly discussed.

"The thirteenth annual dinner, held on October 6, brought out the largest attendance for any regular meeting in the history of the association, covers being laid for 343, as compared with 227 for inaugural meeting last year. Almost every officer of the National Association, members of the Executive Council and newly elected officers of the National Association were present. Mr. E. J. Clark, new national president, delivered his inaugural address, the only other speakers of the evening being Edward A. Woods, on 'Taxation,' and Warren M. Horner, of Minneapolis, Minn., chairman of the education and conservation committee. Short talks were made by one or two others. Five new members were elected and 66 applications for membership were received, as compared with 62 for the same meeting last year.

"The December meeting, held on December 5, 1913, proved to be one of the most interesting and instructive of the year, only practical subjects being discussed, and a large number of members present took part in the discussion. One hundred and six covers were laid for dinner and 52 members were voted upon and elected to membership.

"The January meeting, owing to the presence of the Rev. W. A. Sunday in Pittsburgh, was changed to a noonday luncheon in order to have Mr. Sunday address the association. The meeting was held in the English Room at the Port Pitt Hotel, 335 persons, including members and their friends, being present. Mr. Sunday gave one of his characteristic talks, and it was at this meeting that the members voted to attend the Tabernacle in a body in the name of the association. This was done on February 20.

"Your secretary is glad to report the affairs of the association in most excellent condition. A new system of book-keeping has been devised which has proved very efficient. The meetings have been well attended. The secretary also wishes to state that 25 members of the association attended the national convention at Atlantic City last September.

"Thirty-eight companies are now represented. There has been a total attendance at the eight meetings of 1,708."

Dr. J. Leonard Levy, rabbi of Rodef Shalom Congregation, spoke on "Co-operative Efficiency." "It used to be considered," said Dr. Levy, "the right thing in business to be foxy. Men and corporations acted independently of one another as much as possible for fear their opponents would find out how they conducted their affairs, and even sought to cripple their contemporaries. But such business methods are happily passing into the discarded ideas of business, and the day of co-operation has already dawned. The elimination of waste has become the problem of life. Directions and simplicity now lead to success. You cannot make people good by law. They must be guided to heaven through a moral tone."

J. Rogers Flannery, president of the Vanadium Metals Co., spoke on the work of the Pittsburgh Industrial Commission. According to the speaker's remarks, there had been a phenomenal increase in the commercial transactions of Pittsburgh during the year, represented by the difference between $67,000,000 and $165,000,000. "For years," said Mr. Flannery, "we had use only for big things. We counted tonnage by the billions. Raw materials in seven-figured quantities were our pride. Then we realized that we needed smaller industries to manufacture the raw product into finished articles. There was an industrial awakening, and industries employing skilled labor and turning out finished products are springing up here like magic."

Richmond.

With National President Clark as guest of honor, the Richmond association held its annual meeting at the Jefferson, in the evening of Feb. 28.

Former National President Neil D. Sills presided over the banquet in his usual happy style, while Samuel B. Love, manager of the Mutual Life, acted as principal charge d'affaires.

In the course of a highly interesting address Mr. Clark pointed out the appalling waste resulting from lapsations and surrender of insurance. Much of this, he declared, could be saved by systematic effort on the part of individual agents, especially in discouraging policy loans.

Commenting on the improvidence of American people, he said that 85 out of every 100 men in this country leave at death practically no income-producing estate, and yet many of these men are daily contributors toward the $1,750,000,000 spent during the year for alcoholic drink and toward the $520,000,000 spent per annum for tobacco.

Prior to Mr. Clark's talk the executive committee of the local association announced the names of five new members. They were R. W. Dodson, Otis W. Gilman, Gesner Harrison, W. J. Shillingburg and Charles G. Taylor, Jr.

Prominent among the guests were W. P. Dodson, president of the Norfolk association; Brooks Marmon, president of the Roanoke association, and H. Wibirt Spence, manager of the Mutual Life at Detroit.

The regular election of officers was held at the Business Men's Club on the evening of Feb. 23. The election of officers resulted as follows: E. M. Crutchfield, president; Samuel B. Love, first vice-president; W. W. Hardwicke, second vice-president; E. W. Marshall, secretary-treasurer. The executive committee appointed was as follows: W. B. Allen, T. A. Cary and Neil D. Sills.

It was decided to organize a Cincinnati convention club and the following members were enrolled: W. B. Allen, D. R. Midyette, J. C. Bristow, L. D. Warren, J. C. Dobbin, Neil D. Sills, W. W. Hardwicke, A. O. Swink, S. B. Love, T. G. Tabb and several others.

Roanoke.

The annual meeting of the Roanoke association was held on the 10th inst., and the following officers were elected: Brooks Marmon, president; H. F. Husks, first vice-president; William R. Moore, second vice-president; J. W. J. Goff, secretary and treasurer.

The applications for membership of William R. Moore, manager of the Equitable Life, and S. H. Davis, special agent of the Mutual Life, were presented to the association and were favorably acted upon. The secretary's report of the work of this association during the past year was encouraging. After a delightful luncheon at the Japanese Tea Room the meeting was adjourned, every member feeling that great things would be accomplished the second year of the association's life.

St. Louis.

The February meeting of the St. Louis association was held at the Mercantile Club on the evening of Feb. 17. The association decided to co-operate with the Citizens' Bridge Committee in an effort to have the adopted approach to the Free Bridge finished as quickly as possible.

W. A. Bilheimer, inspector of agencies of the Equitable Life of New York, gave an eloquent address on the subject of "Life Insurance as a Profession." F. B. Miller, special agent of the Phoenix Mutual, talked on "Needed Legislation." "We need legislation to reduce the State tax on premiums paid," said he, "and I believe the United States is the only country that collects such a tax. England did away with this tax along ago.

"Legislation is needed to govern the employment of new agents. The insurance agent should possess certain designated educational requirements before he is allowed to practice on the public. Certificates of authority from the State are required of many other professions, and our profession certainly is one of the highest in its service to the State.

"A law requiring every insurance agent to be bonded by a reputable company would elevate the standard of the profession beyond the question of a doubt.

"We need legislation that will exact a definite amount of business written to enable a man to continue as a legally licensed agent."

Harry Arnold talked on "Some Principles of Business Success," and J. W. Estes discussed the question of "When Competition Should Cease."

The following code of ethics was unanimously adopted:

The members of the association mutually pledge themselves—

1. To support strict enforcement of the anti-discrimination (anti-rebate) statute of the State of Missouri.

2. Not to advise a policyholder to discontinue his insurance in any company whose representatives are eligible to membership in this association.

3. To cease competition when a bona fide application has been signed and the medical examination completed.

St. Paul.

In the banquet room of the St. Paul Association of Commerce, on the 2d inst., the St. Paul association held its regular monthly meeting, with a record-breaking attendance. The principal speaker was J. W. Wheeler, president of the Capitol Trust Company, whose subject was "Life Insurance and Credit." "I am," said he, "in favor of life insurance as a means to further credit, and to its acceptance as collateral on loans made by banks. Every corporation or firm should have insurance on the lives of its officers payable to the firm in event of death. I have known personally where firms have been saved from disaster through having the lives of members of the firms insured.

"The large corporations believe in and carry life insurance on the lives of their officers to quite an extent. It is the smaller firm which you need to educate. If business men can be brought to realize that life insurance is as necessary as fire insurance, then where there is now one firm there will be twenty that carry insurance. You will have to get the people away from the old idea that life insurance is only for the protection of widows and orphans.

"In selling life insurance to corporations and firms, the firm should be studied and its needs supplied with the kind of a policy to fit. It seems as if most agents try to sell the kind of policy that pays the most commissions. This should be avoided, and smaller firms should be recommended to purchase the cheaper policies."

The members decided to act upon the suggestion made by Mr. Wheeler that the association co-operate with the Bankers' Association and have questions placed on loan application blanks used by members of the bankers' organization.

San Francisco.

A substantial gain in the membership trophy contest was made by the San Francisco association at its regular monthly meeting, held on the 26th of last month, when 21 new members were admitted. The meeting was held at the Hotel Stewart with a fair attendance. A motion was carried to submit to a vote at the next meeting a proposed change in the by-laws reducing the membership dues from $1 per month to fifty cents. It is assumed that the change, if made,

THE IDEAL OFFICE ASSISTANT

An employer hires a bookkeeper, stenographer or clerk to relieve him of—not to add to his cares.

He asks the same thing of his writing machine.

He wants it to "stand up," to do its work, to be reliable, quick to respond, ready for emergency or long continued work.

These qualities make the L. C. Smith & Bros. typewriter prominent in the typewriter world.

The ball bearings at all frictional points place it in a class by itself from a mechanical standpoint.

Viewed from the HUMAN angle, the operators of this typewriter do more work and are less tired at the close of the day. If you look into the matter closely, you can't reach any other conclusion. Send for free book.

meeting, held on the 26th of last month, when 21 new members were admitted. The meeting was held at the Hotel Stewart with a fair attendance. A motion was carried to submit to a vote at the next meeting a proposed change in the by-laws reducing the membership dues from $1 per month to fifty cents. It is assumed that the change, if made, will aid to a considerable extent in increasing the association's membership.

William L. Hathaway offered a motion that the president appoint a committee to prepare resolutions congratulating John Landers, veteran manager of the Manhattan Life, on the completion of fifty years' continuous service with that company on March 1. The motion was adopted, after which Mr. Landers acknowledged the courtesy shown him, and briefly referred to his early experiences in San Francisco.

The next speaker was Edward E. Moore, of the Tourists' Association of San Francisco Bay and River Counties, who told of the work of his organization in preparing to entertain visitors to the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The association also passed a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to consider the advisability of the association becoming a member of the tourists' organization. Colonel Harris Weinstock, member of the California Industrial Accident Commission, spoke upon the new California Workmen's Compensation Act.

Syracuse.

Three new members were admitted to the Syracuse association at its February meeting and former National President Charles W. Scovel, who was the guest of honor, was elected as an honorary member.

It was decided to issue a challenge to the associations in Buffalo, Rochester, Utica and Albany for a membership contest during the period from March 1 to May 31, 1914, the contest to be based upon the percentage of paid active and associate members.

Savannah.

The regular March meeting of the Savannah association was held on the 10th inst. The principal event was the appointment of the following committee on taxation: Julian Schley, chairman, Penn Mutual; W. J. Harty, Massachusetts Mutual, and E. H. O'Connor, Mutual Benefit. The proposed joint meeting of all local associations of Georgia, which will probably be held in Atlanta, was discussed and the idea was unanimously approved.

Tacoma.

The regular monthly meeting of the Tacoma association was held on Feb. 24 at the Commercial Club at Tacoma. It was the best attended and most enthusiastic meeting since the organization of the association. An interesting talk was made by Malcolm Hughes, manager of the Travelers, which bristled with points of vital interest to the members. He brought to light the fact that the successful insurance man of to-day must be a man of ability, integrity and enthusiasm.

Mr. Hughes was followed by Joseph Fouschard, of the John Knox Company, of Des Moines, Ia. Mr. Fouschard gave a talk on the right and wrong method of salesmanship and claimed that everyone had the inherent principles which make for success and that it is only necessary to develop the right qualities and eliminate their opposites.

William Peterson, president of the association, announced a plan which he thought would be productive of good results. This was to have each manager of the different companies represented in the association be responsible for a program for the month for which he was chosen. Mr. Peterson stated that he believed this plan would work out for the best interests of the association. This plan was adopted and the names of the companies were placed in a hat and a drawing was made, with the result that the Bankers Life will prepare the March program, the Travelers will be responsible for the April meeting and the Northwestern Mutual will take charge of the May program.

Texas.

Members of the Texas association are happy over the decision of Insurance Commissioner Collier, who has agreed to revoke the license of any life insurance agent who violates the law of 1909, prohibiting the giving of rebates or any other form of discrimination or misrepresentation. Mr. Collier's attitude was made plain in a letter which he addressed to W. G. Harris, chairman of the executive committee of the association. While the law has existed since 1909, it has been difficult to enforce, depending entirely upon the local prosecuting attorneys. Mr. Collier's letter follows:

"Referring to yours of February 24, calling attention of this department to the violations of Section 290 of the Insurance Code, relating to rebates and discriminations by soliciting agents of some of the life insurance companies doing business in this State, we beg to advise you that this department fully endorses the attitude of your association in endeavoring to suppress this evil, and you may rely upon the assistance and co-operation of this department to enforce the provisions of the law.

"It is noted that the county officials of some of the counties in the State take no interest and render no help to remedy the conditions. This department has no jurisdiction over county officials; hence cannot render any assistance except in the following way, namely: Upon receipt of the affidavit of any two reputable citizens, showing rebates, misrepresentations or discriminations, as provided in this section, we will revoke the license of the agent complained of, giving him, however, an opportunity to be heard before this department, if he so desires. We trust this will not have to be done in many instances, but that every company and general agency in this State will do their best to eradicate the evil and put the business on the high plane you are endeavoring to do."

Acting upon this encouragement the association has presented several rebate cases to the various grand juries. In the County of Dallas, Thomas F. Ewton has been arrested and is now out on bond. B. E. King has been arrested on three separate charges of rebating and is also out on bond. F. E. Comstock was recently arrested in Houston on a charge of having embezzled premiums on business sold in Collin County. He is now at McKinley, Texas, and his trial will come up in April. A. A. Le Suer, Jr., was arrested at Shreveport, La., by detectives who had shadowed him from California. He is charged with embezzling life insurance premiums he collected in the vicinity of Paris. W. G. Duncan, of Bartlett, is accused of having appropriated money belonging to an insurance company, and a warrant for his arrest has been placed in the hands of the proper officers. J. B. Spinks, of Canton, was recently arrested, tried and convicted for appropriating net premiums.

Topeka.

Frank L. Loveland, pastor of the First Methodist Church, was the guest of honor of the Topeka association at its February meeting. Mr. Loveland in a brilliant address portrayed the life insurance agent as a partner of the minister, helping to save widows and orphans from suffering.

Insurance Superintendent Ike S. Lewis complimented the members on the success which has followed their efforts to establish a high standard of field ethics. Other speakers were Mrs. W. F. Lowrey, Robert Stone, James A. Troutman and Dr. A. S. Henderson, pastor of the First Congregational Church.

Utah.

"I have attended a good many meetings of insurance agents both in America and Canada, but I do not recall any gathering of a similar nature that gave me as much general pleasure and food for thought as yours of to-night," remarked an eastern insurance man at the conclusion of the annual banquet of the Utah Association of Life Underwriters at the Hotel Utah on the evening of February 28.

"I guess you're right," replied Secretary Will G. Farrell. "And just think," continued the secretary, who had previously addressed the banqueters on insurance conditions prevalent when he first entered the business more than fifteen years ago, "of the change that has been brought about in less than ten years, and it is due to no other cause save the one of organization and getting together. Why, when I first started out to sell life insurance, agents of competing companies looked upon each other as deadly enemies, and one fellow would have his knife out for the other fellow at the slightest provocation. Contrast conditions of those days with the one you have witnessed to-night, when the general agent, the manager, the superintendent, the office man and the field man, representing different companies, can meet as they have this evening like members of one family, and then you can form an idea what association work means and what the associations are doing for the uplift of the insurance profession in the State of Utah."

All of the speakers were happy in the handling of the subjects assigned them, and Attorney E. M. Ellison, the toastmaster, proved himself an adept at the business.

In responding to the toast, "Insurance—a Mayor's Viewpoint," Mayor Park declared Salt Lake City to be the healthiest city of its size in the United States.

"This is no idle boast," he said. "It is a matter of statistics, and thus we have discounted one of the best stories a life insurance agent can tell his unsuspecting victim."

The mayor also said that the government of Salt Lake was absolutely in sympathy with the cause of life insurance, for the reason that each department of the municipality was trying to do its part in rendering substantial aid; the department of public safety in the "prevention of fatalities, from the accidents of disease, crime or conflagration"; the health department in supplying pure milk and the quarantine of disinfection of contagious diseases; the fire department in an endeavor to put down the fire hazard; the police in minimizing crime.

Heber J. Grant, in his "Insurance Reminiscences," referred to his early acquaintances," referred to his early acquaintance with the officials of both life and fire insurances. He regarded the writing of life insurance as the foremost business in the world to-day.

The address of Insurance Commissioner Epseen, of Colorado, who, like Commissioner Willard Done, was formerly a teacher in the public schools and university, dwelt principally with current problems in the life insurance business.

"The average citizen," said Mr. Epseen, "does not realize the vast importance of insurance in our modern business, economic and private life. Without insurance, business would almost be at a standstill, industry could not thrive, and the dependent portion of the population, women and children, would have but a dreary prospect before them if the father and bread-winner should die."

Before adjournment, on motion of C. W. Helser, a hearty vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Epseen for his able address; and to all who had taken part in the evening's program.

Utica.

James Q. Barcus, of Albany, general agent for the Mutual Benefit, spoke on "Life Insurance, Its Necessity and Its History," in the evening of Feb. 25, in the Y. M. C. A. building. Mr. Barcus was in Utica under the auspices of the Utica association, and following his address he attended a meeting of the underwriters, which was held privately in one of the small rooms at the Y. M. C. A.

Mr. Barcus brought out the fact that every productive life has money value differing in degree only according to the industry, special talents and opportunities of the individual. If a man should die without leaving an income or some manner of maintenance for the family it would be difficult for them to get along. Should this man be earning $50 a month at the time of his death, his life would have had a money value to his family of $9,075, for this is the amount of money which would furnish $50 per month at three per cent. interest. If the family had received $100 a month as a result of the industry, special talents and opportunities of the wage-earner, then his life had a money value of $18,149.

Thus it can be readily seen that every productive life has a money value.

Life insurance cannot protect or replace life, but it insures the money value of such a life. If the money value of the wage-earner's life is not insured, then the home cannot be maintained and the plans of the family for the education of the child and his establishment in business cannot be carried out. Thus it may be seen that the insurance of the money value of life becomes a necessity. Life insurance in this manner perpetuates the home, keeping the family together, takes care of the mother, provides ready money to pay debts, saves respect of family, saves one from anxiety in old age, lifts the mortgage on your life promised wife at the altar, and further continues what death would have ended. Life insurance helps one to succeed in life and makes life worth living. Corporations also have realized the money value of the lives of many of the men in the partnership and have taken out life insurance on these men payable to the corporation. In this city during the year 1912 $618,000 was paid in life insurance.

SOME POINTS CONCERNING SALESMEN AND THEIR MANAGEMENT.

THE LIFE INSURANCE SOLICITOR THE MOST ACTIVE OF ALL SALESMEN AND HE MUST OF NECESSITY BE ALIVE TO HIS OPPORTUNITIES.

The Specialty Salesman, Par Excellence, Who Must Have the Ability to Create Interest Where None Exists and to Carry Negotiations to a Successful Conclusion.

This is the text of an address before the St. Louis Association by T. W. Van, manager of the Koken Barbers' Supply Co. The principles at the foundation of all successful salesmanship are much the same, and herein will be found suggestions of great value to the solicitor who is seeking short cuts to individual efficiency.—Editor's Note.

I know nothing of the individual problems of the insurance solicitor or sales organizer, but I am forcibly impressed with the magnitude of the business, realizing fully that no other single industry compares to that of insurance in its various forms.

I am also impressed with the fact that the kind of goods which is sold by the great insurance organizations of our country is of a kind which means much for the happiness, contentment of mind and general welfare of our people.

The individual solicitor of insurance is to my mind the most active of all salesmen, and must of necessity be one of the keenest. The insurance salesman in most cases, if he is one who makes a record for himself, is always working on new customers. He is the specialty salesman par excellence, the peer of them all, with an ability to create an interest where none existed, and carry it to a successful conclusion for the benefit of himself, his customer and his company.

The Limit Reached.

Each time I look in my safe deposit box I am impressed with his ability when I see the stock of insurance certificates covering all phases that has been sold me personally in times gone by, until the limit has been reached and I am no longer a prospect.

If I were to use a Biblical text in describing them, I would take the one where it is said that "the hand of the diligent maketh rich,"

No two people agree in the organization and management of salesmen. Each line of business sees this problem from its own angle. Fundamental principles are always adaptable, and to both the salesmen and the manager of the sales department and the company itself I know of no one fundamental principle that is as important as the policy of the company.

In these days we have come to learn that there is a vast difference between "honesty being the best policy" and policy honesty. We have come to learn that permanent business depends on the square deal. Therefore, as a first and important principle fundamentally adaptable to the insurance business as well as to any other business, I can lay down that of the square deal policy.

First of all, to the customer; second, to the salesman; third, to the house, and fourth, to the competitor,

It is so self-evident that to continue in business a customer must be a satisfied one, which can only come as a result of a square deal policy, that I take it is not necessary to temporize on this self-evident fact.

The company policy as concerns the salesmen should be one, first of all, which takes into consideration his equipment. It is unfair to send any salesman out into the maelstrom of modern competition unequipped to battle with the waves which roll in such a tempestuous manner in the business world of to-day. It is not fair to throw him into the deep water and let him swim or sink.

The square deal policy will from the very start take the salesman in hand and familiarize him with the business and his part in it. The manager of the sales force will find that in this way alone is he able to reduce friction which is sure to come in the future if this important work is overlooked.

No Vacillating Policy.

The salesman must be convinced of the stability of the policy of the house. A vacillating policy will be reflected in the efforts of the salesmen immediately.

If inside prices or special privileges are granted to favored customers, it will be mighty hard to convince the salesman that his particular friends should not be taken care of in the same manner.

I do not hold that any sales organization will produce a perfect salesman. I do hold that it will accentuate certain qualifications which work to that end, and some of the things which it should do are:

First.—Give the salesman the very best knowledge of his line. In this way only will he be able to carry conviction to his prospective customers. Such organization will keep adding and improving the salesman's selling talk, supplying him with new and reserve arguments and with good answer for every objection.

Second.—It will help him with the problem of how to approach customers, in so far as it can classify and group these customers.

Third.—It will impress him with the importance of many things which will be aiding him in his work, such as good personal habits, appearance, etc.

Fourth.—It will warn him particularly against the use of slang and all breezy approach.

Fifth.—Above all it will develop self-confidence in the salesman—a confidence which will breed enthusiasm and which will be of such a marked degree that it will be transmissible from him to his customer, and be reflected in the number of policies he is able to write.

Sixth.—A proper sales organization will enthuse with a kind of enthusiasm that enables him to so burden his words with a feeling of sincerity that he is able to quickly reach both the mind and heart of his prospect.

It is a well-known fact that many a man who does not know the line, if properly enthused, makes a good salesman when others who know the line thoroughly, without enthusiasm, are poor salesmen indeed.

The Good Closer.

Seventh.—A proper sales organization will teach a salesman to be first of all a good closer, but since no man can close all the orders that are placed in his territory, it also teaches him to be a good loser.

Some people are bad losers; indeed, so much so that they hurt both their company and their future prospects by the manner in which they take this loss. We have all seen this kind of salesmen.

Particularly does it impress him with the fact that each loss can be turned to good by properly studying the underlying causes. Many a lost order has made better salesmen—more profitable to themselves and their company.

Eighth.—Most salesmen are loyal, yet as much as it is to be regretted they will occasionally talk disparagingly about their employer and the condition under which they are compelled to work or sell.

Nothing is more reprehensible in a salesman, for by every law of logic while he is in the employ of the house, and drawing from it his daily bread, he should defend his company; under no circumstances should he ridicule it.

If wrongs should be righted, there is the proper man always to go to. He and he alone should be put wise to the facts, and if harmony between the salesmen and the house cannot then be brought about, and the salesman cannot adjust himself, the proper thing for him to do is to resign in the interests of the organization and look elsewhere for a new berth.

Habits of Knocking.

Ninth.—The manager of a sales force knows that nothing lessens the efficiency of the force so much as to permit them to fall into the habit of knocking. Most salesmen who lose an order jump at the conclusion that the one who got it did so by unfair means. He justifies his failure oftentimes by a report largely of surmise.

Unless managers are careful, they are apt themselves to get into the habit of believing these reports, which are only excuses of the salesman to placate such a failure. Such managers are making a great mistake, and are looking at business from a narrow point of view when they permit themselves to get in this state of mind.

When salesmen bring in such excuses they should be discouraged. Salesmen themselves should rise above justifying failure with knocks, for this habit is sure to carry its own penalty, for in the course of time he will lose his faith in human nature, and likewise his nerve to fight will be shattered.

To every salesman and every sales manager I would say, that where reports on a lost sale are a matter of office requirement, that these reports under all circumstances should be written out, nothing should be put thereon that is not a thing that can be substantiated easily.

Above all things, forbear against regarding mere hearsay and mere surmise. By this system a salesman himself comes to realize that reasons of surmise are not reasons of fact, and he will commence to look at lost orders from the proper viewpoint, and not one which consists mainly in vilifying his competitor, who, like himself, is traveling through this world in the same boat, and who in turn can rock the boat quite as much by the same means.

I stated that a square deal policy took into consideration the competitor. I believe that in these days the competitor is being looked at from a different viewpoint from what he was a few years back.

A Community of Interest.

Competitors are coming to realize that there is a community of interest, and that there is a spirit of fair play in business, and that the measure of the success of every company is the measure of its ability, resourcefulness and quality of the service it is able to render its customers.

The manager of salesmen should give more thought to the competitor, realizing that, like you and I, he is a man who in the long run we will meet at the same common point from whence we started, and that as we travel we can get a deal more contentment and pleasure out of business and life if we travel together as friends, rather than as mortal enemies, like the cats of the poem in which it is said

"There were once two cats of Kilkenny,
Each thought there was one cat too many;
So they scratched and they bit,
They fought and they spit,
'Till, excepting their nails
And the tips of their tails,
Instead of two cats there wasn't any."

The insurance salesmen I have known seem to be equally good as collectors and solicitors. They seem to be well grounded in the fact that a sale is not a sale until the first premium is paid, either in part or in full—in some manner a consideration or clincher is procured.

To the organizer of such successful salesmen I doff my hat, for I appreciate fully the training that is required to produce at one and the same time such a combination as a good solicitor and a collector, when they are so notoriously non-existent in the natural world.

A friend of mine has described to me the insurance salesman as a ship turned out without a chart or compass, yet who has within his hull a good steam-producing apparatus, and when he has become becalmed after running down all the barnacle hauls he calls prospects, he is able to get up steam and go after new prospects.

Benefits of Conventions.

I am a great believer in salesmen's convention or salesmen's councils; first, because younger salesmen come in contact with older men and are thereby enabled to add to their equipment; second, older salesmen get ideas which come from young blood coursing through a younger and more inventive brain. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings sometimes comes wisdom," and many old salesmen frankly admit that they have gotten original ideas from the youngest on the force.

Salesmen, in this wise, not only benefit themselves, but benefit their house and their manager of sales by conserving his energies and by coming together learn how this work involves other departments around their institution and their relation and responsibility thereto.

I believe in salesmen's conventions and salesmen's councils being developed entirely by the salesmen. I believe in their being planned from the salesman's point of view, because of the fact that salesmen know what they want.

To my mind many a manager of sales, when calling his salesmen together, makes a great mistake by having a cut and dried program, one entirely from the house point of view.

Out of courtesy the salesman kindly sits and takes it all in, much of it he can use, yet the keenness of his interest is not to be compared to that when the program is one largely arranged by the salesmen themselves and packed full of salesmen's problems, which during the last year have caused them trouble and upon which they want help.

This Program Committee should at all times work with the head of the sales department from his larger view and an intimate knowledge of the salesmen's most prominent weakness he is able to add much which strengthens and helps.

Properly managed, these salesmen's conventions or councils are conducive of an esprit de corps which after all is the thing which must be established in every well-organized sales organization to get really effective results.

Now.

There is always a beginning, but—when?

Every undertaking must have a beginning—must have its initiative, and this first step seems to be the most difficult, while natural hesitation make the difficulty appear greater than it really is.

Hesitation inclines to procrastination, to putting off—something no one can afford to do—something that is a serious hindrance, if not in a great measure fatal, to success.

Now is always the propitious time, Now is all the time a man has—the only time that he can be at all sure of. No one can be sure of to-morrow.

If the undertaking is worth the effort, the time to make it is Now. "Now or never" is a trite truth. If not now it may never be made.

It is the man who starts now who wins out in the end.

There is nothing so potent for success or failure as the effort or non-effort of Now.

Waiting for a more convenient season, for a more propitious time, is a chimera, a delusion, a snare. The convenient season, the propitious time, is now.

There is a marked difference between Now and Then.

Now is definite, positive—means "Something doing." Then is indefinite, uncertain—it means—well, perhaps.

Man can reasonably count on the results of Now—the results of Then are "up in the air."

A man who is taking it easy Now and waiting for to-morrow to open for him an easier way is trifling with fate and deserves to have failure written across his life's pages.

That which a man is doing now is the all important thing—that which he is going to do—it all depends.—Preferred Pilot.

Believe in Yourself.

Did you ever notice what unbounded confidence every successful insurance man has in himself? He really believes himself to be an exceptionally able salesman—and the main reason why he is that very thing is because he believes himself to be. In other words, he is what he believes himself to be. His belief in himself has a great deal to do with his actual accomplishments.

Confidence in your ability is an invaluable asset. No man ever accomplished any great result who did not first have confidence in his ability to do so. Every successful general of the armies of the world was a man with a high opinion is to his own ability. If you doubt this statement, just read what historians say of Caesar, Napoleon, Washington, Grant, and every other great general who won a place for himself in history.

The secret of success is within you—not without. If you earnestly believe you can build up a large and profitable agency and then back up that belief with a determination to make it a reality, your ultimate success is half won. Shakespeare knew what he was talking about when he said: "Our doubts make cowards of us all." Nine out of every ten men who have failed in the insurance business owe their failures to the fact that they listened to the poisoned whisperings of doubt, laziness and procrastination.

Why should we permit ourselves to labor under the delusion that our possible accomplishments are limited? Every man owes himself supreme confidence in his ability and owes his career the best work of which he is capable. Confidence in self is the motive power that propels every successful man.—Agents' Record.

GOOD WORK ACCOMPLISHED BY THE INFANT ASSOCIATION OF THE SOUTHWEST.

The Texas Association, Less Than a Year Old, Starts Aggressive Campaign to Eliminate Twisting, Rebating and Embezzling.

Probably no local body affiliated with the National Association has accomplished more in the same space of time than the Texas association. This association was organized less than a year ago, but the results which have been accomplished in that short space of time seem almost incredible.

After the association had gained sufficient headway to inspire confidence on the part of the active insurance men in the State, a definite campaign was inaugurated to eliminate the four pernicious evils of the insurance business. There existed in Texas the active rebater, the embezzler, the twister, and an army of men continually soliciting insurance without licenses. The rebater was so vicious in his work that many times he threw out a challenge to honest insurance men in the State, claiming that he would do as he pleased with his money. Declaration was openly made that a man could not be indicted in Texas for rebating life insurance premiums. But through the effective work of the association throughout the various counties of the State the enthusiastic support of county attorneys was enlisted and a number of cases have been brought to trial.

Perhaps the most discouraging and costly factor that the general agents in Texas had to contend with was in the matter of embezzlements. The books of one prominent general agency show over $30,000 that this particular agency lost through agents in the field embezzling premiums and in failing to refund them where applications had been declined. We are told by a reliable authority that this has been rather a common experience.

Detective Employed.

The officers of the association found some typical cases of embezzlement and a confidence man was employed and put on the cases. All necessary information relating to each case was obtained and the men were then indicted by the grand jury and warrants were issued for their arrest, with the following result. An agent was arrested at Canton on a warrant charging him with embezzlement of a company's net premiums. He was tried, convicted, and is now looking through the bars. Another case from Collin County was investigated, the agent indicted, and a warrant placed in the hands of a sheriff for his arrest. He was finally apprehended in Houston and returned to McKinney, the county seat of Collin County, where he is now in jail awaiting his trial, which will come up in May.

There was one case which deserves special mention. One man had been particularly active in withholding funds, and the ledgers of various offices showed debit balances of $200 to $2,000 on account of this man's operations. A case was found where he had collected a premium near Paris and had failed or refused to return the premium to the applicant after receiving notice that the application had been declined. The detective employed for the association worked up the facts and the agent was promptly indicted and a warrant issued for his arrest. In the meantime he left Texas. Information was placed in the hands of the Thiel Detective Agency and the agent was traced from Texas to California, from California to St. Louis, Mo., from St. Louis back to Little Rock, Ark., from there to Springfield, Mo., and finally down to Shreveport, La., at which point he was located. Extradition papers were secured from the Governor of Texas on the Governor of Louisiana. He was arrested and returned to Paris.

The association has devoted the larger portion of its time and effort to the stamping out of the rebater and the embezzler, which are the two big problems in Texas. While the work has required considerable time and money, the officers and members of the association feel that it was worth the price paid. The association is growing rapidly and constantly extending its sphere of effective activity.

THE FOREHANDED MAN.

For a Man with a Family and Not a Fortune, the Most Important Investment of All Is Life Insurance. The Simplest and Surest Thing in the World.

This article was written by Will Payne and appeared in a recent number of the "Saturday Evening Post." It is reproduced here with special permission. Mr. Payne tells nothing particularly new to the experienced Life Insurance solicitor, but his viewpoint is remarkably clear and convincing. It will show you how to present a simple and non-technical argument to a prospect who imagines that Life Insurance is too intricate to be easily understood.—Editor's Note.

For any man who has a family and not a fortune, by far the most important of all investments is life insurance. For a young man who has no family it is a good investment too; for he can, to so speak, invest his youth and health in it, and later on he may have dependents when youth and health are gone.

No insurable man, with wife and children who would be deprived of their support by his death, can afford to go without life insurance for a day; in fact, I believe it would be a good thing to make life insurance compulsory for married men without fortune.

Eugenics proposes that a doctor's certificate of sound health shall be a condition, precedent to the issuance of a marriage license. I would make the prospective bridegroom show his life insurance policy too. If it is to the interest of society that only healthy parents have children it is equally to the interest of society that some provision be made for the child's support in case the father dies.

There is still a good deal of silly prejudice against life insurance among young, sentimental and inexperienced women. They call it taking blood money for a husband's death. That is nonsense. If every wife felt that way, and every husband were guided by his wife's feeling, there could be no life insurance, and thousands of women and children who are now somewhat provided for would be plunged into beggary.

Simplest Thing in the World.

Life insurance is really the simplest and surest thing in the world. That it is not universally so understood is largely due to past sins of the life insurance companies themselves. In the palmy days before the Hyde explosion, when the big companies were striving to accumulate the greatest possible mass of assets, life insurance agents seldom clearly explained the business.

Instead of talking straight life insurance they talked endowments, annuities and various other investment frills. They boasted of their company's big dividends; insisted that the insured in their company did not have to die in order to win, and in general strove to create an impression that a life insurance company might be a sort of magic cornucopia out of which the policyholders could take more money than they put in.

As practically all life insurance is mutual—whether the company be nominally mutual or one with capital stock—the policyholders cannot possibly take out more than they put in, plus accumulated interest at about 4 per cent.; and in any form of straight life insurance you do have to die in order to win.

Turn, for example, to the vital statistics of Massachusetts. You will find that for years the annual death rate per thousand has never been less than 15 or more than 17. Suppose the State undertook to pay $100 on every death. There would be nothing uncertain about its calculations. It would say:

"Not less than 15 or more than 17 people out of every thousand will die this year. To be on the safe side we must provide for the higher number, which will entail an expenditure of $1,700 for each thousand inhabitants. So we will levy a tax of $1.70 on each inhabitant, and that will provide a fund sufficient to pay $100 on every death."

It is astonishing how evenly death falls on people under modern conditions when great plagues are unknown. In any large, populous area just about the same number in a thousand die each year. In all civilized countries, it is true, the death rate tends to fall, but the decline is gradual; and it would be perfectly practicable to insure en masse the population of any State or civilized country. The amount of death benefits to be paid could be figured out with substantial accuracy years in advance.

The Death Rate.

There is a great difference, however, in the death rate at different ages. Taking the whole registration area of the United States—that is, the area comprised in those States which keep vital statistics—nearly one-fifth of all the deaths are of infants under one year of age. More than 27 out of every 100 deaths are of children under five years of age; but children from five to nine years of age account for little more than two out of every 100 deaths.

The life insurance actuaries have been studying these vital statistics for a century and checking up by the experience of the companies. Thus they have constructed mortality tables that show with substantial accuracy the greatest number of persons out of every thousand of a given age and living under ordinary conditions that will die in a year.

Of any three policyholders of the same age and in good health on January first one may die during the year and two survive; or two may die and one survive; or all three may die; or none may die. Of any ten policyholders of the same age one may die during the year; or nine may die; or death may take all ten, or none. But out of 10,000 policyholders of the same age the number that will die during the year may be accurately foretold.

The Arithmetic of Insurance.

Suppose now a hundred thousand men 21 years old should get together on January first and agree to pay $1,000 to the heirs of each of them who died during the year. Turning to the mortality table they would find that 785 was the largest number that would die in a year; so they must provide that number of benefits—or $785,000 in all. Each of them contributes $7.85, thereby making up a fund that will surely pay all the death claims accruing during the year. There is no guesswork or uncertainty about it.

Suppose they wish to continue the arrangement another year. The death rate will be a trifle higher that second year, because they are older. At the same time there will be fewer of them to contribute to the fund, because of the number that died the first year. Consequently each one will have to contribute a little more the second year than in the first.

So in each succeeding year, as the death rate mounts and the number of survivors declines, the yearly contribution rises higher and higher until finally there would be a solitary survivor 90 odd years old, who would dutifully pay $1,000 into the fund at the beginning of the year, which sum his heirs would receive when tardy Nature finally removed him.

Nobody likes an arrangement under which he pays more and more every year. So the actuaries equate the payments the average life would make and spread them evenly year by year. Thus—allowing interest at the rate of 3 per cent., which is disregarded in the preceding paragraphs—a man aged 21 is entitled to a thousand dollars insurance for that year on contributing $7.62 to the fund; but 20 years later, when he is 41, he must contribute $9.71—in another ten years $14.11—in another decade $28.03.

However, if at 21 he begins by paying $14.72 he may continue paying that same sum—neither more nor less—every year. At first, so to speak, he pays too much; but as he gets older he pays too little, and the accumulated over-payments of his early years make up the deficits of his older years.

I have taken the figures of the American Experience Table of Mortality, which is commonly used by life insurance companies, and have disregarded expenses and fractions. There are other tables yielding somewhat different premiums; but the main point is that insuring lives is perfectly simple and certain, because out of a large number of people the proportion that will die in any given year can be foretold with substantial accuracy; and to tell how much each one should contribute in order to meet the death claims that will accrue in any year or in any number of years is a mere matter of arithmetic.

Companies Merely Custodians.

The life insurance company is merely the custodian of the fund its policyholders make up in order to pay one another's death claims. These contributions to the fund are called premiums.

As a matter of fact all conservatively managed companies base their premiums on a death rate considerably higher than the actual one. They want to be on the safe side. Also they add to the premium a certain "loading" to cover expenses; and this loading is rather more than expenses actually come to.

In short, they collect from their policyholders every year more than is really necessary to meet the death claims and pay expenses. And the next year they hand back this overcharge, together with interest, in a rebate that is misnamed a dividend. This rebate has, in fact, no resemblance to a real dividend, but is merely an overcharge, collected in order to keep on the safe side, which is handed back when the year's business has shown that it was not needed.

This is straight life insurance, to which, however, a great many investment features may be added. Our 100,000 young men, referred to above, find that $7.85—or $7.62 if interest at 3 per cent. be allowed—will create a fund sufficient to pay $1,000 to the heirs of each of them who dies during the year. "But," they say, "we want something left over at the end of the year."

So each of them pays in two dollars more, and at the end of the year, besides meeting all death claims, they have a fund of $206,000, supposing the bank in which the fund is deposited allows them 3 per cent. interest.

In the same way the life insurance company finds out from its mortality tables how much you must pay in order to carry straight insurance on your life. Then, if you want the company to pay you a thousand dollars in cash at the end of 20 years—or any other sum at the end of any other period—it will figure out how much, in addition to the straight life premium, you must pay in order to create the amount you want to receive in the specified time.

If You Only Knew.

Or, if you want to stop paying premiums at the end of 10 or 20 years, the company can easily calculate how much more you must pay each year in order to accumulate in 10 or 20 payments a sum equal to what you would have paid in if you had continued paying every year during your expectancy of life.

All these things are simply investment features added to straight life insurance; and straight life insurance is nothing more or less than a mutual agreement among the policyholders to contribute in just proportions, as established by mortuary statistics, to a fund that will surely meet the various death claims accruing against it.

Assessment insurance is exactly the same sort of mutual agreement in a crude form. As we have seen above, if our hundred thousand young men adopted assessment insurance, and admitted no young newcomers to their ranks, their payments would steadily increase year by year, until finally one hoary survivor paid in the whole amount of his policy.

Generally speaking, it may be said that assessment insurance is good for the time being, and a man who cannot meet the higher payments of old-line insurance should certainly take assessment insurance; but the insurance that is based squarely on the experience of mortality and which does not depend on the taking in of young members is best.

You may insure to-day and die to-morrow, in which case the company will pay you a great deal more than it received from you—or you may insure to-day, at the age of 21, and live to be 95, in which case you will have paid the company more than it pays your beneficiary; but it is absolutely immaterial to the company whether you die the day after you insure or live to be 95, because out of all its policyholders only a certain number will die in a given year and only a certain number will live to be 95. It gets the average.

It, beginning at 21—or any other age—you reach just the average length of life you will have paid in as much as your beneficiary receives—interest considered. If you knew you were going to reach just the average length of life you would be as well off to put your premiums in a savings bank; but you do not know. Hence the necessity of life insurance.

Most Business Not Written in Competition.

Experienced life insurance men state that at least 95 per cent. of all business written is secured not in competition with representatives of other companies. We believe this to be absolutely true. This being so, we cannot understand why so many men spend so much time digging into forgotten history to find something about this company or that—not the good thing, mind you, but anything which can be made to appear derogatory—instead of studying how to meet any objections the prospect may make, instead of studying the prospect, his means, the reasons why he should insure and which policy best suits his individual case. Every spare minute an agent can take from the actual work of canvassing should be put into work on the line how best to present his company and its advantages, into studying and becoming perfectly familiar with the policies of his company. To discount in any way any other company discounts your own. Do not invite competition by any suggestion. Smother the other fellow's competition by praise of his company and his policies. This will prove your greatest force in meeting competition, and will disarm at once any antagonism. Raise the dignity of your calling and you will command respect and attention.—Prudential Record.

How About Your Punch.

You know that fellow who died several years ago, but he didn't know it; he's a dead one, he is still walking around dead—just like a suit of clothes walking the street. He has lost his punch, needs a self-starter, he needs a spark-plug and an electric battery, and a fire under his dry rot to start it. "RUT," that's it, he is in a rut. Someone said the difference between a rut and a grave is the length and the depth. In our business men, and good men, too, get into the rut. No spark, no spunk, no punch, no life, no enthusiasm, no mirth in their laugh, no fun in their jokes. No: they are walking around in a TRANCE. When you feel that feeling coming on, run like a scared devil, keep as far away from the influence as you can, and then you will never be overcome by that slow death, or that sleeping sickness, which means that you are dead for years before your folks bury you. BOYS, DON'T LOSE YOUR PUNCH.—Berrett & Snow's Marksmen.

THE NEW ENGLAND CONGRESS OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS.

Meeting to Be Held at the Parker House in Boston on April 27. Excellent Program, with Prominent Speakers. Large Attendance Expected.

Realizing the inconvenience of a large number of life insurance agents located in New England in attending the annual convention of the National Association, prominent members of local associations throughout that section of the country began to make plans early this year to hold a congress of life underwriters. The idea originated on the Pacific Coast, where last June there was held the Pacific Northwest Life Underwriters' Congress, which proved to be a remarkable success.

Plans for the New England Congress will follow along the same lines as that of the Northwest Congress and will have the same objects in view. The meeting will in all respects be a small convention and the benefits which will accrue from it will be similar to the inspirational and educational features of the annual national meeting.

A temporary organization was formed at the January meeting of the Connecticut association and H. S. Waldron, a prominent member of the Western Massachusetts association located at Springfield, was elected president; Otis T. Arnold, of the Central Massachusetts association, was elected vice-president; E. E. Decker, of Portland, Me., second vice-president; Lee C. Robens, of Hartford, secretary, and C. C. Miller, of Boston, chairman of the executive committee. After several conferences it was decided to hold the congress on Monday, April 27, at the Parker House in Boston. A morning session will begin at 10.30 and there will be a buffet lunch at noon. The following is an outline of the program, which will, of course, be subject to certain modifications as circumstances may develop:

The Program.

Address of welcome, Percy V. Baldwin, of Boston, member of the Executive Committee of the National Association of Life Underwriters.

"The purpose and Value of the New England Congress," Henry S. Waldron, of Springfield.

"Securing and Developing Prospects," Franklin W. Ganse, vice-president of the Boston Life Underwriters' Association.

"Psychology of Salesmanship," Guy F. Wheeler, of Worcester, Mass.

"Life Insurance Taxation," Edward A. Woods, of Pittsburgh, Pa., vice-president and chairman of the Committee on Taxation of the National Association of Life Underwriters.

"Income Insurance," Charles W. Scovel, of Pittsburgh, Pa., ex-president of the National Association of Life Underwriters, who addressed the National Association of 1913 on this same subject.

The committee having the matter in charge has issued an announcement in which it is stated:

"Efficiency is the watchword of the day, studied by all classes of business and professional men, and to be efficient as a life insurance agent one should be thoroughly informed on all phases of the business. We believe that this program as arranged will help to promote the efficiency of every man who attends, as the topics to be discussed are of vital importance and value and the speakers are particularly well versed in their respective subjects. It is sincerely hoped that there will be a large attendance, and every agent who has a license and carries a rate-book is cordially invited to attend, whether or not he is a member of a local association. As this meeting has been arranged for a Monday, attendance will necessitate but one day's absence from business. Those planning to arrive in Boston on Saturday or Sunday who prefer accommodations at the Parker House should make reservations at an early date."

HOW THE SUCCESSFUL LIFE INSURANCE AGENT THRIVES ON EXCUSES.

The Old Story of How "It Cannot Be Done" a Myth.
The Only Agent Who Does Not Meet with Excuses
Is the Agent Who Does Not Work.

The cry of the weakling is "It can't be done." With all the facts in hand we often reach the conclusion that the reason some particular prospect was not insured was because the agent did not work hard enough. All things considered, the "Can't be done" propositions in Life Insurance are very few. Such cases exist largely in the mind of the agent. Hubert H. Ward, who is responsible for the following story is the original GUY WHO PUT THE CAN IN CAN'T.—Editor's Note.

"There are thousands to tell you it cannot be done;
There are thousands to prophesy failure;
There are thousands to point out to you one by one
The dangers that wait to assail you:
But just buckle in with a bit of a grin,
Then take off your coat and go to it;
Just start in to sing as you tackle the thing
That 'cannot be done,' and you'll do it."

The above quotation is the last verse of a poem by Edgar A. Gust, and it strikes me as being peculiarly appropriate to the "knight of the rate book." For each man who tells you in your canvassing that "it cannot be done," you can point to others in proof that it has been done. To what do I refer? To that which you have for sale, the protection of life insurance. There are many on whom you call who will try to sidetrack you from the purpose of your call by pointing out "the dangers that wait to assail you." In other words they are prolific with their excuses. What then should you do in your effort to overcome those excuses, those "dangers that wait to assail you"? "Just start to sing as you tackle the thing"—"and you'll do it."

Never Stops at Excuses.

The life insurance agent who does not meet with excuses is the one who does not work. The agent who works is the agent who sees prospects, and the harder he works the more prospects he sees, and the more prospects he sees the more excuses does he had handed to him—the more "can't be done's." But if he is alive to his job and has the situation well in hand, he does not stop at excuses, he uses those excuses as so many blocks of rough stone on which he must work his chisel in an effort to carve out the complete statue which dies hidden in the stone. The excuse for not taking life insurance does not exist which can not be ultimately reasoned away, provided the right man is there for the interview at the right time. The wrong man will give way to the excuses, but the right man will in most cases get around, get over, get under or go through those excuses one by one.

Do you work early and late? Are you the first man in the office in the morning and the last man out at night? Are you the first man out of the office and on to the street in your soliciting campaign in the morning, and are you the last man to return to the office at night from that soliciting campaign? If you are, then you have met—perhaps not your thousands—but you have met men who have told you during your day's work that "it could not be done"—you have met men who have prophesied failure—you have met men who have tried to point out to you, one by one, the dangers (excuses) that wait to assail you. Do you back out with a frown and quit, or do you "take off your coat and go to it with a bit of a grin?"

There is about twenty-eight to thirty billion of life insurances in force in the United States; old line and assessment together. This means that there is about $300 per capita of the population of the United States. It is a silent witness to the fact that too many agents have listened to excuses from their prospective purchasers—that they have turned away too soon—that they have closed the interview on the wrong side of the fence. In the United States there is only about $1,500 for each bread-winner, of life insurance in force, including old line and assessment. Eliminating the assessment insurance as uncertain and unreliable, it leaves about $1,000 of real insurance for each bread-winner in the United States. This being true, there is a great field for growth in life insurance in this country. In other words, there is a big harvest to be reaped.

Too Much Grain Standing.

The life insurance reapers in the field are now leaving too much grain standing. They are not in good condition for mowing the wheat. Do you know, Mr. Agent, while in some lines of work there are two men for every job to be done, what in the life insurance business the supply is only about one-tenth of the demand and that of the 150,000 life insurance salesmen in the business to-day, but a small proportion are making what we might call a handsome revenue. Why? First and principally because the agents themselves do not work as they should. Second, because the moment they see that spectre Excuse looming up before them, they are too prone to lose sight of the purpose for which they called, they let the other man do most of the talking, and the other man, in altogether too many cases, literally backs the life insurance man out of the room with his excuses.

Are you going to permit yourself to be backed off from half or two-thirds of your interviews, which, for the most part, are made on what ought to be good soliciting material, or are you going to use your brains and your ingenuity to turn those excuses, as they are brought up one by one, on the man who offers them and riddle them with reasons until the man himself sees the excuses, on which he counted so much, fall before his very eye? The man does not live who does not need life insurance, and the reason so many of them do live without life insurance to-day is in many cases chargeable to the methods employed by the average life insurance agent. Do not be an average life insurance agent. Attempt to excel in your work, overcome the excuses. They can be overcome, surmounted, brushed aside. As Dr. Frank Crane says in his little essay on "Salesmanship." "Get out and make people buy your goods. Get in the game. It beats football."

The Wrong Perspective.

You who solicit the successful business man are often seeing the man who, because of his success, is thrown out of the right perspective of himself, of the needs of his business and his family, and of his duty towards those needs. He is apt to gain the impression that because of his success, because of the wealth back of him, he is impregnable. In reality, the man does not live who is impregnable. The man needing life insurance does not live who is greater than life insurance any more than does a President of the United States live who is greater than his office. This man will offer a line of excuses based on his success. He will tell you what he has done in the past in the hope of driving you out from the interview, awed by being in the presence of a successful man. This gives you a splendid opening. You can congratulate him on his success in the past, and you can say to him that if he is as valuable a man as he says he is, that his opportunities for money making and for success in the future are unlimited—but there may be no future waiting him. He may not be able to carry out his plans, and if he dies without life insurance, the world loses something as a result of his unaccomplished acts. Tell him you are not trying to insure his past, but you are trying to insure his future.

Excuses—Excuses—Excuses. The successful life insurance agent thrives on them. The life insurance agent who is weak to-day, but who puts thought into his work, will be the strong life insurance agent of to-morrow, by passing in review, after each interview, the excuses which have been put to him and have thrown him down. In that review he will think for himself, of other methods of approach which he can use on the next man, or in a later interview on the same man for securing the coveted application. "It cannot be done?" Of course, not if you say so. Surely no one else is going to do it for you. But "if you take off your coat and start to sing as you tackle the thing"—you will find that it can be done.

Remember, Mr. Agent, that excuses are something for you to thrive on, not fall down on.

Remember this:

American Life Insurance is not an institution for making profits, but for distributing losses. Through this agency twenty-five million Americans voluntarily provide for their families and their old age, something that Germany, England and other countries are compelling at government expense. Yet, the United States is the distributing machine to levy, collect and have handed over to the governments of the various States and nation enormous funds in the guise of taxation. The States are now collecting, exclusive of the taxes on real estate, twelve million dollars annually, which is six times the amount collected in 1890.

THE AVERAGE MAN DOES NOT PUT BY ENOUGH FOR HIS DECLINING YEARS.

Boston Herald Claims That Few Men Provide for Families in Event of Sudden Death. Statistics Compiled by Earl G. Manning Throw Light on Subject Considered.

"One of the most perplexing problems the American man is trying to solve to-day," says the Boston Herald, "is how to live normally and reasonably so that his expenses will not exceed his income.

"All of us have been in the position, at some time or other, of the man who exclaimed: 'Ten thousand a year is my income clear, and I manage to spend it all.' We know we receive a certain income, and at the end of the year there is none of it left.

"What difference does it make?" we argue, 'It's gone and what can we do about it?' There is this difference; if we knew how and for what we had spent it, we might be able to regulate our next year's expenses so that we could get ahead of the game, instead of breaking even, or going behind. 'But it's such a bother to keep a record,' we still argue. So is anything a bother that is worth while doing.

"Only about two men out of every ten make any systematic attempt to record their expenses, and after all, isn't this really the answer why so many of us are living beyond our incomes?

"Periodically in every mercantile concern inventory is taken. This is good business. It enables the merchant to pile data regarding his methods of living, and to use it as a basis to judge our own variations.

"Until recent years no data of any real value had been obtained upon which a reliable average budget could be compiled. Through the good agencies of a number of public spirited individuals and organizations, however, enough data has been collected to make possible the publishing of the charts seen here.

"The charts which are shown are the result of a careful investigation by Earl G. Manning, of the Provident Life and Trust Co., at Boston. The data from which they have been compiled comes from reliable sources and represents actual and not estimated figures of recent date.

"Mr. Manning has personally interviewed and discussed the relation of expenditures to income with over 2,000 men living in Boston, and we quote his experiences in his own language:

Almost without exception, every one to whom I have shown this chart has been moved to give me some expression as to his own personal expenditures. I find that in most instances at least three of the six columns in the chart agree with the expenditures of these men. The other three columns show a variation about evenly divided above and below the figures of the chart.

The most significant point that I have observed is that only about two-fifths of the men I have interviewed are over the average on the item, "Insurance and Savings," while about three-fifths are under. This leads me to believe that men living in large centers do not save as much as men living in smaller cities or in the country. What-tell whether he is going ahead or behind. It is just as important for the success of our personal futures that we check up, periodically, to determine our position in life.

"The merchant has the advantage of having had a definite standard by which he can gauge his profits or losses. This has been made possible by records of his past business and a general knowledge of what other men in his own line are doing.

"It would be manifestly impossible for any one to assume that an absolutely accurate apportionment of expenses could be compiled which would fit the case of every man. The personal factors of the individual, his aspirations, his ideals are so varied that a correct living plan as outlined for one man would mean hardship and unhappiness for another. Also each walk in life is surrounded by peculiar conditions which necessitate expenditures out of the ordinary.

"It is, however, within the bounds of reason to assume the existence of an average man; to record his actions; to com-ever may be the variation in the other columns, it is my firm belief that the item, "Insurance and Savings," should be constant. It is not what a man makes that counts; it's what he saves.

I am constantly asked to determine what proportion of the item, "Insurance and Savings," should be expended for life insurance. My answer is always, "Enough to provide a decent living income for your family in the event of your death."

Recent investigations by social economists have determined that the minimum income on which a widow and two children can live normally is about $15 a week, or $780 a year. Theoretically, this income should continue indefinitely, but the cost to provide this would be too much for the average man to assume. It is conceded that it should continue at least 20 years, because it would give the mother the chance to bring up her children to maturity so they in turn could support her.

The amount of life insurance necessary to provide this income for 20 years is $12,000. At the age of 35, which is the averaging insuring age in America, this can be bought for about $275 a year net, or about $23 per $1,000 in any good life insurance company. The rates are lower at the younger ages and higher at the older ages.

If a man cannot afford this amount of insurance, I suggest that the total can be reduced, which, of course, reduces the length of time the income has to run. I always point out, though, that this amount should be kept in mind as an objective to be ultimately attained:

$9,500 provides $780 income for 15 years
$7,000 provides $780 income for 10 years
$5,000 provides $780 income for 7 years
$3,000 provides $780 income for 4 years

The insurance a man already has can be used as an integral part in providing any one of the above incomes, as most life insurance companies will pay the proceeds of policies at death in instalments, instead of a lump sum.

Is there not here food for thought? Isn't it possible for a great majority of us to make some attempt to standardize our living expenses so that we will eventually solve the question of the high cost of living?

LIFE INSURANCE.

Life insurance companies, the greatest of all benevolent and philanthropic institutions, stand out more prominently to-day than ever before. At no other time in the history of life insurance has its relation to the public been of such great and almost universal importance as at the present time. It is difficult for us who are busy thinking and formulating plans to get new policyholders to enjoy its benefits to realize in the fullest sense the extent to which the public at large is affected by the results of this great scheme of beneficence.

It seems almost beyond belief that the life insurance companies of the United States are distributing to widows and orphans, to societies and policyholders themselves, more than $400,000,000 annually—approximately $1,300,000 for each working day, $165,000 for each working hour, $2,700 for each working minute and $450 for each working second. The people hear and read, but do not fully realize these magnificent results, nor do they fully appreciate the ability exercised by the men behind these great institutions, the hardest kind of hard work of solicitors in the field, the loving forethought and sometimes self-denial of persistent policyholders, and the great value of the excellent State supervision of the different insurance departments, all of which in appropriate degree contribute thereto.—Isaac Miller Hamilton.

POLICY ILLUSTRATIONS.

Their Use a Practice of Doubtful Value.

(From The Pacific Mutual News.)

A practice of long standing in selling life insurance has been to give the prospective buyer an illustration of the policy, on a specially prepared blank, setting forth in the main the premium charge, non-forfeiture values and settlement options. This practice is not as common as it used to be, partly because of the opposition of insurance departments to estimated results and partly because of the passing of deferred dividend insurance. It is, however, still much in vogue, and nearly all companies furnish their agents with illustration blanks. Our observation has brought us to the conclusion that the practice is more abuseful than useful.

The purpose of an illustration is to give the prospect, in figures, information about the policy the agent is trying to sell him. When the agent prepares an illustration and leaves it with a prospect without going over it carefully to explain it in detail, the chances are that the prospect will not understand it unless he be familiar with such matters, and that the average insurer is not. If the prospect has sufficient time to listen to an explanation of the prepared illustration, the agent, with a pencil and piece of scratch-paper, could give him all the information desired in a much simpler and more impressive way.

To leave an illustration with a prospect is often to leave for your competitor a weapon to use against you. A rival agent needs no special ability to puncture the most attractive illustration ever presented, and to show it up in an unfavorable light.

The illustration blank, moreover, gives the prospect too good a chance to put the agent off. "I have your figures, but have not had time to look them over yet." How often has such a remark fallen on the ears of an agent, and what can he do about it? His illustration has put him in a position where it is almost impossible for him to hasten matters and push the case to a conclusion.

We do not hesitate to say that the illustration blank in selling insurance is more often a hindrance than a help. But our chief objection to it is that the feature of the policy it usually makes most prominent is the one that should be kept most in the background—its non-forfeiture values. To dwell on these is to tempt the policyholder to lapse or borrow on his policy whenever his financial affairs begin to pinch him a little. Better would it be for many an insurer and for many an orphan and widow if the policyholder had never heard of such things as non-forfeiture values. We have said in these columns more than once that to dwell on the surrender values of a policy is to misplace the emphasis, and this is perhaps wherein the illustration blank offends most.

"HIGHFALUTING BOSH."

The simple truths of life are the ones which apparently impress us the least. To be recognized Truth must knock at the door of consciousness clothed in the scintillating garments of Epigram. That is the reason, perhaps, why we delve into complex systems of philosophy to the utter neglect of the feeble, homely principles, which embrace the sum total of knowledge of human heart and intellect in équilibre with the mundane relationship one with the other.

"Truth needs no color," said Shakespeare. Yet there are a certain percentage of men in the profession of Life Underwriting who fail to realize the importance of Truth, unless it is attractively garbed. Indeed, the plain little truths of social and business relationship must sometimes be administered in sugar-coated capsules.

Here is the paradox of this anomalous condition. Place before a man in its rugged and unadorned nakedness the old adage of "Honesty is the best policy." Generally there are but two responses; the first practically negative, with an answer to the effect that the subject does not apply to him; the other an attitude of offense. This attitude of offense at being told the truth is more common than we at first realize. It may be due to the fact that the admonition was sorely needed, and again, it may be only the natural peevishness of the man who considers it indicative of intellectual superiority to assume a mask of cynical indulgence at the temerity of any one suggesting that he adopt a principle so simple and so easily understood.

Therefore it becomes necessary at times to resort to various subterfuges in seeking to present the time-tried and time-tested tenets which underlie all legitimate business transactions. Facts must be disguised; nuggets of golden thought must be deeply buried; the obvious is too obvious and is not for us. With the casket of gems open before us, the pearl found in the oyster assumes a valuation beyond all reason. The wayfaring man, though a fool sometimes, imbibes his knowledge "straight," and we look with ill-concealed scorn upon his simplicity.

Mental assimilation with many of us is a matter of pathological import. Disdaining natural and healthy desire, we resort to false methods of stimulation, by means of which we stumble upon some new line of thought. After this effort comes a narcotic and we fall asleep and sometimes—too often—forget it.

"All this goody-goody stuff and highfaluting bosh in LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS makes me sick," said a life insurance agent to a friend of the editor. The sentiment of this disgruntled agent, though in

WHAT YOU WANT I HAVE—"OPPORTUNITY" WHAT I WANT YOU HAVE—"ABILITY"Let's combine the two—in other words*Work in the Wonderful West with Ward*For the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co.*WRITE H. H. WARD, MANAGER PACIFIC NORTHWEST*Title & Trust Building, Portland, Oregon*Hoge Building, Seattle, Washington elegant in verbiage, is typical of the attitude of a certain class of underwriters, which class fortunately is greatly in the minority. A continuous advocacy of a high standard of field ethics may be "highfaluting bosh," but we believe there are quite a few life underwriters who do not think so. We believe that nothing can take the place of absolute honesty; we believe in the adoption of the Golden Rule as a guide for field procedure; we believe in the elimination of all forms of misrepresentation, rebating and twisting; we believe in the all embracing and comprehensive object of the National Association, which is to advance the best interests of the cause of true Life Insurance. In these principles we believe, and these principles will guide the policy of the official organ of the National body. If, as a consequence in editorial comment, preachment or other matter we impress a few as being of the "Goody-Goody" type, we are entirely satisfied and accept a much abused term, and one sometimes applied in derision, as an express of the greatest compliment which could be paid to us.

It does not take long for one to learn that the Truth cannot be spoken unless there is always some one to take offense at it. It was Bishop Horne who said, "If any one will tell me how the Truth may be spoken without offending some, I will spare no labor to learn the art."

Sympathy is wasted when extended to the man who clamors for literature printed in blood on a sheet of guncotton.

The successful life underwriter is the steady man, the solid man, the hard working, conscientious man. Remember that "Genius is but the infinite capacity for hard work." Such a man reads intelligently, thinks deeply and acts effectively. His short cut to efficiency is found in the fact that he requires no argument to convince him of the virtues of clean business procedure, for he accepts the principles we advocate without question. But even such a man knows that in the heat of competition it is an easy matter to tell but half the Truth, and he knows also that half the Truth is a lie. Conscious of this he never resents an argument on the necessity of honesty, and he always welcomes the inspiration of a new message on the same subject. To him the "square deal," an old, old story, never grows stale.

In every great propaganda ultimate successful development has depended upon steadfast adherence to certain fundamental articles of faith. Constant reiteration of foundational principles in any movement is not only necessary for numerical increase, with the corresponding strength which numbers give, but organized society breeds its own toxins; even the elect need inspiration and admonishment.

The News serves not only as a bulletin of association meetings and as a mouth piece for the messages of its officers; its greatest field of usefulness lies in the inspirational and educational articles which it conveys to the members of the National Association. The good old fashioned virtues, for which there can be no possible substitute, underlie all matter which enters its columns. Candidly, of this we are not ashamed.

Hervey S. Dale Seriously Ill.

Hervey S. Dale, general agent of the Union Mutual at Chicago, a prominent member of the Chicago association and treasurer of the National Association, is reported seriously ill at Pass Christian, Miss. Just a few days ago Mr. Dale suffered a cerebral hemorrhage and lost the power of speech. His right side was completely paralyzed. Possessed of a strong constitution, hopes of his recovery are being entertained. That his condition is more or less serious, however, is indicated by the fact that his two brothers are now with him.

Preliminary Plans for the Cincinnati Convention.

Plans for the Cincinnati convention are beginning to take definite form. It is announced that the Cincinnati association will favor September 15, 16 and 17 as the days upon which to hold the convention. However, this is a matter which will not be definitely decided until the mid-year meeting of the Executive Committee of the National Association on the 21st of this month.

The General Convention Committee of the Cincinnati association is composed of the following members: A. F. Sommer, Metropolitan; John L. Shuff, Union Central; Millard W. Mack, Northwestern Mutual; W. A. R. Bruehl, Home Life; E. R. Ferguson, Mutual Life; J. W. Kirgan, Fidelity Mutual, and C. J. Stern, Union Central. Mr. Shuff is chairman of the finance committee, and is enthusiastic over the subscriptions which have already been received. He is particularly happy over the action of the Chamber of Commerce, which has agreed to augment the fund for the entertainment of those who attend the convention.

Cincinnati has two large hotels, the Sinton and the Gibson House, and there are, of course, a number of smaller hotels. The Sinton and the Gibson are each capable of taking care of 250 guests. Immediately after the time for the convention has been definitely determined at the mid-year meeting of the National Executive Committee, the Cincinnati underwriters will begin to arrange for sub-committees and other necessary details.

The vast majority of insurance buyers are interested in two things only—the protection afforded and the price to be paid. “What can I get, and what will it cost me?” These are the two points in which every insurer is most interested, and they need no elaborate illustration blank to make them plain.

The general agent or manager who discourages his agents in the use of illustration blanks for their prospects does them a good service. The most valuable use such blanks can be put to is for the agent to fill one out for the prospect in hand, study it carefully and then familiarize himself with the policy; then throw it into the waste-basket. To go before the prospect thus empty-handed but with the mind well furnished and enthusiastic over the splendid features of the policy, will be vastly more effective in securing results than the most attractive and carefully prepared illustration thrust into his hands with the hope that it will do the work. The latter is the lazy man's method and deserves to fail.

The enthusiastic and convincing agent, convincing because he is enthusiastic, compels and impresses by his presentation of his policy with pencil and by word of mouth, while the illustration blank is cold and lifeless, unable to secure attention, and is read with care and understanding in only exceptional cases. It is an easy matter to get away from the illustration blank, but it is a different proposition to elude the wide-awake, determined agent.

Little Things That Count.

I believe that one of the greatest influences for advancement a man can have—and he should cultivate it—is the ability to take quick advantage of the little things of life, the ordinary everyday occurrences that mean so much to the man who is watchful and alert and so little to the careless worker; occurrences that are capable of being turned to profit in life insurance as in no other business—chance conversations, unexpected meetings, hints dropped in conversation, an idea in the Bulletin, a thought from the morning papers, etc., etc. Successful writers, in other words, are those who have a genius for keeping their eyes and ears wide open, discovering opportunities in small things that to those less watchful mean nothing. And taking advantage of these opportunities, agents of calibre rise to positions of prominence and standing at the bank.—Thomas A. Buckner.

Loan Provisions—To Be or Not to Be.

An enterprising song writer of New York, but a few months ago, endeavored to distill from Broadway the real spirit of the times. His range of vision being bounded on the north by tango teas, on the south by cabaret performances, on the east by dansants, and on the west by ragtime, the task proved easy. The "Zeitgeist," as Elbert Hubbard would say, was epitomized and embellished with the usual devices of harmony, and we were told that "syncopation ruled the nation." So as to permit of no possible doubt as to the truth of the statement, we were advised that.

"Even good old country preachers
Are engaging tango teachers.
You can't get away from it;
You can't get away from it at all."

Syncopation does rule the nations—when the people of the nations relax and seek to forget the more serious affairs of life. But if we are to believe what we see, half of what we hear, and a little of that which we read, we cannot escape the conviction that Extravagance is king of the realm, while Mr. Syncopation is but a distant and frivolous relative. If, as has been said, the practice of borrowing on life insurance policies is inhuman and sinister, evidently "the mania for living beyond one's means has reached a point where it no longer balks at the threat of a beggaring death."

Important Statistics.

What are the facts? Just these. At the end of business in 1911 there was $456,000,000 policy loans and premium notes outstanding to policyholders. The average in loan and premium notes for the United States that year was 15.98 per cent. of the reserves. Robert Lynn Cox, general counsel and manager of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, said in a report on the subject:

Much more than half a billion of life insurance protection will be lost to widows, orphans and other beneficiaries as a result of the policy loans now outstanding. It is declared that experience shows that a large proportion of the insurance protection withdrawn by policy loans is never replaced, the money being invested elsewhere or wasted.

The subject has been discussed in every insurance journal published in the United States. The daily newspapers, too, have found the matter worthy of editorial comment. Perhaps it will be found interesting to consider the matter in the light of developments since the Association of Life Insurance Presidents issued its report in January. A review of professional and lay opinions will follow, our comments necessarily being brief.

President Jesse R. Clark of the Union Central, in his annual report, gave a succinct statement of the situation from the viewpoint of a company official. He said:

Policy stipulations authorized by statute as to the amount, the term and the interest rate of the loan are inflexible, operating irrespective of the general money market, and thus benefiting the borrowing policyholder instead of all the policyholders, in the following ways: In times of panic the sale of investments at sacrifice is necessitated in order to meet the demands of the borrowing policyholder, which cannot be delayed by contract more than a fixed time. In times of panic the policy stipulation of the only rate of interest that can be charged, prevents possibility of realizing a higher rate warranted by the current conditions. Thus is experienced a loss to all of the policyholders on both principal and interest. In times of easy money the policyholder with a collateral of fixed cash value need not and does not pay the rate of interest stipulated in his policy when he can borrow at a very much lower rate at bank. Thus is experienced a loss to the policyholder by reason of this unemployed capital. There is no obligations to repay the loan as long as principal with interest accrued does not exceed the cash policy; hence, even if the rate of interest were flexible it would be dangerous to loan at as low a rate, because the policyholder could keep the loan at that rate until the policy became due by death or maturity.

A simple remedy would be to divest the policy contract of all stipulations as to interest rate and foreclosure, and to make the loan just as any collateral loan is made in the financial world.

The Massachusetts Bill.

In accordance with a resolution adopted by the Insurance Commissioners at their annual meeting, Commissioner Hardison, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill in the Legislature of his State which read, in part, as follows:

No Policy of life or endowment insurance shall be issued or delivered in this commonwealth unless it contains a provision that the company may at its option defer the granting of any loan other than to pay premiums on policies in the company and may at its option defer the granting of any surrender value for a period which shall be stated in said provision and shall be not less than 60 days from the date of the application for such loan or surrender value; provided, that a domestic insurance company may issue in other States policies which contain provisions relating to the deferring of loans or granting surrender values required by the laws of such States, and a foreign insurance company may issue in this commonwealth any policy containing provisions required by the laws of its own State respecting the deferring of loans or granting of surrender values.

Commissioner Button of Virginia also advocated a similar statute, but both measures were defeated.

The daily newspapers have seen nothing good in the borrowing habit—certainly the statistics justifying the term of "habit." While they have not touched the technicalities involved, which was as it should be, the consensus of editorial expression has been strenuously opposed to the loan provisions in policies. Taking a somewhat radical stand, the New York Evening Journal offered these suggestions:

* * * There ought to be in each State some "Statesmen" wise enough to see that to compel insurance companies to encourage policyholders running into debt is unwise, criminal, dishonest to the children and the wife. Pending such action, we advise the wives of insured men to find out just what value there is to the protection which insurance is supposed to give them, and just how much, if anything, the husband has borrowed on his policy—for every dollar thus borrowed will be taken away from the family in case of death. The whole system is preposterous—encouraging men to save money for the protection of their families—and then by law compelling the insurance companies to tempt such men to run into debt.

Several papers, among them the Newark Evening News, thought the situation as being similar to taking money from the baby's bank. Said the Newark Evening News:

Newark Evening News.

Many loans—not all—obtained on the security of a life insurance policy may be likened to taking money from the baby's bank and not replacing it, for not more than eight percent. of all the money borrowed in this manner is ever repaid except through the policy lapsing or maturing. * * * There is material for surprise when one considers the extent to which the practice has gone, as shown at the meeting of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents in New York. These loans are reported to have increased from one-third to one per cent. of the reserve funds of American companies in 1888 to 36 per cent. in 1912 and to nearly 18 per cent. this year. At the close of last year, out of $3,500,000,000 of reserve funds of all companies it is stated that $550,000,000 had been loaned to policyholders. * * * If the companies did not permit such loans—and it unlikely they could all be brought to consider such a plan—there would be other and more expensive ways to the borrower to accomplish the same thing. * * * The problem, it is evident, is not easy of solution.

The extravagant tendencies of the times is the root of the evil, according to the Boston News Bureau. Its views are expressed in these words:

Boston News Bureau.

Instead of paying as we go, it is so much easier, if so much less wise, to borrow from posterity. Extravagance often goes hand in hand with improvidence; and this is an extravagant age in an extravagant country. That it is a rich country is perhaps some temptation, but no excuse. Various evidences, collective and individual, attest this inclination to mortgage the future. What the indignant reflections of our posterity, who much shoulder the penalty in either or both added tax or depleted inheritance, does not disturb our blithe and free-handed unconcern. * * * An impressive sign of the times is the indictment drawn by the insurance fraternity—both companies and commissioners—against the startling increase in the tendency for the insured to borrow from their own heirs by dipping into the principal of the protection fund for their families. * * * It is the unbroken increase in this borrowing propensity that is the disconcerting element. * * * In part we may blame the cost of high living for personal and municipal necessities; but also in part there is indisputably reflected the cost of high living, individual or collective. Not the necessities, but the luxuries, mainly account for our temptation and our propensity to mortgage our defenseless heirs.

In the face of a veritable avalanche of opposition to the loan privilege it is a courageous man who dares to utter a defense. However, a good word has occasionally been said, both in the Field and in the Home Office. President William McClench of the Massachusetts Mutual, at the 28th annual banquet of the New York association, claimed that loans were frequently of great value and had served many times to protect homes and to ward off bankruptcy of firms. He declared that no solicitor should be criticized because of emphasizing the value of the loan provision.

That it is a problem of no small proportions must be admitted. There are many good arguments for the loan privilege which have not as yet made the acquaintance of printer's ink. In this connection we present excerpts from an article by Floyd Elmer De Groat, general agent of the Mutual Benefit of Boston. Mr. De Groat has a remarkably facile pen, which, combined with a keen analytical mind, produces an exposition well worthy of study, even though you may feel inclined to stay with the apparent majority and disagree with him.

Arguments in Favor of Loans.

Perhaps no phase of our business has received greater attention, both in public print and in our own journalism, than the subject of policy loans. Loans, loans seem to obsess the heads of many companies. We are told, and it is true, that the demand for loans is steadily increasing. Is there wonder that companies whose contracts did not formerly contain the privilege of loans should experience a new sensation when this feature, forced upon them by law, became operative? Is it not significant that so far as insurance journalism and the public press are concerned most all of the direful predictions and calamitous warnings seem to emanate from those companies whose newer policies only carry the right of annual loan? Or from companies which have unwittingly invited abnormal obligation to loan by use of a rather low, or let us call it, competitive interest rate per cent.? Or from those companies which can no longer use a form of loan agreement by the terms of which large forfeitures or reserves were formerly permissible?

There is no falser theory propounded than the plea, now far too often advanced by certain irresponsible brokers, twisters et al, and far too often grasped, yes, swallowed by the policy owner himself, namely, the theory that he is borrowing his own money. He does not borrow his own money. He cannot possibly borrow his own money. He borrows that sum which, with interest thereon, he has deposited as an inevitable and inviolable pledge that he will pay his normal, rightful share for the carrying of his own risk. And he should be permitted to borrow this sum exactly as he should be permitted to withdraw the sum outright. But in the latter case he is surrendering a right, for he is relieving the remaining members of all further obligation as to his own risk. Here then is the vast and important difference between loan and cash value, in dollars and cents the same or temporarily the same: the loan with its interest requirement, a living pledge to his fellow members and his beneficiary; the cash value a relinquishment, a sale, of all obligation of his fellow members toward himself and beneficiary.

Withdrawal of Cash Values.

I wonder that the companies so vociferously decrying the loan practice do not likewise call attention to the inordinate withdrawals of cash value, and to the inordinate lapse which they must experience if their own declaration be true, namely, that loans not only are rarely paid back, but lead inevitably to surrender and lapse. I do not know what percentage of life insurance loans may be paid back, but I have a notion that such ratio would, in the best companies, compare very favorably with the mortgages paid off from homes.

Let us make all reasonable efforts to deter our clients from making unnecessary loans, exactly as we would deter our younger brother from unwisely mortgaging his home, but let us not condemn the privilege, or the practice of the privilege, in either case.

But all is not lost that is loaned. Every policy loan does not mean money foolishly spent or wasted. Few would take policy loans at either five or six per cent. to buy Government bonds yielding four per cent. But some men are so positioned that they can and do, in their own stable business, make all borrowed money, temporarily at least, earn more than the interest per cent. paid therefor; they keep the principal intact too. Were it not so, modern business would contract one-half. A certain percentage of these same business men are carrying mortgages on their homes for similar reasons, and upon their stocks and bonds.

Again, money borrowers are the beneficiaries of their own policies—perhaps generally true of endowments. Take the case of a bachelor or a widower with no dependents. Does it matter much, is there economic loss if he borrows in the ninth year of a 10-year endowment, or the 18th year of a 20-year endowment? Why declare that money withdrawn in the ninth year is wasted, but in the 10th it is not? We would advise, to be sure, that he mature the contract and use our post-maturity option. Yet there is nothing economically unsound in the exercise of the loan privilege. Let us consider further that a very high percentage of the loans in this and other companies are premium loans, and premium loans, especially, may spell beneficiary gain, very likely also economic gain. Every $50 of necessary premium loan means approximately $1,000 of protection continued for some beneficiary.

All Good Things Capable of Abuse.

A life or an endowment policy is a peculiar form of property. It differs from everything else. It is the only article of value, which, ipso facto, multiplies by the fact of death. If this point is never lost to view, rare will be the person of conscience who would urge a cash value in lieu of a loan, or urge a surrender to get rid of a loan.

The loan privilege is not an evil, neither is it an unmixed blessing. All good things are capable of abuse, and the loan privilege is far more a blessing than a curse. It is a source of honest and honorable credit, purely as credit it cannot be abused. And do you know anything in the land more abused than credit? It is abused in and by our great mercantile establishments; it is abused at our best banks and trust companies; but purely as such, credit is not abused at the office of any life insurance company in America. I confess to disagree with these carping critics. They render unwittingly a damage to the life insurance cause by their unrelenting advertisement that what is loaned is lost. They seem to point out an inherent weakness in our system where only strength exists. In my judgment, such talk lends itself readily to an argument for cash surrender. That such talk is a deterrent to the uninsured and the unbeliever no one can deny. The modern policy loan is a mathematical right, an economic necessity; moreover, it happens to be a legal requirement. Human nature alone is responsible for the extent of the practice, its use or its abuse.

The Part-Time Man in Chicago.

Into the limelight once again springs the part-time man. He now occupies the center of the stage in Chicago. There are opinions to the right of him, opinions to the left of him; they volley and thunder. He is greeted with applause, cat-calls, laughter, tears, praise, curses.

It all came about by an effort of E. A. Ferguson, the new president of the Chicago association, to secure from the members of that body a consensus of opinion as to how the matter of part-timeism should be dealt with. It is apparent that there is a great difference of opinion among the members of that association, but disagreement on that problem is by no means confined to Chicago; the same condition obtains in every local body affiliated with the National Association. The Western Underwriter in its April 2 number gives two opposing views, one from Darby A. Day, manager of the Mutual of New York and a member of the Committee on Taxation of the National Association, and the other from Hobart & Oates, Chicago general agents of the Northwestern Mutual. Mr. Day expresses himself as follows:

From 33½ to 50 per cent. of the life insurance placed in Chicago is written by or through men who devote part of their time to other lines of endeavor than merely life insurance.

Nearly All Part-Time Men.

Nearly all life insurance men, including general agents, are part-time men in some business other than life insurance. They place fire and casualty insurance, dabble in real estate and various sorts of business.

It is conservative to say that 50 per cent. of the general agents of the country were formerly part-time men.

Agencies whose territories extend beyond the limits of the city of Chicago cannot cultivate their outside field without the use of part-time men.

Most companies would object to their general agents cutting off a volume of good business that now comes through part-time men.

No company has thus far successfully eliminated part-time men, and the general agents of Chicago would be no more successful than the companies have been.

The general agents by coercing their men into the association and by refusing good business might get in trouble with the anti-trust laws.

The broker is as great an evil as the part-time man, though neither would be an evil if they did not abuse their prerogatives.

The part-time man who devotes all of his life insurance time to one company is perfectly legitimate.

Hobart & Oates consider the subject to considerable length. They are fully convinced that life underwriting will never be on a professional basis unless the part-time man is eliminated. The strength of their convictions is indicated by the declaration that the present system is "so pernicious and so obviously unbusinesslike as to seem almost incredible." Their opinion is this:

You have asked for a statement of our position with reference to the appointment of so-called part-time agents in the life insurance business and we are pleased to comply with your request as follows:

The Chicago agency of the Northwestern Mutual Life went on a full time basis Jan. 1, 1909. After over five years' experience on this basis we are more than ever convinced that this is the only effective means of correcting the abuses of life insurance in metropolitan fields. In taking this position, the Chicago agency of the Northwestern followed the example of the New York agency, where for a number of years, under the leadership of John I. D. Bristol, the tremendous advantages of agency protection were completely demonstrated.

Source of Abuses.

Even granting that part-time men may have been employed to advantage in the development of country business and granting also that many successful life insurance men may have been brought into the business through a part-time relation to it, there is no question whatever, as far as city business is concerned, that the employment of part-time men is the means by which most of the abuses in the business are fostered. The evils far outweigh any possible benefits. Take rebating for example: Why deplore the evils of rebating when a system is maintained, through the appointment of sub-agents, by which rebating is made easy and safe! In saying this we are not unmindful that there are some part-time men who are men of honor and who do not rebate, but every experienced life insurance man knows that the appointment of sub-agents to cover two or three policies, including one on the life of the sub-agent, is simply providing the machinery for rebating with the minimum danger of apprehension under the law.

Under present conditions a man can go into many important life insurance offices with the statement that he has a policy to place and can get a commission on the same. Most general agents justify themselves in accepting this business on the ground that if they don't somebody else will. After placing one or two risks this man will be allowed a commission on a policy for himself. In most cases no further business is placed. In other cases where the part-time man is not interested in securing insurance on his own life, he is interested in holding a profitable line of fire or liability insurance for a client, and, as an inducement to hold the line, he secures a life policy for this client and cuts the price on the life policy. All the requirements as to license and contract are, of course, complied with, but the man has no intention and never did have of entering the insurance business as a full-time man. He is simply taking away, as a little "velvet," all or part of the commissions that have been earned by some reputable life insurance man who is giving his whole time to the business. Quite as likely it may be a whole-time agent of the very company whose general agent accepts the business. What if the part-time man does agree not to rebate and place all his life business in that company? He is not interested in raising the standards of the life insurance business; he knows the company keeps no check on him and he is indifferent to the remote penalty of cancellation of his contract. The part-time system as it exists in the large cities to-day illustrates the absurdity of complaining about the difficulty of getting 100 cents on the dollar for life insurance, when the companies practically invite anyone to get a commission for placing a risk, and there is no means of knowing whether the commission is returned to the insured.

How It Works Out.

Consider the position of the average whole-time agent of any company. He represents his company loyally, is building up a clientele, and places more or less insurance among his friends. He charges them the full price and they pay it cheerfully because of his assurance that no one is getting it for less. Suppose he is soliciting the manager of a corporation for a good sized policy and is making good progress. He suddenly discovers that he has competition on the case, not necessarily from the agent of another company; it may be from another agent of his own company. This latter agent comes in because it has been tipped off to him by the manager's secretary, who is a sub-agent and who will get part of the commission if the manager takes the insurance of the second man. This is one of the commonest experiences and it requires little intelligence to guess what the secretary does with the commission on his manager's business. This very thing can happen and does happen in most companies to-day, and the effect on the honest, whole-time agent is only too well known. He does not tell the truth when he assures his friends that everyone pays the full price, for he knows there is a way provided by his own company whereby other men get their insurance for less than the full tariff rates.

Paying Commission to Everyone.

The abuses will continue, however, as long as general agents or managers are so anxious for volume that they will continue to pay a commission to anyone just "to get the business," and as long as they are unable or unwilling to give the time and put up the money involved in the work of securing and training new agents who are willing to go into the life insurance business on a whole-time basis. The abuses will continue until there is developed among life insurance solicitors such a sense of pride in their business that they will demand the protection offered the legitimate salesman in nearly every other line of business. When the whole-time agents, who are giving their lives to this business, who have qualified themselves to give expert advice, fully realize how much they are being injured by the practice of paying a commission to anyone, regardless of his knowledge of life insurance or his personal character, they will wake up and insist on that kind of protection which guarantees life insurance commissions for life insurance men only.

It is our conviction that if all life insurance offices in Chicago refused to employ part-time men, it would result at once in an increase of respect on the part of the buying public for the business of life insurance. It would enable the honest agent to get the compensation for his work to which he is entitled, and it would make it possible to drive the crook out of the business. It would increase the self-respect and the income of the whole-time agent who, under the present system, is being victimized, and it would attract to the business large numbers of men of character and ability who are driven away by a system so pernicious and so obviously unbusiness-like as to seem almost incredible.

Death of Samuel E. Barber.

Samuel E. Barber, State agent for the Aetna Life in Kansas, former president of the Topeka association, and during the years of 1912-1913 one of the vice-presidents of the National Association, died recently in Topeka. Mr. Barber was born in Mississippi in 1868, and after engaging in several occupations took up life insurance and became superintendent of the St. Louis agency of the Aetna. In 1904 he was made State manager for the company in Kansas.

Round Table Talk at Chicago.

Prominent general agents and managers for life insurance companies in Chicago met recently and decided to organize a Round Table Club to meet for luncheon once a month. The proceedings of the club will be informal and it will not be embarrassed by a constitution or by-laws.

Jules Girardin, manager of the Phoenix Mutual, presided at the first meeting, and the question taken up was as to whether the part time man should be eliminated from the business and whether or not an attempt should be made to continue to confine life insurance soliciting to members of the association. It developed that the majority of those present seemed to favor the retention of legitimate part time men. However, all who expressed an opinion agreed that the part time man who merely acts as a go-between should be driven out of the business.

As to whether or not an attempt should be made to prevent the placing of insurance in Chicago by any one who was not a member of the Chicago association, there was a great difference of opinion and no definite understanding resulted from the discussion of this particular phase of the business.

Kentucky Law Against Rebating.

Senate Bill No. 345 amending Article IV of Section 656 of the Kentucky statutes relating to life insurance was enacted into a law by the Kentucky Legislature and was recently signed by the Governor. This amendment, for which Commissioner Mat Clay stood sponsor, provided that the commissioner is to have complete authority to examine the books of any company, agent or policyholder or any other person when evidence suggesting rebating is uncovered. The law prior to the amendment was ambiguous and the Louisville association now is confident that it has an effective weapon to carry on its campaign against rebating.

What the Local Associations Are Doing

Akron

The Akron association held its March meeting at the Portage Hotel, about thirty-five members being present. David L. Caulkins, of Cleveland, spoke on "Margin—the Secret of Power."

Capital District.

The regular monthly meeting of the Capital District association was held at Albany, N. Y., on the 1st inst. Six new members were installed and there was a discussion on the subject of "Taxation."

Chattanooga.

At the April meeting of the Chattanooga association the question of taxation was taken up and the president authorized to appoint a committee to look after the matter. The guest of honor was Attorney-General M. N. Whitaker. C. H. Crimm, of the Germania Life, read a paper on "Taxation," in which he claimed that the insurance companies were taxed heavier than any other kind of business.

Chicago.

The April meeting of the Chicago association will be held on the 23d inst. at the Auditorium Hotel. There will be no formal speakers, but it is planned to have a general discussion as to the questions submitted by President Ferguson regarding the character of meetings which the members prefer, and also in connection with the future policies of the association in the regulation and discipline of life insurance agents in Chicago. The meeting will be exclusively devoted to business and every member will have a chance to make known his views regarding the future activities of the association. From these opinions President Ferguson intends to outline the policies of the local body for the coming year.

Cincinnati.

Judge George H. Noyes, general counsel of the Northwestern Mutual, was the guest of honor of the Cincinnati association at a meeting held on March 31. The meeting was held at 5 o'clock at the Business Men's Club and was followed by a dinner. Later in the evening all those present went to the University of Cincinnati in a special car to hear Judge Noyes deliver his address on "The Legal Phases of Life Insurance."

The subject Judge Noyes discussed before the association was "Wills and Their Relation to Life Insurance." It was his opinion that some of the claims now being made for policies on the monthly income basis were too broad, and he urged agents to be conservative in their statements. The income policy, said he, had plenty of advantageous points without parading in borrowed plumage.

Cleveland.

A. D. Hatfield, of the Penn Mutual, presided as toastmaster at a meeting of the Cleveland association, held at the Hotel Statler, on the evening of March 27. It was a semi-social affair with a banquet, many ladies being present. Charles F. Coffin, vice-president and general counsel of the State Life of Indianapolis, was the principal speaker. He touched upon a number of subjects of interest to his audience and in speaking of Federal supervision said in part:

"There are many difficulties in the way of securing Federal supervision. To have Federal supervision of life insurance companies an amendment to the Constitution of the United States declaring life insurance to be interstate commerce would be necessary. It is asking a good deal to have the Constitution amended on behalf of one line of business. I urge every life insurance man to give such time and thought as he can to betterment of State supervision."

Columbus.

The regular monthly meeting of the Columbus association was held at the Athletic Club on the evening of March 13. This meeting was set aside as policyholders' night and several of the leading business and professional men of the city were guests of honor and gave their viewpoint of life insurance. B. L. Lewis, of the entertainment committee, was chairman of the meeting and among those who spoke were Hon. George F. Burba, secretary to the Governor; Samuel G. McMeen, president of the Columbus Railway, Light and Power Co.; John H. Fergus, secretary of the Park Savings and Loan Co.; John Deshler, capitalist; A. I. Vorhees, former Insurance Commissioner; C. C. Miller, Deputy State School Commissioner, and Herbert M. Myers, attorney.

Resolutions of sympathy were adopted upon the death of Edward C. Paine, who for 20 years was connected with the Mutual Life of New York.

Connecticut

At the Union League Club in New Haven on March 22 the Connecticut association held its first meeting under the new administration. Insurance Commissioner Burton Mansfield was present as a guest of honor, and in the course of his remarks claimed that there were too many soliciting agents in the State of Connecticut. H. S. Waldron, a prominent member of the Western Massachusetts association and first president of the New England Congress of Life Underwriters' Associations, extended an invitation to the Connecticut underwriters to attend the first field day of the congress, which will be held in Boston April 27 at the Parker House.

President Lee C. Robens then put the matter up to the members present, and 20 indicated their intentions of attending the congress. It was resolved to have engrossed a resolution on the recent sudden death of James L. Coyle, who was one of the staunch members of the association. Charles E. Stoeckder was appointed chairman of the Committee on Education and Conservation, and James B. Moody, Jr., chairman of the Taxation Committee.

Dayton

Several life insurance agents at Dayton have become interested in an attempt to re-organize the underwriters' association in that city. Some time ago the association was forced to disband, but there is every indication that the movement will soon be resuscitated.

Delaware

The regular meeting of the Delaware association was held on March 30 at Hanna's Restaurant. The Executive Committee reported the election of W. T. Batchelder, agency manager of the Equitable; A. A. Wilmot, special agent, Provident Life & Trust; George W. Collins, assistant superintendent, Prudential; Walter G. Keen, assistant superintendent, Prudential; and Bernard F. Harkins, sub-agent of the Prudential.

Treasurer McDonagh submitted his report, showing that all the members had paid their dues except two. The secretary reported that he had written to President Harter, of Delaware College, asking permission to deliver a course of lectures on life insurance before the students of that institution. President Harter replied, in part, as follows: "We would be delighted to have a course of lectures before our students on the subject of life insurance, and I shall place your letter before the committee of the faculty that has charge of such matters."

President Price reported progress on the effort to secure permission to have a lecture on life insurance delivered at the high school. On motion of Charles B. Palmer, Aubrey Vandever was extended an invitation to address the association at its next meeting on the subject "How I Secure Applications."

Detroit.

At the Elliott-Taylor-Woolfenden Cafe, on the evening of the 6th inst., the Detroit association held its regular monthly meeting. President M. H. Zacharias was unavoidably absent and Vice-President Jesse L. Scott presided as chairman. Frank T. Lodge, a local attorney, delivered an address on "The Spirit of Good Fellowship." Speeches were made by C. W. Hatton, field superintendent of the Equitable Life of Iowa, on "Benefits of Life Insurance"; E. H. Fuller, of the Northwestern Mutual, on "Unfair Competition," and W. Rice-Wray, on "Ethics of Insurance." Derby A. Day was scheduled to deliver an address on "Taxation," but that gentleman had been detained on account of sickness.

District of Columbia.

The March meeting of the District of Columbia association was in honor of J. E. Kreh, Jr., district agent of the John Hancock at Washington. Mr. Kreh was one of the charter members of the local body, and in recognition of his ability he has been appointed general agent of the State of Iowa.

Fort Dodge

The fact that Fort Dodge is assuming a place of importance as a life insurance center is evidenced by the fact that agents located in that city produced in 1913 approximately $4,000,000 of new business. The Fort Dodge association is largely responsible for this information, which was brought to light at its regular monthly meeting held on the 4th inst. M. V. Keith delivered an address on "The By-Products of Life Insurance," after which there was a general discussion.

Georgia.

The Georgia association held a meeting on March 10 at the Ansley Hotel in Atlanta. Twelve new members were admitted and it is expected that the association will soon have a membership of over 100 active members.

The Insurance Department of Georgia has ruled that to accept premium notes without legal interest constitutes rebating and is therefore in violation of the anti-rebate law of the State. Action was taken upon this matter and a resolution was adopted instructing the general agents and managers to call the subject to the attention of special and local agents throughout the State.

There was a discussion on the question of brokerage to non-licensed agents and it was the consensus of opinion that no remuneration should be given to anyone for influencing business who was not a licensed agent of some company authorized to do business in Georgia.

Grand Rapids.

A particularly interesting and profitable dinner meeting was enjoyed at the Pantlind by the Grand Rapids association at its March meeting. M. H. Zacharias, president of the Detroit association, was the principal speaker. It was hoped that Governor Ferris would be able to attend later in the evening, after the conclusion of his address before the United Commercial Travelers at the Association of Commerce, but he was unable to make both meetings, and the insurance men adjourned without the anticipated pleasure.

Mr. Zacharias spoke informally, giving the conclusions of many years' experience in life underwriting, and making some recommendations which were received with favor.

Informal remarks were made by a number of other members. A. H. Bennett acted as toastmaster. Several readings were given by Clarence S. Weil and William J. Fenton sang solos, being accompanied by Ferdinand Warner.

Harrisburg.

The new officers of the Harrisburg association were installed at a meeting held on the 6th inst. The officers are: Richard Oliver, New York Life, president; W. H. Cordry, Massachusetts Mutual, vice-president; Albert A. Wert, New England Mutual, secretary-treasurer. The committee on taxation is composed of John T. Shirley, Equitable of New York; J. R. Morrison, Phoenix Mutual, and W. E. Wambaugh, Mutual Life.

Arrangements are being made for a banquet to be held on the 30th ult., to which agents from outlying towns will be invited with a view to extending the benefits of the association to districts which have no local bodies. National Vice-President Edward A. Woods will deliver an address on this occasion, and it is possible that National President Clark will also be present.

Indiana.

The regular March meeting of the Indiana association was held at the Denison Hotel in Indianapolis. The new officers were installed and President-elect George R. Wilson delivered an inaugural address, the subject of which was "Opportunities." Mr. Wilson's address was so enthusiastically received that it will be printed in pamphlet form. Retiring President Gary S. Brewster was presented with an engrossed testimonial of appreciation and esteem. Among the guests of honor were H. L. Arnold, actuary of the Indiana Insurance Department, and Mr. Fraleigh, actuary of the Illinois Insurance Department.

Northern Indiana.

The Northern Indiana association recently elected the following executive committee: Chairman, E. A. Crane, S. K. King, Delmar C. Fitch, Walter J. Wilson and Charles W. Orr.

Iowa.

George W. Hughes, president of the Iowa association, presided as toastmaster at a meeting of that association held on the evening of the 4th inst. The principal address was made by Rev. Charles W. Medbury, pastor of the University Church of Christ and a well-known Chautauqua speaker.

Kalamazoo.

H. Wibert Spence, of Detroit, a prominent member of the national association, assisted in organizing the Kalamazoo Life Underwriters' Association on the evening of March 18, in the Commercial Club rooms. The meeting, which proved to be one of the most enthusiastic of any held by insurance men for some time, resulted in the election of these Kalamazoo agents as officers:

President, T. Y. Sebring; first vice-president, J. E. Broyles; second vice-president, A. C. Gilbert, and secretary-treasurer, F. W. Hough. The executive committee is composed of Chairman John D. Goldsmith, C. D. McGibney and Morris Bolhower.

The association has for its object the advancing of the best interests of life insurance and the bringing of those engaged in the business into a more intimate and friendly relationship.

All representatives, examiners, officers or employees of regular legal reserve life insurance companies, and members of the insurance press are eligible to membership.

The regular meetings of the association will be held in the Commercial Club rooms on the second Monday of each month save during the months of July, August and September. The following underwriters signed the constitution and by-laws. The charter membership was held open until April 1.

S. S. Evans, Morris Bolhower, A. C. Gilbert, George H. Broesamle, W. H. Spaulding, T. Y. Sebring, J. D. Goldsmith, Herbert S. Waldo, C. D. McGibney, E. A. Reese, F. W. Hough and J. E. Broyles.

Kansas City

A meeting of the Kansas City association was held at the Kansas City Athletic Club on March 20, with President M. F. Belisle presiding. Three new members were admitted, and W. B. Henderson, of the National Life of Vermont, delivered an address on "Bankruptcy's Bearing on Life Insurance."

Mr. Belisle will serve as chairman of a committee which will endeavor to secure a lower annual occupation license for life companies. The accident rate is $25 a year, while that for life and fire companies is $100. The life underwriters do not understand why they should pay more than the accident agents. Mr. Belisle will be assisted by F. A. Griffith, George A. Lock and Ira B. Mapes. Among others who spoke at the meeting were T. L. Hanson, assistant to the second vice-president of the Germania Life of New York, and H. M. Woolen, president of the American Central.

Knoxville.

Life insurance taxation was the principal theme of a meeting of the Knoxville association, held on March 25. Reau E. Folk, former Insurance Commissioner of Tennessee, and at present general agent in that State for the Equitable Life of

New York, delivered an instructive address on that subject. Mr. Folk said in part:

"Under the constitution of this State property for religious and educational purposes is exempt from taxation, the theory being that this property constitutes benefits to society and civilization, which justified every encouragement from the Government.

"The institution of life insurance is for the good of society. It is the greatest agency in combating poverty and distress and causes the community and State from being at the expense of caring for the indigent. It would therefore be sound public policy to deal with insurance companies with extreme leniency in taxation. This Government is the only Government that imposes a tax."

Other interesting addresses were made by Col. L. D. Tyson, Dean James D. Hoskins, of the University of Tennessee; Hon. T. Asbury Wright, and J. H. Anderson, of the Anderson Dulin-Varnell Co.

The following resolution on taxation was adopted:

The institution of life insurance bears a sacred and delicate relation to civilization and to our social and economic life, in that it is the most effective agency in combating poverty and distress.

We believe that such a business deserves every encouragement at the hands of the Government, and especially, that the burdensome premium privilege tax it now pays, should be entirely eliminated, thus giving policyholders in reserve companies the same exemptions as are now properly given to fraternal insurance.

We recognize that the burden of taxation now imposed on life insurance is too heavy, and that it is out of proportion to the privilege tax laid upon other interests, and, to quote the language of Hon. Reau E. Folk, our honored guest to-day, "should be entirely wiped off the statute books."

Resolved that this association extend a vote of thanks to Reau E. Folk for his forceful talk upon this vital subject, that we endorse all he said, and that we earnestly request of him a synopsis for publication.

Lansing

The Lansing association held a meeting early last month at the Chamber of Commerce. Dr. H. S. Bartlett discussed venereal diseases as related to life insurance. J. Earl Brown, of the legal department of the Modern Woodmen of America and also connected officially with a Michigan legal reserve company, argued that there should be no conflict between fraternal and old line insurance. He claimed that the fraternal companies had educated the public to feel the need of insurance and that when assessment rates were put on an adequate basis they could then furnish safe insurance.

H. Wibirt Spence, who was instrumental in organizing the Kalamazoo association, attended a meeting of the association on the 23d of last month. He urged the local body to become affiliated with the national association, and the members were so impressed with Mr. Spence's arguments that it is quite likely that action along these lines will be taken in the near future.

Lincoln

The Lincoln association has taken on a new lease of life and its members will make an earnest effort to increase its membership. At the March meeting Insurance Commissioner L. G. Brian spoke on the subject of "The New Insurance Code of Nebraska." Mr. Brian made a particular point of his intention to eradicate bad practises in insurance and to license only reputable men. The following new members were admitted: Joseph Goldstein, Carl A. Stein, T. F. Horn, Wray A. Lindly, N. H. Gardner, E. E. Hammond, R. B. Porter, A. B. Cogdill and Carl L. Allen.

Los Angeles

The Los Angeles association held an enthusiastic meeting last month at the Press Club. The guests of honor were Judge W. Rhodes Hervey, F. A. Stearns, manager of the Pacific Mutual in San Francisco; Hubert H. Ward, manager of the Pacific Mutual at Portland, and W. D. Mead, representing the same company at Seattle. I. J. Muma was appointed chairman of the Committee on Education and Conservation, and several new members were admitted. James L. Collins was appointed to provide amusement at future meetings.

Judge Hervey's subject was "The Conservation of Trust Funds." He discussed the subject from the standpoint of life insurance and from the standpoint of trust companies. Mr. Stearns spoke briefly and touched upon the necessity of life insurance men keeping in good physical condition. Hubert H. Ward gave a rousing talk on institutional advertising, and William D. Mead followed by giving his views on the advisability of advertising in local newspapers.

Louisville

Winslow Russell, superintendent of agents of the Phoenix Mutual, was scheduled to be the principal speaker at the March meeting of the Louisville association. Mr. Russell was unavoidably detained, but will deliver his address on "Efficiency" at some future meeting of the organization. It was determined to hold a banquet in the near future to which business men will be invited to hear addresses by Jesse R. Clark, president of the Union Central; A. A. Welch, vice-president of the Phoenix Mutual, and Mr. Russell. Mr. Rosseau, who represents the Union Central at Louisville, will have charge of the program and the date will be announced later.

Louisiana.

The March meeting of the Louisiana association was held at the residence of W. J. Hannen, of the Mutual Life. Announcement was made that Tulane University had agreed to permit three lectures on the subject of life insurance during the remainder of the present session. Eugene J. McGivney delivered an address on "The Attitude of the State and Courts on the Business of Life Insurance." Other features of the meeting were the creation of a non-resident class of membership and arrangements for the publication of educational articles in a daily paper. The executive committee reported that arrangements had been made with the Daily States for a life insurance department to be published once a week.

Lynchburg

National President Ernest J. Clark was the guest of honor of the Lynchburg association at a meeting held on the evening of March 22. Mr. Clark delivered a stirring address, in which he pointed out that life underwriters have to deal with matters of more serious import than any other body of men except ministers of the gospel. The national president maintained that an insurance man must be a counselor as well as a salesman. He condemned loans on policies and suggested a legislation committee be appointed.

John Victor spoke of insurance from a banker's standpoint and claimed that a man's life insurance was the measure of his credit. Rev. Dr. James B. Dunn said that life insurance was a source of great comfort and protection to the man of small means. T. B. Ryland spoke briefly along the same lines.

Maine

Griffin M. Lovelace, superintendent of agencies of the Connecticut Mutual, was the guest of honor of the Maine association at its annual meeting. Mr. Lovelace delivered an address on "The Professional Aspect of the Practise of Life Insurance." The following officers were elected: President, Ernest E. Decker; vice-president, C. B. Shoemaker; secretary, Sylvan B. Phillips; treasurer, J. Putnam Stevens; executive committee: Thomas E. McDonald, Freeman M. Grant and C. A. LaCroix.

Insurance Commissioner J. W. Blunt, and Stewart Anderson, editor of the literary department of the Massachusetts Mutual, were guests of honor at a meeting of the Maine association, held in the afternoon of the 4th inst., at the Fal-mouth Hotel in Portland. Other speakers were Hon. Morrill N. Drew and Halbert P. Gardner.

Central Massachusetts.

At the Hotel Bancroft in Worcester, on the evening of March 26, the Central Massachusetts association held its annual banquet. The gathering was most successful and enthusiastic, and reflected much credit upon the banquet committee composed of President E. A. Robertson, Eli Bouchard and Otis D. Arnold.

Mr. Robertson presided as toastmaster, and in the course of his remarks, expressed regret at the absence of President Wright of the State Mutual, who was down upon the program as one of the principal speakers. Mr. Wright was unavoidably detained. The president also called the attention of the members to the New England Congress of Life Underwriters, which is to be held in Boston April 27.

Louis I. Dublin, statistician of the Metropolitan Life, was first formal speaker. Mr. Dublin's address was more or less confined to a consideration of life insurance in dealing with community problems. He gave particular attention to the State and other systems of insurance as operated in other countries, particularly Germany.

Griffin M. Lovelace, superintendent of agencies of the Connecticut Mutual, was the next speaker, and the subject of his address was "The Professional Aspect of the Practice of Life Insurance." Mr. Lovelace said in part:

"It is my purpose to outline the leading features which, in my opinion, give the work of certain life insurance men something of the character of a profession. It is not necessary to remind anyone that there is a distinct difference between a business and a so-called profession. Aside from the special education involved in training for the professions, we know that a profession requires certain qualifications, a certain natural fitness or aptitude for the work to be done, together with a natural inclination to such work, and in its highest sense, a conviction that one can render service of a high order. We know that ordinarily the choice of an occupation is largely a matter of chance and of earning a living. The chief consideration would unquestionably be, in most cases, the opportunity to make money. On the other hand, there can be no doubt, I believe, but that the average young man who considers entering a profession is largely actuated by other motives. He is actuated by the feeling that he is by temperament, inclination and mental bias better qualified to do well the things which would be entrusted to his care as a member of a certain profession than to perform the duties of another occupation.

"It seems to me, ethically speaking, entirely right for a man to take up the selling of life insurance for the same reasons which would prompt him to undertake to sell shoes or hardware—simply because he believes that life insurance offers him the best opportunity available for profit and advancement; for the public, including our agency novitiates, do not realize the inherent professional qualities characterizing life insurance work, as they do in the long recognized professions. We would not, however, entertain a very good opinion of the man who, after reasonable experience as an agent, is not actuated, in a considerable degree, by higher motives in inducing men to insure and in assisting them to select contracts and forms of settlement which best safeguard their interests.

"As the conscientious agent's knowledge of life insurance and of his obligations to clients is enlarged, he will abandon what we may call the strictly commercial view of the business for the professional one."

John F. Murray, New England superintendent of agents of the Metropolitan, amused his audience with several good stories, and Rev. Allen K. Frost, pastor of the First Baptist Church, delivered a five-minute sermon, the text of which was "Stick to Your Work Until You Get Through With It."

Minneapolis.

The regular meeting of the Minneapolis association was held at the West Hotel on March 28. Mr. Mitchell, of the Mitchell Advertising Agency, appeared in behalf of Warren M. Horner, who was present at the meeting, but was compelled to leave before the banquet was finished. Mr. Mitchell has been assisting in preparing the advertising to be used in the institutional advertising campaign of the National Association, and he made a thorough explanation of what had been accomplished up to that time. Mr. Mitchell gave an outline of where the committee proposed having these articles published and explained that different articles had been prepared to reach different classes of people. Several new members were admitted.

Minnesota.

The Minnesota association held its regular meeting on the 6th inst at Magee's Hotel in St. Paul, the principal speaker being Grant Van Sant, of the Van Sant Investment Co. Mr. Van Sant discussed "Farm Mortgages and Life Insurance." He said in part:

"There are a few places where life insurance touches the same things that do farm mortgages. The element of protection, which is a feature of the life insurance business, is also applied in the farm mortgage business. The insurance company protects dependents of the insured; farm mortgages also protect dependents, both as to income and safety of investments. It is my belief that farm mortgages to-day prove the best investments and a desirable investment for the insurance companies. Insurance companies who invest their reserves in farm mortgages have a better standing with the public in general, and the farmers especially, than companies who invest their surplus earnings in stocks and bonds. It is the experience of some of the insurance companies that they have been forced into taking farm mortgages, especially where the largest volume of their business came from farming districts."

At the conclusion of Mr. Van Sant's speech, W. Horace Locher moved that Senator J. D. Denegre, Jerome W. Wheeler, president of the Capital Trust Company, and Grant Van Sant be elected honorary members of the association. The motion was unanimously carried.

George F. Harrison then introduced G. M. Davis, who is national organizer of the National Highway Association. Mr. Davis gave a summary of the work that is being done in good roads and improvements, and touched upon the increased value of farm lands.

Montana.

The newly organized Montana association met recently at Missoula and elected the following officers: I. M. Robertson, president; W. I. Frasse, vice-president; S. W. Hoover, secretary; executive committee, E. E. Harriott, John Pierce, Guthbert Peat, W. I. Frazer and H. K. Rouzer.

Nashville.

At the April meeting of the Nashville association a committee composed of President W. A. Alexander, N. A. Crockett, Reau E. Folk and Lee L. Loventhal was appointed to prepare resolutions on the question of taxation and to forward such document to the officers of the National Association. Numerically the association is making rapid increase, and since the annual dues have been cut in half 19 new members have been taken in.

Nebraska

At the March luncheon of the Nebraska association, Charles C. Rosewater, business manager of the "Omaha Bee," gave an address, setting forth the close relationship of advertising and teaching. It was his conviction that all life insurance advertising should be directed toward teaching the public the usefulness and necessity of it as well as calling attention to the particular company doing the advertising.

New Orleans.

In the course of his first lecture to Tulane University classes, Wilson Williams, general agent in New Orleans for the New England Mutual Life, traced the history of United States life insurance from its small beginning in 1739 to its present immense proportions. He declared that the combined assets of all companies, which have doubled every ten years, now largely exceed the total gold, silver and paper money in the United States.

"As the most scientific system of co-operation known to man, life insurance," he said, "stands to-day as the greatest achievement of civilization. It has gained public respect by demonstrating its needs, and justified its merit to confidence by material benefits afforded."

Mr. Williams' lecture was to the economics and sociological classes, Dr. M. A. Aldrich, professor. It was the beginning of a series that will have for its faculty members of the Louisiana association. Tulane adopted the progressive course followed by 263 out of 588 colleges and universities in this country.

New York.

There were no members of the W. C. T. U. present at the March meeting of the New York association, and the Anti-Saloon League was likewise unrepresented. Yet "demonium" was handled roughly! Indeed, at the conclusion of the meeting those present were convinced that alcohol was a most insidious enemy to individual efficiency and longevity. This impression was not produced by a dramatic appeal of a fanatic reformer, but came as the direct result of the cold analysis of the statistics submitted by Dr. Oscar H. Rogers, chief medical director of the New York Life, and Actuary Robert Hunter of the same company. Dr. Rogers and Actuary Hunter based their addresses upon the recent Medico-Actuarial Mortality Investigation, directed by the Actuarial Society of America and by the Association of Life Insurance Medical Directors.

The meeting was held at 8 o'clock in the evening of March 4, at the Hotel Astor, with an unusually large attendance. Lawrence Priddy, chairman of the executive committee, reported the election of several new members, and that progress was being made in prosecuting several cases of rebating.

This was the first meeting under the present administration and in every respect it proved to be a success. President Julian S. Myrick outlined plans for the three succeeding monthly meetings. The April meeting will be held on the 1st and will be devoted to a discussion of life insurance taxation. National Vice-President Edward A. Woods will be the principal speaker. At the May meeting four representative agents will discuss topics assigned to them, which will all relate to the production of business. The legal side of life insurance will be the subject of the June meeting and the program will take into consideration the effect of bankruptcy laws on life insurance, also the corporation and income tax.

Cards were distributed seeking information from the members as to their individual preference in holding the regular meetings. By an overwhelming majority it was decided to hold the April, May and June meetings at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The facts brought out by Mr. Hunter in discussing medical selection and the treatment of persons in hazardous occupations proved conclusively that the experience of the companies had not been favorable with alcohol risks. The mortality experience had been noticeably unfavorable even where the individual drank alcohol but seldom. In the investigation which started in 1909 the experience of 43 legal reserve companies had been carefully analyzed and the results tabulated. He referred to comparative tests, all of which proved beyond the question of doubt that alcohol affects both the muscular and mental powers. In that division having to do with saloonkeepers and bartenders it was found that where the proprietor did not tend bar the extra mortality was 35 per cent. Where saloonkeepers did tend bar the mortality was 80 per cent. extra. Experience showed that where 300 men in ordinary occupations die 200 extra die in the liquor trade. In the case of distillers, however, there was a ratio less than normal. The statistics which were quoted gave a 22 per cent. extra mortality in the wholesale liquor trade among proprietors and 50 per cent. extra mortality in the case of restaurant proprietors who have bars attached to their business.

Mr. Hunter mentioned the experience of the New England Mutual, which showed a 60 per cent. loss ratio among total abstainers, 85 per cent. among temperate and 125 per cent.

ratio for moderate drinkers. The speaker took up the results shown with regard to women insured and gave the following percentages of mortality experience: Spinster, 80 per cent.; married women with husbands as beneficiaries, 1.26 per cent.; married women with other beneficiaries, 1.15 per cent.; widows and divorced, 1.05 per cent. In referring to self-selection as compensating for company selection or agent selection, Mr. Hunter said that under endowment policies the mortality was 85 per cent. of the expected, while under limited payment and ordinary policies the experience was 100 to 120 per cent. of expected.

As to the result of the investigation, Mr. Hunter claimed that agents could not expect more liberality in the acceptance of risks as a whole, although there were several occupations which were receiving more liberal treatment than hitherto, but the result would be noticeable by means of fairer and more just conclusions.

Dr. Rogers, who followed Mr. Hunter, not only corroborated his predecessor on the question of alcohol, but presented many interesting facts in a new light. In explaining the relationship of the medical director to company and agent, he said that it was the duty of the medical director to accept all risks which could be accepted without danger to the company. One important question taken up by Dr. Rogers was the question of the influence of build on mortality. Experience proved that overweight after 30 or 35 years of age might be regarded as an impairment, and that it made little difference where the extra weight appeared, whether in the arms, shoulders or abdomen. Young people under weight have been found to be not as good risks as young people overweight, and the reverse of this experience has been found among the people in advanced years. The investigation proved that the experience with syphilis had been most unfavorable, 100 actual deaths occurring where 53 were expected. Dr. Rogers also discussed blood pressure tests and dwelt to a considerable extent upon the diseases caused by high blood pressure.

Slips had been distributed among the members, and those who desired to do so wrote upon them questions in relation to the two addresses. Actuary Hunter and Dr. Rogers then answered the questions.

North Dakota

The North Dakota association at its March meeting adopted a resolution endorsing the attitude of Insurance Commissioner Taylor, who is making an effort to secure, through legislation, the services of a State actuary. Wilbur Lawrence spoke upon "Organization and Its Benefits," and George H. Olmsted of Grand Forks, discussed "Insurance Legislation." There was an informal discussion on both addresses.

Oregon.

With a splendid attendance the Oregon association held its March meeting at the Commercial Club at Portland, and an interesting paper on "Twentieth Century Life Insurance in the United States" was read by Secretary Joseph H. Gray. One of the features of the program was an effort on the part of several members to insure the lives of their competitors. W. S. Raker, of the Northwestern Mutual, sold H. G. Colton, manager for the Massachusetts Mutual, a $5,000 ordinary life policy, and Horace Mecklem, of the New England Mutual, succeeded in inducing E. W. Amesbury, of the Northwestern Mutual, to take out a $10,000 20-year endowment.

Members of the association were enthusiastic over their success in instituting in the Portland Oregonian a department of educational articles on life insurance, which makes its appearance once a week.

Northwestern Insurance News states that the Oregon association has not taken favorable action on the proposed second annual Northwest Insurance Congress. "This action was taken," says Northwestern Insurance News, "after the matter was passed upon adversely by the Oregon executive committee, referring it back to the association, who in turn put it up to the general managers for their decision. These gentlemen, who were apparently overcome with the idea of an enormous amount of labor involved, to say nothing of a few paltry dollars of expenditure, once and for all disposed of the subject without batting an eye. Child's play would be a dignified comparison of the action and arguments of the members of the Oregon association who have tried to nip the good work of the convention in the bud. The moral obligation to carry out the program of this convention with a determined effort to make it a success seems to have been lost sight of entirely by the Oregon Association of Life Underwriters, otherwise it would have expressed itself earlier in the game when the matter was first brought to its attention at the meeting following the Seattle Congress. At that time—last September, a report was made by those members who attended the Congress and no objection was raised; nothing but enthusiasm for the project being in evidence. Surely Tacoma and British Columbia were entitled to a prompt, decisive answer at least not later than November, 1913. Now it will be next to impossible for either of these associations to undertake the idea with any assurance of success due to the short period existing before the Congress is to convene. If any city can step in now and do as well as Seattle did or make any kind of a showing it will certainly not add any laurels to the Oregon association, that did not care to toil nor did not care to spin, and did not care to work because it did not think it could win."

Philadelphia.

The April meeting of the Philadelphia association was held at the Adelphia Hotel. Letters of regret were read by Vice-president Eugene O. Mosier, who acted as toastmaster, from Ernest J. Clark, president of the national association, and Neil D. Sills, ex-president of the national association.

Richard Y. Cook, president of the Guarantee Trust and Safe Deposit Co., was on the program for the subject, "Life Insurance, Its Relationship to Banking and General Business."

"I fear I will say but little along the lines that have been laid for me by your chairman. What I have to say will be social, rather than financial," said Mr. Cook. "It is wiser and better to take counsel of the moment. There is one thing that always happens and that is death. It is your mission to rob death of its greatest fear and draw into your sure protection those who are widowed and orphaned."

"I would suggest to you that you never mistake activity for business. Do you not think our political rulers, in attempting to continue our Government, are mistaking activity for business when it is proposed that the State shall go into the insurance business? From long experience and the history of nations, I am a firm believer in development of the individual."

Puget Sound.

The Puget Sound association has made plans for a campaign of education and publicity not only in Seattle, but throughout the State of Washington, to inform the public as to the injustice of the taxation of life insurance funds. Guy Withers, manager for the Equitable of New York, is chairman of the committee which will have this work in hand.

Richmond.

With a large attendance, the Richmond association held its regular monthly meeting on the 6th inst. at the Business Men's Club. President E. M. Crutchfield presided. The regular business session was preceded with luncheon. Thirteen new members were admitted and four applications were received too late for action at the meeting. Mr. Crutchfield appointed the following Committee on Taxation: Samuel B. Love, Neil D. Sills, T. A. Cary, W. B. Cary, W. B. Freeman and A. O. Swink.

Mr. Crutchfield called the attention of the members to the Cincinnati Convention Club, expressing the hope that the convention would be attended by a large delegation from Richmond. He then called upon the secretary to read the totals of business in the State of Virginia of the five home companies and thirty-four foreign companies. Dr. Paul W. Howle, who is examiner for four companies doing business in the city, was introduced and talked in an interesting fashion on the relation of the examiner to the company and to the field force. He described the instruments used in making examinations and the causes of high blood pressure.

Rochester

The Rochester association held its regular March meeting on the 18th of that month, and the following new members were admitted: Wm. E. Crossett, National Life of Vermont; Geo. S. Bush, Northwestern; Isaac Rosenbaum, Mutual Life, and W. H. Beers, Jr., Mutual Benefit.

The challenge of the Syracuse association to a membership contest from March 31 to May 31, inclusive, was accepted, and a special committee of fifteen was appointed by the president to take charge of the matter.

The proposed plan of institutional advertising of the National association was thoroughly discussed and a committee of three was appointed to confer with the general agents and managers, who in turn will take the matter up with their agents, in an endeavor to ascertain the consensus of opinion of the matter. The ethics of the business in competition and the question of when competition should cease was then the subject of an informal discussion.

St. Louis.

At the March meeting of the St. Louis association T. W. Van, of the Koken Barber Supply Co., delivered an excellent address on "Salesmanship." Gustavus Tuckerman discussed "St. Louis and the Pageant," and W. H. Bloomer, special agent of the Northwestern Mutual, had as his subject "The New Era of Agricultural Development and Rural Betterment and Its Influence on Life Insurance."

Salina.

The regular monthly meeting of the Salina association was held at Abilene on the 2d inst., and several new members were admitted. The members of the association were the guests of W. C. Wyandt, general agent of the Union Central of Cincinnati. In the afternoon the guests were given an automobile ride and at 6 o'clock a banquet was served in the Masonic Temple by the ladies of the Western Star.

Springfield, Mo.

The annual meeting of the Springfield association was held recently. Fifteen members were present. Officers were elected as follows: President, Marion A. Nelson, agency manager for the Equitable Life of New York; vice-president, John M. Stewart, district agent for the Northwestern Mutual; secretary, Melville E. Dark, district manager for the Illinois Life, and treasurer, Jake Marx, district manager for the John Hancock. William A. Banks was named as a member of the executive committee. The retiring officers are: President, Wm. A. Banks; vice-president, M. E. Dark; secretary, M. J. Thomas, and treasurer, Frank P. McAfee.

The standing committee for the year will be appointed by the new president at the next regular monthly meeting. Five new members were balloted on and accepted. A vote of thanks was given the retiring officers for their services during the past year.

Plans were outlined for continuing the work of the association in its efforts to raise the standard of life insurance as a profession, all applicants for membership agreeing to pursue only ethical methods in soliciting business; to abolish "twisting," misrepresenting and other methods used by unscrupulous agents; and to promote a general good fellowship among the agents doing business on the square.

Syracuse

Captain I. H. Wise, general secretary of the Syracuse Chamber of Commerce, was the principal speaker at the March meeting of the Syracuse association. Several new members were admitted.

Tacoma.

At the Olympus Hotel in Tacoma, the Tacoma association held a meeting on March 21. There was a series of five-minute talks on "How to Get More Business," after which the meeting was turned over to the representatives of the Bankers Life of Des Moines, who entertained with a musical program.

Topeka.

The Topeka association held its monthly meeting on March 16. H. O. Garvey and C. A. Moore were the principal speakers. Charles DeForest, Massachusetts Mutual, Lawrence, Kan., was admitted to membership.

Utica.

The Utica association held its April meeting at the Frantz Inn. Routine business was transacted and arrangements were made for a meeting which will probably be held on the 28th inst. Prominent out-of-town speakers have been invited. It is also decided to supply men representing this association as speakers on life insurance topics before church clubs or similar organizations in neighboring towns.

Utah.

A meeting of the Utah association was held in the Gold Room of the Commercial Club on the 4th inst., and developed into a "ladies' night." President C. D. Kipp called upon Mrs. Done, wife of Insurance Commissioner Willard Done.

Mrs. Done proved equal to the occasion and related a number of amusing anecdotes in connection with her husband's work. Mrs. Done's speech was such a success that Mr. Kipp then called upon Mrs. Elizabeth H. Coray, of the Salt Lake staff of the Equitable of New York. Mrs. Coray was not to be outdone by Mrs. Done and give in an entertaining manner a humorous story of certain prospects that she had written. Rev. Peter A. Simpkin, of the Phillips Congregational Church, spoke briefly and advocated the payment of all death claims to widows on the instalment basis. Other talks were made by Mrs. Kipp, wife of the president; Miss Geransd, of the Continental Life, and State Treasurer O. V. Allen of Idaho. A committee on taxation was appointed, as follows: D. H. Livingston, New York Life, chairman; George D. Alder, National Life of Vermont; N. G. Stringham, Continental Life; Fred C. Hathaway, Mutual Life, and E. A. Ricker, Equitable Life.

West Virginia.

C. V. Taylor, general agent of the Northwestern Mutual, was the principal speaker at the March meeting of the West Virginia association. The subject of Mr. Taylor's address was "The Outlook for the Insurance Man." The meeting was held at Wheeling on the 21st of March.

Western Kentucky

The newly organized Western Kentucky association met at Dixon on March 23. Those present were as follows: A. W. Toy, Metropolitan Life; C. H. Nichols, Equitable Life; M. W. Bartlett, Metropolitan; C. Examiners E. N. Rice, A. O. Williams and W. L. Wallace were made honorary members of the local body and agreed to lend their assistance in stamping out "flyer" insurance. The next meeting of this association will be held at Dixon on May 1.

Life Association News

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS

Entered as second class matter, Feb. 4, 1907, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

Vol. 8.

NEW YORK, MAY, 1914.

No. 9.

To the Officers and Members of Local Associations:

The officers of the National body are very anxious that all Local Associations devote their June meetings to discussion of, and raising funds for, the Education and Conservation movement in accordance with circular letters sent out and information published elsewhere in this issue.

The Education and Conservation movement is no longer a theory. It is, in very fact, a part of the bone and sinew of our splendid organization.

We have in reality reduced many, undoubtedly the largest, of the problems confronting the agent in Life Insurance to a practical educational and advertising basis.

That this campaign carries with it that which will actually accomplish a tremendous service to the policyholders should not be overlooked at this time.

The National Association of Life Underwriters has the reputation of doing things.

We are now committed to this great work, the best solution of which calls for our broadest consideration and most liberal co-operation in both effort and financial support.

Please, therefore, make your June meeting a red-letter day for yourselves, the National body and in behalf of humanity.

ERNEST J. CLARK,

President National Association of Life Underwriters.

WARREN M. HORNER,

Chairman Committee on Education and Conservation.

LOCAL ASSOCIATIONS REQUESTED TO DEVOTE JUNE MEETINGS TO EDUCATION AND CONSERVATION MOVEMENT.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE, THROUGH CHAIRMAN WARREN M. HORNER, SENDS OUT LITERATURE EXPLAINING DETAILS IN CONNECTION WITH MODIFIED PLANS APPROVED BY EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. Horner's Latest Utterance on the Subject as Delivered Before Several Local Associations in the Middle West. Review of the Propaganda from its Inception Shows Great Progress Made.

With regard to the announcement of the Committee on Education and Conservation, appearing on the front page of this number, following will be found the text of two circular letters recently sent out by Warren M. Horner, chairman of the committee. The letters in question require little comment; they are practically self-explanatory. While intended for members of the National Executive Committee and subscribers to the fund, they clearly elucidate the present plans of the committee as approved at the recent meeting of the latter committee, and members of local associations now have an opportunity to acquaint themselves with the present status of the matter before the subject is discussed at the June meetings of their respective associations.

The first letter reads:

Minneapolis, Minn., April 30, 1914.

To Members of the Executive Committee,

National Association of Life Underwriters:

"A preliminary circular was sent you announcing the mailing of the prospectus to aid in raising funds for the education and conservation movement, in accordance with the action of the Executive Committee in adopting the report of the Education and Conservation Committee as endorsed by the Executive Council in the recent mid-year meeting of the Executive Committee in New York.

President Clark has directed (he used the word "direct") that each member of the Executive Committee assume the responsibility for prompt and favorable action in regard to the important work of the national body.

Local Campaigns.

"So many associations desired to promote their own local campaigns, or at least have the disposition of the major portion of the funds collected, that the present plan of each association retaining 75 per cent. of the funds raised and sending the remaining 25 per cent. to the National Association was decided upon as the most practical, workable plan.

"This is especially true because the uniformity, or institutional idea, of the campaign is retained by the National Association having the institutional advertisements or human interest stories written in accordance with the prospectus as sent you, copies of these advertisements to be sent in duplicate to each association.

"This present action is entirely in accord with recommendations of the committee over a year ago in its circular letter to the companies as to the method of blanketing the country, with the exception that the local papers and mediums selected, and the publication of educational matter other than the institutional advertisements is left to the local associations.

"It should be clearly understood by the local associations that the 25 per cent. going to the national body is in no sense a gratuitous offering. An enormous saving to the local associations is effected by one preparation of copy being utilized by eighty-six associations. The further advantage to each association is gained by this copy in its completed form being the result of the work of the best copy-writer obtainable, edited and re-edited by the officers and Executive Council of the National Association, including the members of the committee. Never forgetting the fact that we in this manner avoid the scattering effect of the conglomerate, and harness the real latent forces in the life insurance by uniformity.

"Furthermore, the idea should be driven home that the National Association does not use the 25 per cent. turned over to it just in preparing copy. Some of this money is absolutely essential in the educational work of the committee which, through the able support and leadership of President Clark, has gone forward with such growing effectiveness, the present year.

"In addition, it is the purpose to publish the institutional advertisements in national mediums, including probably the Saturday Evening Post, one review publication and one general publication, together with a woman's magazine, or magazines, and a national farm publication, as funds will permit and the Executive Council later decides.

"The committee feels, and its judgment is endorsed by President Clark and the Executive Council, that too much stress cannot be laid upon the educational value of this entire campaign in maintaining uniformity throughout the country."

Note Mr. Clark's own statement in a letter to W. D. Mead, president of the Puget Sound association, in response to an inquiry and referring to the recent action in New York:

The Final Basis.

"We boiled the proposition down to a final basis, and it was unanimously approved by the Council and Executive Committee. The kernel of it was the establishing of the most perfect co-operation possible between the National Education and Conservation Committee and the local committees in the respective associations; 75 per cent. of the subscriptions from local associations, to be used by the associations in a local application of the institutional advertising program, and 25 per cent. to be contributed for the use of the national committee in employing specialists for the writing of institutional advertising copy, and furnishing the same to all local associations for such use as dictated by their peculiar needs and requirements, and for such additional advertising in national mediums as the funds in question may permit."

"We are not, however, attempting to control action of local associations with respect to the expenditure of the 75 per cent. in any campaign they may inaugurate, or matter they may publish as more directly bearing upon their local conditions."

"We do now know that in the preparation of the institutional copy which will be sent them as outlined in the prospectus, and in the purely educational work of the National Association, and in publication in national mediums of institutional copy, the local associations and each individual member thereof will obtain value received over and over again for the 25 per cent. turned over to the National Association.

"The committee finds in a number of instances that, notwithstanding the widespread comment which has been given out from the committee and in other quarters, a great many are unfamiliar with the real scope and purpose of the work. The suggestion is made that any members of local associations who desire additional information should write to Secretary Ensign for copies of LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS which have contained editorials, resolutions and addresses with respect to the work, or obtain a copy of Rough Notes of Nov. 27, 1913, which contains, in an illuminated issue, a full history of this movement, or to the chairman of this committee, in Minneapolis for printed pamphlets in relation to the work.

"This circular is addressed to the members of the executive committee because of the familiarity of those members who attended the meeting in New York with just what is proposed. This is no affront to either the presidents and secretaries of the local associations or members of the local education and conservation committees, who are also mailed copies, all of whom we hope, in fact know, will put their shoulders to the wheel and see that there is no further delay in this great work.

"The work of the education and conservation movement has now reached such a state of advancement that every agent, general and special, over the United States who refuses to give his mite is going to be in the unenviable position of obtaining something for nothing, and, in fact, a great deal for nothing. And if he does contribute he is going to get the most for his five, ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, fifty, one hundred or five hundred dollars that he ever received in his life as a business investment. This entirely aside from the enormous service to be rendered the insuring public and their dependents by this nation-wide campaign of education.

Basis of Contributions.

"The basis of contribution should be five cents (5c.) per thousand for each agent, general agent, manager or special agent. General agents should give on the basis of their entire production, because such duplication will not swell the fund to too great proportions. Salaried managers can give on the basis of personal production and get their men to come in and later obtain additional allowances direct from their companies for the National Association funds.

"We presume everyone understands that the trade-mark will accompany the advertisements as published locally or in national mediums and is to be used as a button or on cards and stationery, as may be deemed advisable by those contributing, to identify them with the movement. This method does not detract from the institutional or educative nature of the copy, but cannot help being of great value to any alert agent.

"Respectfully submitted,

"WARREN M. HORNER, Chairman,

"Education and Conservation Committee.

"Approved and action recommended.

"ERNEST J. CLARK, President,

"National Association of Life Underwriters."

The second letter is as follows:

"The enclosed circular letter to the members of the executive committee of the National Association of Life Underwriters in regard to the recent action of the executive committee in New York is self-explanatory.

Old Subscriptions Canceled.

"This action, as you will see, automatically cancels your subscription as directly payable to the National Association. But it is earnestly hoped and expected that you will reaffirm your pledge through your local association and immediately upon receipt of this communication get in touch with your executive committee member, who has in his possession the prospectus, which we know will interest you, and use your influence and co-operation—which we have appreciated so much—in obtaining general co-operation of your association members.

"Those who remitted cash will receive their money back from the National Association treasury just as soon as the funds are available, about which there will probably be some slight delay because of the lamentable death of Mr. Dale.

"The committee feels justified in requesting (and we know that is the desire and hope of everyone in attendance at the recent meeting in New York, almost to a man) that you individually give us your most earnest co-operation and support, even to the extent of visiting personally those in your locality, to bring about prompt and general support of the education and conservation movement at this time.

"We believe that the greater public trust and public understanding and resultant better service to policyholders and agents which will be engendered by this movement will produce results in enhancing the condition of one field of endeavor never before experienced in the history of human institutions.

The necessity of a country-wide campaign of institutional advertising is so apparent and the benefits which will accrue from it are so many, that in order to do full justice to the propaganda, we append the salient features of Mr. Horner's latest utterance. The excerpts are from an address he recently delivered before several of the Middle West associations.

"Rufus M. Potts, Superintendent of Insurance of the State of Illinois, is credited with this statement:

"It became a necessity for him to have insurance, next in importance to religion. He emphasized the special need of insurance education in the schools. The reason for the present imperfect insurance conditions was chiefly a lack of public knowledge of insurance fundamentals, and a consequent failure to appreciate its sphere and service."

"We will all agree, I think, with Mr. Potts, that next to religion and the air we breathe and the food we eat, life insurance is the most important thing in the world to-day.

"It is self-evident that insurance education in the schools and higher institutions of learning is a crying need. We know that he has stated a fact in declaring that imperfect insurance conditions are the result of the lack of public knowledge of insurance fundamentals and a due appreciation of its sphere and service.

A Fact; Not a Theory.

"Commissioner Potts stated a fact, not a theory. There is a lack of understanding of insurance fundamentals and there is a consequent failure to appreciate its sphere and service. Insurance education in the public schools will take care of the younger generation, but we are dealing with the adult population and not-school children, only as a future consideration.

"A careful reading of the resolution as adopted by the National Association at Memphis in 1912, and comment centering round that resolution, will disclose the fact that the education and conservation movement contemplates more than education in the schools and higher institutions. That it contemplates more than an institutional advertisement widely published over the country to educate the men and women who are chiefly concerned in the present day operations. That it contemplates the correction of the evil of loans on policies.

"It does now, and has from the start, contemplated the ideas of conservation of health, conservation of insurance written, conservation of the policy-holders' interests through helping to solve the problems of taxation and legislation, and standardization through better education and training of agents, and the inculcating of higher purposes throughout the entire field representation as embraced in the National Association of Life Underwriters.

Establishment of a Bureau.

"In holding tenaciously to the idea of an institutional campaign of education and conservation through the establishment of a bureau which shall have in charge the many things enumerated, including the publication of an institutional advertisement, and in the direction of other matters to grow out of the establishment of such a bureau, I am not just interested in a hobby, or endeavoring to place laurel wreaths about the brows of this committee.

"The contentions for a united campaign as a ground work are supported by the history of all world movements in Government and business, and by religion itself.

"In other words, the real advance of the Christian religion was the visualizing of a universal being in one God, and as might be added, intensified by the coming of Christ.

"The Government of the United States, in the centralized authority at Washington and in its blanket control of its whole people with the State and local government, is another good illustration. Without this centralized control, confusion would result.

"The life insurance business, which in reality means a human agency engaged in the conservation of human life, in this present day of enlightenment, and in its own advancement to enormous proportions, is absolutely misunderstood by 90 per cent. of the people, and only partially understood by the remaining 10 per cent.

"There is an unnatural and unnecessary aloofness toward the business and the agent by the public at large. It requires a superhuman effort to bring into the ranks of the business a young man of proper business and social caste—a college graduate or otherwise—who is at the threshold of his business life.

"The business, as exemplified by the companies and their field forces, has been notoriously conspicuous for its lack of any common plane of endeavor. The companies have never yet come together in any considerable numbers as working unitedly for any constructive measure.

Of Equal Interest to All.

"We believe that the things proposed by the education and conservation movement are of equal interest to all companies and all agents. That an enormous service will be rendered the policy-holders and the business by this unified campaign of enlightenment. That for a small fraction of what companies are spending in useless literature and in advertising and similar campaigns of their own, a hundred times more good can be accomplished. That it will make more profitable and efficacious company advertising, or local or individual campaigns.

"One company this year in publishing its annual statement, spent approximately $20,000.

"I submit the statement to any advertising expert for correction, that a double page ad in the Saturday Evening Post, costing $11,000, a human interest story about life insurance, would have done that company more good than that for which it paid $20,000. It would have served equally well all companies, and what is better, would have rendered an untold service to the insuring public.

"Much good has already accrued to the life insurance business as a result of the education and conservation movement in more intensified attention to education and in greater publicity through giving human interest matter to the press, and through some local campaigns, all of which serve a purpose, and some of which have been very successful.

"For the reasons stated, I would be glad to have those who desire to institute local campaigns abide the launching of the national institutional advertisement. In this way, you will not only have the assistance of the interest aroused and advantages gained by the national campaign, but the bureau of the National Association will greatly aid and help unify each local campaign; never, of course, interfering with the things in a local campaign, which must bear a local aspect.

Opposed to Names of Agents or Companies.

"I am unalterably opposed to any local or unified campaign where the names of companies or agents are used. Consult any advertising expert, whose judgment can be relied upon, and you will never do this.

"Have your national campaign and your local campaign, if you wish, but keep them both institutional, non-partisan and educative, and when you want to advertise your company or yourself, do it straight from the shoulder as a partisan proposition."

In view of the wide-spread interest in the education and conservation movement, we shall endeavor to give chronologically a brief review of the development of the germ idea. The necessity of a unified campaign upon the part of the entire insurance fraternity was not entirely new to Mr. Horner, as he had been enabled to rather accurately determine the state of the public mind in regard to reading insurance matter of human interest, through publishing in the Bellman, of Minneapolis, human interest advertisements to promote the advancement of his own agency. These advertisements were so prolific with actual results, that in an address before the Chicago association, on August 30, 1911, he made the following declaration:

There is grave necessity for companies to come together, and managers as well, in a spirit of compromise and get-together policy upon the question of ethics as applied to life insurance. I believe the National Association should, in fact, it is imperative that it does, construct a platform along these lines, and give wide publicity to its action in both the public and insurance press, as well as through a campaign of well conducted publicity upon the part of its members through advertisements, literature and personal touch with the laymen. There is grave responsibility upon the shoulders of the officers and agency members of our standard legal reserve companies in the demand for them to come together upon some common plane of understanding in the things mentioned and in the necessity for a unified idea on the question of control of life insurance and incorporation of new companies.

At the Chicago convention, which occurred two months later, he was convinced that notwithstanding the fine purposes of the National Association, it had one weak point standing out in bold relief, and that was an inherent weakness from the whole institution of legal reserve life insurance—the lack of any systematic and adequate campaign of educating the public. Therefore, it was largely through Mr. Horner's efforts that the convention adopted the following resolution, which resolution marks the point where the National Association began to realize the importance of a non-partisan advertising campaign.

Action at Chicago Convention.

RESOLVED, That the National Association of Life Underwriters endorse the movement for conservation of health, and all that makes for favorable life insurance publicity and larger social service from life insurance companies and their representative to policy-holders and the public at large; and that each member of the Life Underwriters' Association do all in his personal power to forward these movements.

From the Chicago convention on to the present day, the idea has been expanding. Indeed, in but a brief time it developed from its embryonic stage into a full-fledged propaganda with a definite purpose in view. Said Mr. Horner on June 18, 1912, in Philadelphia:

It is up to the National Association to take the initiative in starting a bureau (I believe it should be a part of that organization) for the proper and thorough dissemination of information and progressive ideas of life insurance to the people of this country. This movement should originate and be conducted by the agents who know the needs, but in co-operation with the companies who should supply the funds.

The bureau to be a publicity, advertising and conservation campaign merged in one organization.

A bureau of this character could and should embrace both the conservation of health and conservation of insurance written. The companies would obtain greater results at less outlay than by separate action.

And again in Pittsburgh on March 2 of the same year, he said, in part:

Public in Receptive Mood.

From personal talks and correspondence with publishers and editorial writers, I am satisfied that they, like the public, are in a receptive mood toward all matters in relation to life insurance.

It is undoubtedly true that their co-operation will not come entirely gratuitously. This does not mean that we need to buy editorial space, but it does mean that companies and managers of agencies must indulge in more advertising. My own view is that a reasonable amount of money can be spent in this direction which in actual and collateral results will be enormously beneficial to the business.

This is a subject which calls for unity of purpose and unity of action to bring about unity of accomplishment. It was at the Memphis convention in October, 1912, that the National Association adopted the following resolution: Whereas, The institution of life insurance, as conducted by our standard American companies, occupies a commanding position in comparison with all world movements in its economic and beneficent relation to humanity, and

Whereas, The comparative newness of the system and its rapid growth have prevented a proper understanding of the importance of the business both in its relation to the public and as a vocation, and

Whereas, The companies and managing agents deserve unusual credit for building a structure of such enduring qualities that plays so great a part in equalizing business conditions and in its amelioration of mankind, but higher standards can be reached in the employment of agents and in the methods used in field work, and

Whereas, The business calls for the highest type of manhood and salesmanship in field work, and

Whereas, There are agents in certain localities who indulge in practices which detract from the high ideals of life insurance, and

Whereas, The public is equally culpable with the irresponsible agent from a moral and legal standpoint in soliciting rebates as well as in not co-operating with these agents who are exercising integrity and efficiency in their endeavor to render better service, and

Whereas, There are unlimited opportunities for standardizing the business by adopting new and scientific methods, and

Whereas, The business of life insurance needs the service of, and offers untold opportunities for young men of high ethical standards and ability, and

Whereas, Business and corporation life insurance has become well established and the amount of life insurance written by the standard companies is only about 15 per cent of the amount that could be written, and

Whereas, This association has repeatedly reiterated its stand as unalterably opposed to rebates, twisting of policies and agents and given wide publicity to the fact that any agent is not worthy of confidence of the business public, nor ethically fit to be considered a representative life insurance agent who indulges in any of these practices or who preys in any way upon a competitor and does not secure business by self-inaugurated plans of work. Therefore, be it

RESOLVED, That the president of this association appoint a committee of five with power to confer with like committees of any other insurance bodies, to devise ways and means for greater publicity in life insurance, for some non-partisan campaign of advertising and conservation, and for a concerted movement to inaugurate a campaign of education through lectures or addresses and through general adoption of educational opportunities for the younger generation.

RESOLVED, That the adoption of this resolution carry with it the power to act on any plan approved by the executive council of this association whether in conjunction with such other bodies or an independent movement inaugurated by this association.

Definite Plans Evolved.

At a specially called meeting of the Executive Council of the National Association on November 9, 1912, the Committee on Education and Conservation reported to the effect that among other things "The committee has made definite plans to promote the campaign of non-partisan advertising and the establishment of life insurance educational facilities and for co-operation with similar committees for local associations and other insurance bodies."

Mr. Horner, as chairman of the committee, again addressed the Chicago association on November 21, 1912, and in February, 1913, a letter was sent out to the companies, which read in part as follows:

The committee believes from its investigation that the campaign proposed is advisable, because: (1) It will educate the public as to the benefits of life insurance; (2) it will give them valuable information in the matter of selection of policies; (3) it will cure to a large extent the unnatural and unnecessary aloofness upon the part of the public toward life insurance and the life insurance agent; (4) it will give the public valuable information in regard to taxation and insurance laws; (5) it will aid materially in the matters of (a) conservation of insurance written, and (b) in the conservation of health; (6) it will result in better service all along the line to the public, the companies, and the agents, and result in raising the standard of the whole agency system; (7) when this campaign is thoroughly launched the agents will find it twice as easy to sell insurance; (8) it will make dollars spent for partisan advertising bring far greater returns; and finally, (9) it will result in a permanent bureau of great and lasting benefit to the whole institution of legal reserve insurance, and (10) this bureau can become a part or adjunct of the president's association or a bureau separate from any other body.

We believe it is advisable to spend $100,000 in the year 1913. Five cents (5c) per thousand on the basis of the paid-for business written in the year 1912 will supply the desired amount.

The companies can easily save the small amount required from their present advertising and printing bills.

Word "Publicity" Discarded.

At the mid-year meeting of the Executive Committee of the National Association in April, 1913, the work of the Education and Conservation Committee was endorsed, and while it was further recommended that the word "publicity" be discarded, it was also decided to continue using the expression "non-partisan."

The Pacific Coast was by no means neglected, for Mr. Horner delivered an exhaustive address on the possibilities of the movement on June 2, 1913, before the Pacific Northwest Insurance Congress. That great progress had been made in the interim was made evident at the Atlantic City convention, held September 16, 17 and 18, 1913. In connection with definite plans for the raising of funds, the committee, through its chairman, Mr. Horner, made the following statements:

Is education in life insurance necessary? Is an intelligent use of printer's ink imperative? Do you want to combine all these things in a spirit of common brotherhood, or shall we continue to tear at each other's throats and let other world movements stand by and jeer at our ox-cart methods, and the people remain in ignorance of the true functions of sound life insurance?

What It Is Worth.

If you are an agent writing $200,000 a year, is it not worth $10 a year to you? If you are writing $300,000, is it not worth $15 a year to you, and if you are writing $400,000, is it not worth $20, and if you are writing $500,000, is it not worth $25? If you are the head of an agency organization and you are writing $1,000,000, is it not worth $50 a year to you, and if you are writing $2,000,000, is it not worth $100 a year, and if you are writing $5,000,000, is it not worth $250, and if you are writing $10,000,000, is it not worth $500 to you?

Much work has been done and lines well laid to carry this plan of general education in life insurance and institutional advertising in life insurance to a practical and successful fruition. You and other insurance men over the United States are given the opportunity to come together in a spirit of common brotherhood in rendering an enormous service to your fellowmen and, coincident with this service to humanity, you are given the opportunity to increase your incomes and raise the great profession in which you are engaged to its true position in the world's work.

At the meeting of the Executive Council on October 6, 1913, at Pittsburgh, a special report of the Committee on Education and Conservation was unanimously endorsed. The recommendations of this report were that the committee be authorized to proceed under the control of the Executive Council to have a textbook written, to be used in the campaign of education, and that it also be authorized to arrange definite programs in various institutions of learning. The fourth, fifth and sixth paragraphs of this report are too important to permit of a summary. They are therefore quoted:

4th. That both the matter of education and the publishing of an institutional advertisement involving a series of human interest articles of fact and interest to the people, together with the raising of funds for the same be conducted entirely for the present by the National Association of Life Underwriters, and that there be no scattering by local subsidiary campaigns other than in co-operation with the national body, other than such individual campaigns as may be deemed advisable by local associations as independent of and separate from the national campaign.

5th. The committee further recommended the early publication of four or six of the institutional advertisements, one of which is to be upon the subject of taxation at as early a date as is in keeping with due business procedure. This recommendation is made with great earnestness on the part of your committee because it believes that such action will properly visualize the efficacy of the whole proposition of the practical value to the people and the business of life insurance of publishing these human interest articles. Arrangements have been made to have these articles prepared without cost to this association. The committee is strongly imbued with the fact that the companies who have not been in favor of this proposition and the agents who do not understand it will by the publication of these additional articles have photographed upon their mind exactly what the education and conservation movement through the institutional advertisements intends and will accomplish.

6th. Finally, the committee recommends that a partial call for funds be made through the local associations for the contribution of managers only to defray the expenses of this initial campaign. That the companies who have already given pledges and all other companies be given to understand that the National Association invites their contributions and co-operation in behalf of this great work, but that a general campaign for raising funds be deferred until such time as the real merit of the idea be established and photographed upon the minds by this initial campaign. The committee is satisfied that the first call will bring sufficient funds from the managers over the United States to defray the expenses of what is contemplated in the recommendations for the present. No individual, even those who are the most earnest in the support of the work of conservation and education and the most sanguine of the scope of the movement for the future can properly visualize the value to the public and the business of these institutional advertisements until they have seen them in print, and unless they can be so written upon the subject of taxation, loans, surrenders, income insurance, old age insurance and business or corporation life insurance and covering the broad economics of life insurance they will not be published at all. This recommendation of visualizing the idea by publishing some of the articles in advance is not alone the earnest judgment of the committee, but is predicated upon the very best advice of shrewd advertisers who can have no possible interest in this campaign directly or indirectly.

When the committee was appointed at Memphis, its members were Edward A. Woods, Pittsburgh; Jules Girardin, Chicago; Hon. T. C. Thompson, Chattanooga; Louis L. Hopkins, New York City, and Warren M. Horner, Minneapolis; Mr. Horner being chairman. Owing to the fact that Mr. Thompson was Mayor of Chattanooga, and could not well afford to give the necessary time to the committee, Hubert H. Ward, of Portland, Ore., a former president of the National Association was named in his place at the Atlantic City convention.

THE FIELD AND THE AGENT.

Great Possibilities and Opportunities for Field Representatives, Especially for College Men Who Are Willing to Assume the Increasing Responsibilities of the Business.

This article is the text of a lecture delivered on May 12, 1914, by National President Ernest J. Clark before the University of Cincinnati. While intended for college men, it contains a wealth of interesting facts and statistics. The new agent will be encouraged by reviewing the opportunities for field work as cited by Mr. Clark.—Editor's Note.

If I am correctly informed, this evening's lecture constitutes the tenth of a course on life insurance which you have had the opportunity of attending since September 3, 1913. I can assure you that it gives to me much pleasure to be able to participate in this course of instruction for your benefit, covering as it does the primary essentials regarding the great institution of life insurance, its principles, conditions and benefits, so far as a course of lectures so necessarily limited in number will permit.

The subject for the evening is:

"The Field and the Agent."

- (1) Possibilities of the Field.
- (2) Increasing Responsibilities of the Agent.
- (3) Demand for College Men.

As I have not had the pleasure of hearing the nine preceding lectures, and even though they were on different subjects than that assigned to me, yet owing to the natural interdependent relationship between those questions pertaining to the field and the agent and the subjects previously discussed I may find it necessary to trespass occasionally on the subject matter which might appear to belong more properly to former discussions.

Possibilities of the Field.

In considering the first sub-division of this question, namely "Possibilities of the Field," let us take a brief view of what the agent has already accomplished in the life insurance field thereby placing us in better position to consider future possibilities.

The institution of life insurance as it exists to-day is comparatively new, having had its entire growth in this country during the past seventy years. There was, it is true, some slight insurance activity prior to the above date, but so limited in extent as not to be worth mentioning. We may consider therefore, that progressive American life insurance had its beginning in 1843. In 1870 there were 71 companies, in 1903 there were 112, in 1910 there were 181 and on December 31, 1913, there were 239 legal reserve companies reporting to the various State Insurance departments, with admitted assets of $4,814,224,987; 37,804,432 policies in force, aggregating $1,114,678,546, and distributed over 25,000,000 lives. The annual income of these companies in 1913 was $976,562,592, and they paid out during the year $479,866,556 in death claims, matured endowments, dividends and surrender values.

Who made all this wonderful record possible? The agent, not the officer or medical director. When you pause to consider the real meaning of all this to the social and economic life of the United States you cannot but be impressed with the most profound respect for this great institution of life insurance and the dignity with which the profession of life insurance is clothed. Such have been not only the possibilities of the past, but these are some of the actual results fully realized.

Notwithstanding the magnitude of these figures and the valuable services already extended to 25,000,000 policy-holders in this country by the life insurance agents of the United States, which can never be calculated in dollars and cents, life insurance has been undergoing many changes during the past twenty years especially, a process of rapid evolution if you please, with the result that it stands to-day as the reatest bulwark against adversity caused through the ravages of death and financial reverses ever conceived by the mind of man—shorn of those objectionable features at one time criticized, and controlled in the field by an agency force which is dominated by lofty ideals and a consciousness that the life of the agent is essentially one of service.

Individual Life Values.

You have doubtless had explained to you in former lectures the scientific relationship of life insurance to the life value of the individual. There is nothing so valuable to a state or the Nation as the life values of its citizens, and as all these life values must ultimately be destroyed by death, it is only through the medium of life insurance in its varying forms that the family can be saved the irreparable loss which must sooner or later be caused by death of the one on whom the wife, children and possibly an important business enterprise are dependent.

Our American people carry more than twice as much life insurance as all the rest of the world combined. We have the best insurance companies, the highest grade agency force and no profession or business has ever attained such remarkable growth and usefulness in the same space of time, and yet our $21,114,678,546 of legal reserve life insurance covers less than 7 per cent. of the life values of our insurable risks in this country, which are estimated at $350,000,000,000. Think of it, gentlemen, that notwithstanding all that has been done in the building of this great institution, there should be sevenfold and one-half times as much insurance in force in order to adequately cover the insurable life values in the United States, all of which will be destroyed within the next seventy years.

Fire insurance covers a possible contingency only, and yet 2 per cent. of the combustible property of the United States is insured against destruction by fire, whereas the most important of all classified values is protected against the positive and ultimate destruction by death to the extent of but 7 per cent. Could there be a more unlimited field of activity for young men standing on the threshold of a future professional life, as many of you gentlemen are at the present time?

No Abatement in Growth.

There is no evidence of any abatement in the growth of life insurance. On the contrary, its field of operations is constantly broadening, for so long as life is uncertain and valued and men have families they love, business to protect and old age to provide for, life insurance must have an ever increasing field of activity, especially in view of the constant increase in population and the wealth of the country and the increasing familiarity with the principles and necessities of life insurance in its varying forms by the insuring public.

Again life insurance has a distinct advantage over the professions of law and medicine, as so long a course of special training behind college walls is not required; there is no outlay for books, instruments, renting of offices, purchasing of supplies, and then waiting possibly for years before a lucrative clientele can be developed in accordance with the ethics of professionalism which must, according to the recognized custom, regulate the establishing of a legal or medical practice. If at all fitted and prepared for the profession of life insurance, the agent, because of his ability to pursue both actively and aggressively his work in the field, will be able to make a fair income during the first year of his work and increasing experience and clientage, combined with his renewal commissions, will give to him a rapidly increasing income, which should be most substantial before the young theological, medical or law student is even ready to begin his professional work.

The income of the life insurance agent, other than industrial, has been found, according to statistics, to be superior on the average to that of other professions, notwithstanding the less amount of expenditure in both time and money in securing his professional training. There is no calling in which the familiar maxim that "There is always room at the top" applies with greater force than that of life insurance, for well-trained, capable and experienced men are to-day in greater demand by home offices and general agencies, than any other class of specialists in the world, and such men, if aggressive, self-reliant and courageous, must of necessity go to the top.

The life insurance agent of to-day is undoubtedly the most independent of all professional men. He is not tied down to an office or bound by red-tape; he is the master of his own movements, and as stated by a certain author, "playing when he pleases and working when he chooses, but he must choose to work if he expects to succeed."

Expert Opinions.

The following opinions with respect to the possibilities of the field are quoted from some of the most successful insurance men in this country, and I wish to commend most heartily these opinions to all young men who contemplate entering life insurance as their life's work.

"There is no profession in which it is possible for a man without capital to achieve such financial success as in life insurance; in no other occupation can a man without any resources other than brains, training, energy and industry secure so great a pecuniary reward for his labor, in addition to rendering the highest possible service to his fellow men, next to that covered by the ministry of the gospel. The possibilities of this profession to an agent are limited only by his willingness to work.

Another prominent insurance man says: "There are now more opportunities to attain financial success in life insurance than in any of the other professions. The latter are very crowded, many attorneys are without clients, many physicians are without patients, and most clergymen are struggling along on starvation wages. The lawyer or doctor has to put up his sign and then sit down and wait for something to turn up. In life insurance the agent can go out and turn something up."

"There is nothing humdrum about the work; it has all the charm of variety, from day to day. 'So many men, so many opinions,' and each man must be handled differently from his neighbor; so the life insurance agent who follows his work in the best way and with the highest aim, comes in time to be a diplomat as well as a man of bright mentality and keen judgment. He grows to be very much alive. He has to be!"

The Increasing Responsibilities.

Now, as to the "Increasing Responsibilities of the Agent": Once classed as purely a business, life insurance has during recent years been acquiring those elements both in its conduct at our home offices and the educational requirements, training, ethical standards and character of service rendered by its field men, which make it unquestionably one of the leading professions. The word "profession" is defined by the Century dictionary as: "A vocation in which a professional knowledge of science or learning is used by its practical application to affairs of others, either in advising, guiding or teaching them, or in serving their interests of welfare in the practice of an art founded on it. The word implies professed attainments in special knowledge as distinguished from mere skill."

The above definition is a perfect description of the present and future work of the trained and educated life insurance agent. He has necessarily become an insurance advisor or counselor in all that the term implies—one whom any prospective insurer or policy-holder many consult with perfect confidence of receiving intelligent and conscientious advice and service. The agent should at all times so regard it, appreciating the responsibilities that devolve upon him as an insurance counselor first and a scientific salesman second, never permitting for one moment his pecuniary interest in the transaction to influence his advice or service rendered. Remember, gentlemen, that next to the work of the minister the life insurance agent deals with the most serious and important question in all the world, namely death, endeavoring so far as it lies within his power to alleviate poverty and distress which usually following in consequence, with all that poverty means in its affect on disease, vice, illiteracy and even crime.

Improvvidence of American Men.

Let us consider for a few moments the question of improvidence which exists on the part of our American men right here in the greatest civilized nation on earth, and the absolute demand, in consequence, for billions of addition life insurance. Eighty-five men out of every 100, at death, leave no income producing estate. This average is shown conclusively by the following statistics:—From January 1, 1901, to December 31, 1905, out of 27,011 registered adult deaths, according to the records of the Surrogate Courts of the United States, 23,051, or 85.3 per cent. of the deceased left no estate. Thirty-five per cent. of all widows were left in absolute want and 90 per cent. of the widows lacked the common comforts of life. There are approximately 3,100,000 widows in the United States, 1,000,000 of whom are over 65 years of age. Of this latter number 900,000 are now dependent on the generosity of relatives, charity or the State. In addition to this appalling situation, think of the millions of fatherless and orphan children, whose intellectual, moral and physical natures have been dwarfed through poverty, in consequence of the death of a father who neglected, through procrastination, indifference or ignorance (they all amount to the same thing), to make provision for them against his death. Perchance he was a daily contributor toward the $1,750,000,000 spent during the year in the United States for alcoholic drinks, or toward the $520,000,000 per annum spent in this country for tobacco, or he may have even been the purchaser of an automobile, yet could not afford to protect his dependent, helpless wife and children with life insurance. Only three men out of 100, at death, leave an estate of $10,000 or over, and as a further evidence of this universal and nation-wide improvidence, there are 5,000,000 women in the United States compelled to work for a livelihood.

The above facts clearly indicate the increasing responsibilities of the agent.

The greatest need in life insurance to-day is for field men of brains, ambition and energy. From what source can we secure them and where do we find the highest development of these essential qualifications? We naturally turn to the American college or university. The future successful life insurance agent will not only possess the advantage of a high school training, but the mental discipline and the technical and scientific knowledge that the higher education of colleges and universities afford. A high school course does not go far enough in the development of mental power.

Educational Methods.

In view of these already established facts, combined with the crying need for a better educated public concerning the fundamental principles, necessities and benefits of life insurance, the National Association of Life Underwriters is now directing a large share of its energies in a nation-wide educational campaign, one branch of which is to establish proper courses of instruction in the leading colleges and universities of the United States and Canada. Life insurance as a special and separate course originated with Harvard College in 1897, and to-day it is a subject of special courses in more than fifty colleges and universities. In the Wharton School of Finance, University of Pennsylvania, where life insurance has been taught for the past nine years, there are 126 students attending this year's courses and 86 students in the evening department of the school, making a total of 212. Of the 86 men who are taking the evening course, a large number are now connected with various life insurance companies.

To be a mere salesman of life insurance does not meet the demand—the ability to put a certain volume of life insurance on the books of a company as though it were so much merchandise, does not spell success; but the ability to “advise, guide and serve the interests or welfare” of the applicant or policy-holder in the selection of the proper form and amount of insurance adjusted to the particular needs or requirements of himself, his family or his business, constitutes successful life underwriting. Not only may a form of policy best suited to one man be entirely unsuited to another, but different forms of contract are often required by the same man for different purposes at different times of his life and in different conditions of his family relationship or business affairs. It must not be left to the applicant to know what policy or policies will best serve his needs any more than the client in need of legal services should prescribe the formal of legal advice to be given him by his attorney, or the patient should dictate to his physician the course of medical treatment which should be administered. New and important branches of life insurance have opened up in which special knowledge and training are required on the part of the agent: Income insurance, providing fixed income for wives and children, payable during their lives in monthly, quarterly, semi-annual or annual instalments; corporation or business insurance to protect corporations or partnerships against the death of valuable members, maintaining an equilibrium of commercial credit, retiring stock, discharging outstanding liabilities made restive by death, or adjusting the interest of deceased partners; group insurance; home purchase and mortgage insurance.

The Idea of Service.

An agent's service to his policy-holder does not end with the writing and placing of the policy—on the contrary, he should keep in touch with the insured and be ever ready to give proper and necessary attention to securing a prompt renewal of premiums if there should develop any tendency toward slowness in payment, or lapsation. Changes in the policy may be required to meet subsequently changed conditions in the family or business of the insured. Assignments and changes of beneficiary may be required; loans against the policy requested, but to be discouraged wherever possible, and additional insurance to be placed from time to time as the circumstances and requirements of the insured permit.

The man who twenty-five years ago, after making a failure in other lines, entered the “life insurance business,” as it was then universally regarded, and of course made a more signal failure with quicker results than in his previous occupation, no longer haunts our life insurance offices, for he knows there is neither place nor opportunity for him.

Thus, I have endeavored to give to you gentlemen a brief outline of this most important subject, and trust that it may open up to you an avenue for further investigations which will ultimately lead to some of your number entering this high calling and devoting your lives to a work which means so much in the alleviation of poverty and distress and the general uplift of the social and economic life of the nation.

Life insurance not only includes the interests of the public from a commercial and financial point of view, but it affects the moral and intellectual advancement of the race. The student of political economy of the twentieth century is wanting in acumen if he fails to include life insurance as one of the greatest factors in the prosperity and happiness, the welfare and still greater advancement in civilization of all the people. It is difficult to estimate the full effects on the moral and intellectual condition of the people resulting from the benefits of life insurance. Few fully appreciate how many women and children are saved by it from the toils and temptations and oftentimes degradation of unexpected poverty. Thousands and thousands of husbands and fathers have been made braver and more hopeful, thousands of wives and mothers have been made happier and more contented because of the knowledge that the strong arms of life insurance were around and about them, comforting and encouraging and strengthening them in performing the manifold duties of their everyday lives.—Isaac Miller Hamilton.

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS DISCUSSED AT MID-YEAR MEETING OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Modified Plans of Committee on Education and Conservation Assure Success of Movement—Booklet to Be Published on Taxation Problem—Cincinnati Convention to Be Held September 15, 16, and 17.

With Chairman Hugh M. Willet presiding and with 46 members in attendance, the Mid-Year Meeting of the Executive Committee was held on April 21, at the Hotel Astor, New York. The morning session was promptly called to order at 10.30 and Charles W. Orr was elected secretary pro tem. in the absence of Secretary Frank D. Buser. National President Ernest J. Clark spoke of the results accomplished since the Atlantic City convention, making special reference to the concessions which had been obtained in the income tax measure and the tariff bill. According to the figures which he presented, the membership of the National Association was 5,120. Three new associations had applied for membership, as follows:

Lansing (Mich.) Association.
Kalamazoo (Mich.) Association.
Salina (Kan.) Association.

Other associations had been organized or were in process of organization, but had not as yet applied for membership in the national body. These organizations are located at Madison, Wis.; Atlantic City, N. J.; Missoula, Mont.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Western Kentucky, Dayton, O.; Peoria, Ill., and San Diego, Cal.

Non-Resident Membership.

The report of the corresponding secretary was read by Secretary Pro. Tem. Orr. Among other things, this report brought forth the fact that a number of local associations had taken advantage of the non-resident membership amendment to the constitution, and that, with incomplete returns, it had been ascertained that there were 343 non-resident members of local associations, with the Oklahoma association heading the list with 67 members in this class, the Capital District association following with 29, and the third place held by Chicago, with 26 members. The increase in the total membership was approximately 40 per cent., not including the New Mexico association. This report also called attention to the death of I. Layton Register, president of the National Association during the years of 1900 and 1901. Special mention was made of the activities of the Texas association, which at the present time has been organized but one year.

Death of Hervey S. Dale.

Announcement was made of the death of Hervey S. Dale, who had been elected treasurer of the National Association at the Atlantic City convention. The report of the late treasurer was read by Robert F. Palmer, the executive committee-man from the Chicago association. It developed that the financial condition of the National Association was exceedingly satisfactory, the cash balance on hand being greater than ever before at any time prior to the receipt of annual dues.

President Clark, as chairman of the committee on speakers, reported progress and declared that the staff of speakers at the Cincinnati convention would undoubtedly be the strongest which had ever addressed any annual convention.

Charles W. Orr, chairman of the committee on finance, stated that his committee was working out a plan to assist in the prompt remittance of annual dues from local associations. The committee also was interested in increasing the revenues of LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS and it was contemplating some work in connection with this idea.

John Dolph, chairman of the committee on law and legislation, took an optimistic view of the legislative situation, saying in part:

It is refreshing to be able to report that the activities in legislative work detrimental to our interests has been very much minimized. This statement is not made by way of encouragement, because, as a matter of fact, the number of legislatures in session during the past winter is very much less than during the preceding year. There is, however, much reason for encouragement because of the improved organization of our forces and the greater co-operation of all life insurance interests. We believe we should take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate our good president and his co-workers on present organization conditions. In addition, we would urge our members everywhere to increase the strength of their organizations and to take advantage of every possible opportunity to co-operate.

Our brethren in Maryland have much reason to be exercised about a movement that was inaugurated to materially increase the tax on life insurance premiums. It was fully expected that such a bill would be introduced. After considerable organized missionary work on the part of the Baltimore association and others interested, on behalf of the policyholders, the bill, for reasons which you can guess, did not reach the legislative hopper. We hope to be able to present a leaf out of the book of experience of the Baltimore association at the annual convention in Cincinnati.

Kentucky Law Against Rebating.

Mr. Dolph also discussed a bill passed by the Kentucky Legislature affecting rebating, which provides that if sufficient evidence be obtained by the commissioner to show a prima facie case of the violation of the statute, he is not only empowered to employ his own examiners, as well as other persons, to enforce compliance with the law, but he is also given free access to all the books and papers of any insurance company or its agents, and may summon and examine witnesses under oath. "Evidently," said Mr. Dolph, "our friends in Kentucky mean business, because they have provided a penalty for refusal to appear and testify when required of a $1,000 fine or a year in jail."

In the absence of Hubert H. Ward, chairman of the committee on topics, H. H. Kohn, a member of that committee, read a communication from Mr. Ward in which a number of topics were presented. The report was received and at the afternoon session it was decided to leave the selection of five-minute topics to President Clark.

The Committee on Prize Essays, J. C. Drewry, chairman, the Credential Committee, E. B. Ranshousen, chairman, and the Transportation Committee, with Millard W. Mack, chairman, all reported progress in their respective duties.

Report of Press Committee.

The report of the Press Committee by Chairman Charles W. Scovel was then called for. Mr. Scovel stated that the Press Committee concurred in the opinion of President Clark that the time had come for the National Association, as well as local associations, to begin a systematic, persistent campaign to secure greater publicity for news items and reading matter arising largely out of the meetings of local associations and other activities in the fields of education and conservation, with the object of spreading among the people the essential truths of life insurance in its broad, institutional aspects. He told of the publication of a history of the association movement under his direction which was intended to assist in the educational propaganda. Fifteen hundred copies of the booklet were printed, but, said Mr. Scovel, no further steps had been taken, for the reason that in planning for the actual work it became evident even before the initial pamphlet was received from the printer that the committees were not rightly organized to act effectively. "There is a multiplicity of committees," said he, "both national and local with confusion both in the name and function, that would inevitably produce further confusion, first, in the task of getting the right men at work in each association and, second, in the impression made upon the newspapermen and others we seek to reach. For an effective campaign all publicity matters need to be concentrated in the hands of one central committee operating through a single committee in each locality. And that central body should be the education and conservation committee, which might, perhaps, be given the comprehensive and more explicit title of education and publicity committees.

J. Henry Johnson, chairman of the Membership Committee, dwelt upon the best methods of increasing the membership of the local bodies. It was his opinion that the best results are obtained by small local membership committees. He also suggested that where new men are entering the business of life insurance the managers could very well afford to pay the first year's dues of such men in order to have them properly started, and that he believed that this would prove of more assistance to agents and a greater benefit to the profession than the same amount of money invested in any other way.

Stimulating Convention Attendance.

The report of the Convention Attendance Committee was delivered by its chairman, Herbert R. Lewis, of Rochester. Mr. Lewis referred to the Rochester-Atlantic City Convention Club, where 38 members signed the agreement, with the result that over 30 members were present at the convention. Mr. Lewis presented 100 copies of the original agreement printed and ready for distribution among the members.

As to the work of the Committee on Taxation, Chairman Edward A. Woods reported that he had prepared a circular asking life insurance companies and local associations for co-operation along the lines suggested by the Atlantic City resolution. Copies of this circular letter were sent to 251 life insurance companies and 85 local associations. Replies promising co-operation were received from 45 of the companies and the remaining 206 companies did not even reply to the letter, which was signed personally by all three members of the committee. Of the 85 local associations to whom the circular was sent, 50 appointed committees on taxation and eight other associations have promised to appoint a taxation committee. A large number of the local bodies have held meetings devoted to the subject of taxation and Mr. Woods personally appeared and addressed several of them. In concluding his report Mr. Woods said in part:

Owing to the co-operation of association members, great publicity has been given to the subject in the newspapers wherever these meetings have been held and in many cases persons prominent in official positions have attended.

Your committee is preparing a circular (which is badly needed) to suggest objections to the present taxation method, draft of which is presented herewith.

Many associations have offered to hold meetings, but require a speaker thoroughly familiar with the subject. If even life insurance men are not sufficiently familiar with the evils of insurance taxation to discuss it, it certainly shows the need of an upstirring and agitation of the subject.

Taxation Booklet.

Much interest was manifested in Mr. Woods' report and at the suggestion of several delegates, Chairman Willet requested him to read the text of the booklet he had prepared on taxation. Mr. Woods complied with the request and it was then moved that the booklet be approved for publication by the National Association without further revision.

Following this came the report of the Publication Committee by Chas. Jerome Edwards. The figures given with regard to the financial condition of LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS were the subject of much favorable comment. Notwithstanding a general tendency on the part of companies to retrench on their advertising appropriations, the NEWS had made substantial progress since the Atlantic City convention and the Atlantic City Convention Proceedings had been published and distributed at a satisfactory profit.

The afternoon session was called to order at 2.30 and the reports of the Speakers' Committee, Finance Committee, Law and Legislation Committee, Membership Committee and Credential Committee were approved and placed on file.

The report of the Cincinnati association with regard to pre-convention arrangements, by Millard W. Mack, was then taken up and it was resolved that the recommendations of the Cincinnati association be accepted and approved; that the convention proper should be held on the 15th, 16th and 17th of September, and that a meeting of the Executive Council and meeting of the Executive Committee should be held on the 14th of September. The details of future arrangements for the convention will be matters of consideration for the officers of the National Association and members of the General Convention Committee of the Cincinnati association. On motion, it was resolved that official headquarters at Cincinnati for the officers and executive committee be referred to the officers of the National Association.

Work of Executive Council.

President Clark delivered a report on the work of the Executive Council during the past seven months. He outlined the work accomplished at four meetings of that body, one in Pittsburgh, Oct. 6, another meeting in Philadelphia on Nov. 17, with a third gathering in Philadelphia on Dec. 17 and a conference in New York on April 20. Mr. Clark gave particular attention to the details in connection with the arrangements made for publishing a text-book on life insurance. In connection with this phase of association activities Mr. Clark read the following letter from Dr. S. S. Huebner, of the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce of the University of Pennsylvania, who has been employed as editor-in-chief of the text-book.

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 13, asking for a statement relative to (1) the scope of the text-book to be prepared under the auspices of the National Association of Life Underwriters and (2) the progress of the volume and my plans regarding its preparation. With reference to your inquiry, I beg to submit the following:

Outline of Text Book.

The volume, which will comprise 30 chapters and which, according to the arrangements with the publisher, shall not exceed 500 pages, will be divided into four distinct parts. Part I will deal with the nature and uses of life insurance and its chapters will treat exhaustively the economic concept of life insurance, its family uses, its business uses, and the meaning of the leading types of contracts used, together with a detailed explanation of the advantages and possible shortcomings connected with each. This portion of the volume should be written in such a manner as to adapt the book not merely to the use of the layman, but also for use as a text in colleges and high schools.

Part II will deal with the scientific aspects of life insurance and will present the essential considerations connected with factors and assumptions underlying rate making, mortality tables, ascertainment of the net premium for the most important types of contracts, loading the reserve, surrender values, policy loans and the surplus. Having in mind the layman and the student, this part of the volume will be made as non-mathematical in character as possible. Only simple mathematics will be used to make clear the scientific foundation that underlies correct life insurance principles.

Part III will be devoted to a discussion of (1) special forms of life insurance, viz.: fraternal, industrial, group and total disability insurance, and (2) the subjects of home office and agency organization and managements, life insurance investments, taxation of life insurance companies, and government regulation of the business. The subjects just enumerated are largely unrelated in character and therefore have been grouped into a separate part of the volume.

Part IV will furnish a classified statement of the essential legal principles governing life insurance in which the policyholders and agents are most interested. Chief emphasis will be placed on the law relating to the beneficiary, assignment of policies and insurable interest. I may add that the purpose of the volume throughout, as determined at a previous conference, shall be to furnish a statement of the essential facts, principles and practices as they exist in connection with the foregoing subjects, and that opinions and argumentative matter shall be excluded.

According to our arrangement, the manuscript is to be completed by the beginning of next March and, as I explained to you, I can begin active work at the end of May, when my school work closes for the season. I also explained to you that Dr. Bruce D. Mudgett, instructor in insurance at the University of Pennsylvania, will prepare four of the chapters, three of which will deal with the computation of the net premium and one with the total disability clause, and that Ralph Blanchard, also a member of the teaching staff in insurance at the university, will prepare the chapter on group insurance. The material for three chapters has already been collected and the preparation of the manuscript will begin in the course of a few weeks. These chapters will be prepared under my supervision, and the authors, I may add, have for some time been interested in making a special study of the subjects referred to.

As regards the remaining chapters of the volume, a considerable number, especially those relating to the uses of life insurance, loading and the surplus, have not thus far been extensively treated, and such information as exists is scattered and fragmentary in character. Thus far I have endeavored to collect, through correspondents and the perusal of journals, the information necessary for the preparation of the chapters and hope to have the information classified by the close of May.

Prize Essay Topic.

The Prize Essay Committee recommended that the topic be "The Influence of Woman on Life Insurance." After a discussion it was finally resolved that the subject be "Woman's Interest and Influence in Life Insurance."

The Committee on Education and Conservation reported through its chairman, Warren M. Horner. The committee had prepared a prospectus giving a full review of the institutional advertising campaign and displaying some of the actual copy, subject to the final editing of the executive council and executive committee. With regard to delay in contributions to the fund as outlined at the Atlantic City convention and the subsequent meetings of the Executive Council, the committee attributed the condition to the apathy and neglect consequent to reply by mail for any money raising campaign, and the fact that a great many associations preferred to supervise the spending of the larger proportion of their own money. To quote from the report of the committee:

Education and Conservation.

The committee has met the first situation by the preparation of a prospectus to aid each local association in holding a meeting at which definite and comprehensive action may be taken in securing contributions from its entire membership, and has met the second objection by recommending that the local associations send only 25 per cent. of the money raised to the National Association, retaining the other 75 per cent. for advertising and other educational purposes in their own respective localities.

We believe that this will result in immediate action all over the United States and that within a comparatively short time there will be such publicity and resultant benefit to life insurance as has never before occurred in the history of business institutions. The committee most respectfully urges upon the executive committee and the entire membership of the National Association of Life

Underwriters the necessity of holding to the institutional idea in this great educational movement, and further suggests that this association, as an association, progresses only in direct proportion as it is able to harness and unify its potency with respect to the business for which it is organized.

The National Association of Life Underwriters has only grown and will only grow as it is able to harness and unify the many constructive problems confronting field work, service to the people and service to ourselves in the business of life insurance.

As stated before, the business in its lack of understanding by the public, in its own shortcomings and in the absence of unified effort is still in its ether stage, just as the electricity in the air and the power in the Falls of Niagara.

As we must harness the power in the Falls of Niagara to utilize it and harness the electricity in the air to command its forces, so must we harness by an institutional and unified campaign those great unconquered forces in the ether realm of life insurance, public trust, public understanding and business caste and efficiency.

Mr. Horner made an explanation of the proposed plan of adopting an emblem or trade-mark to identify underwriters who contributed to the fund raised by local associations. Following this there was a lengthy discussion on the question of obtaining publicity in newspapers through local associations, and J. W. Bishop, of the Chattanooga association, called attention to a department which his association had established in the Chattanooga News. At the conclusion of the discussion former National President Neil D. Sills introduced the following resolution, which was adopted:

Work of Committee Endorsed.

Resolved, That the executive committee endorse the work of the Education and Conservation Committee in preparing a comprehensive text-book by Dr. S. S. Huebner, of the University of Pennsylvania, and recommend that the committee intensify its campaign with respect to the educational work in bringing the attention of high schools and other institutions of learning to the preparation of this work.

We further endorse the action of the committee in preparing a comprehensive prospectus of the institutional advertising campaign and recommend that a copy of this prospectus be sent to each member of the executive committee, to the end that at a specially called meeting or at the next regular meeting each association may take immediate action in securing contributions from its entire membership.

That 75 per cent. of the funds so secured be retained by the local associations for their own local campaign and the balance to be turned over to the National Association to defray the cost of the educational work and to be used in the preparation of the institutional copy to be supplied to the local associations for publication in addition to such material or copy as each association may desire to publish as more directly bearing on its own local situation.

That the committee make such publication of the articles prepared in national mediums as funds secured will permit and as may be deemed advisable by the executive council. That a circular letter be addressed to the local associations under the direction of President Clark giving a comprehensive statement of what action is desired on the part of the local associations and setting forth the advisability of preparing the institutional copy both for national publication and republication by the local associations in order to institutionalize or unify the campaign over the country.

Chairman Willet then called for the resolution on the death of former Vice-President Samuel E. Barber, and the following resolution was introduced by a special committee consisting of Chas. Jerome Edwards, Percy V. Baldwin and Jules Girardin and was unanimously adopted:

The executive committee of the National Association of Life Underwriters regrets to record the death recently of a former vice-president, Samuel E. Barber, of Topeka, Kan., whose untimely death in the prime of his years and during his active work as a life insurance man has removed from our relations and from service to the public a man of ability, character and energy.

And we extend to the members of his family these expressions of our sincere sympathy and direct that a copy of this resolution be sent them.

A resolution was then called for on the death of former National President I. Layton Register, and Edward A. Woods volunteered to prepare a tribute.

On motion, it was resolved to send a telegram of sympathy to Secretary Frank D. Buser, who was unable to attend the meeting because of ill health.

H. Wibirt Spence Elected Treasurer.

In considering the formalities necessary in transferring the funds of the National Association to a new treasurer it was resolved that a communication be sent to the bank in Chicago which held the funds of the National Association, setting forth a certified copy of the constitution and by-laws of the National Association relative to action which may be taken in case of vacancy in office, together with a resolution electing a successor to the late Mr. Dale. This motion was unanimously carried and embraced the election of H. Wibirt Spence, of the Detroit association, as treasurer to fill the unexpired term.

A resolution of thanks was also extended to Byron C. Howes, who, since the illness of Mr. Dale had been transacting the financial work of the National Association under power of attorney.

Vice-President Edward A. Woods briefly discussed the income tax test case and read a proposed circular letter intended to be sent out by the National Association to local associations, also a letter from A. I. Vorys. After the matter had been thoroughly digested it was moved that the report be approved, but that no official action should be taken in the matter; that all negotiations in the matter of raising funds for a test case should be of an unofficial nature between Mr. Woods and the various associations.

J. Henry Johnson mentioned the fact that the St. Louis association would act upon 65 applications at a regular meeting of that association occurring the same evening and the corresponding secretary was instructed to send a telegram of congratulations to the president of the St. Louis body.

On motion of Neil D. Sills, it was unanimously resolved to accept with thanks the invitation of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. to a banquet in the evening of the same day.

J. K. Voshell, executive committeeman from the Baltimore association, spoke upon the work which the legislative committee of the Baltimore association had done during the season and stated that everything of an objectionable nature before the Legislature had been killed.

President Clark Urges Co-operation.

President Clark then urged the executive committeemen to recommend the appointment of permanent legislative committees to work in co-operation with the National Association; that taxation committees in local associations in States where there were several associations should work in perfect harmony; that the institutional advertising prospectus should be taken home and brought to the attention of local associations, and that all committeemen should work to stimulate a big attendance at the Cincinnati convention.

The following resolution was then presented on the death of Hervey S. Dale and unanimously approved:

The executive committee of the National Association of Life Underwriters in session at New York, April 20, 1914, places upon the records of the association its sense of deep regret that the Almighty Master has deemed it wise to remove from earthly activity so true a man, so lovable a comrade and so efficient an official as Hervey S. Dale, treasurer of the association, and wishes further to express its appreciation of his capable and faithful services and to attest to his constant and unfailing adherence to the highest ethics and ideals of the life insurance profession.

Be it ordered that this expression be placed upon the minutes of the association and that a copy be forwarded to the family of our departed associate.

There being no further business before the committee on motion, it adjourned.

The Metropolitan Banquet.

Haley Fiske, vice-president of the Metropolitan, was host at a complimentary dinner given by his company, in the tower of the home office building. The affair which was, usual, delightfully informal, came as a thoroughly enjoyable climax to a strenuous day of accomplishment. At the conclusion of the dinner Mr. Fiske extended a welcome to the members of the executive committee, paying a high tribute to the work of the field men and the important relations which they bore in the work of community life. Mr. Fiske called attention to the invested assets in the companies represented, stating that the amount referred to was four billion of dollars, and that the fund was constantly increasing the yearly flow of premium income amounting to seven hundred millions of dollars. In considering the relation of the funds to the commercial life of the country, the speaker claimed that on them largely depended railroad construction, municipal and interurban transit facilities, development of electrical and power lighting plants, the erection of schools, houses and large business buildings.

Mr. Fiske also made mention of the good work which had been done by the Maryland association in checking a flood of unwise legislation. He also referred to the anti-taxation campaign of the National Association under the direction of Vice-President Edward A. Woods.

It so happened that the Metropolitan Life Glee Club was having in the assembly hall its annual private concert, and Mr. Fiske invited all to go to the assembly room for the second part of the program. National President Clark gracefully accepted the invitation and expressed on behalf of the executive committee its appreciation of the Metropolitan hospitality.

Hugh M. Willet expressed his sentiments with reference to President Hegeman, who was in Europe, and whose seventieth birthday had been recently celebrated. Mr. Willet asked the underwriters to authorize a message to Mr. Hegeman expressing birthday congratulations and good wishes, and the high esteem in which the Life Underwriters' Association held him. In response the entire gathering arose and cheered. The guests also signed one of the menu cards as a round robin of greeting to be forwarded to Mr. Hegeman.

The second half of the concert by the Glee Club proved to be a musical entertainment of a high degree of excellence and at its conclusion many of the guests accepted the invitation of Mr. Fiske to visit the tower.

THE MIRROR OF PUBLIC OPINION.

The members of the Syracuse association have Bobbie Burns and Winslow Russell to thank for a full-length reflection of themselves as seen in the mirror of public opinion. "Oh, wad some power," said Burns, "the giftie gie us to see oursel's as ithers see us." And Winslow Russell furnished the power in question in the simplest manner imaginable.

Prior to the recent annual dinner of the Syracuse association, Mr. Russell sent out a number of letters to representative merchants, manufacturers, bankers, lawyers and physicians in Syracuse, requesting answers to certain questions in relation to the activities of general agents, managers and solicitors. Space was provided in the survey blanks for suggestions as to the improvement of field conditions. An analysis of the answers received is not only a source of surprise, but a condition is revealed which is disconcerting in the extreme.

We cannot escape the conviction that the average life insurance agent is not a particular favorite of the educated men in Syracuse, and there is no reason why we should not consider the opinion of Syracuse business and professional men as typical throughout the country.

"Is the average life insurance agent welcome to call upon you?" This was one of the questions asked. Thirty-eight replied in the affirmative, while twenty responded in the negative. Another question was, "Have you a favorable impression of the manner in which life insurance is sold in your city?" Affirmative responses outnumbered opposite opinions; nevertheless there were many emphatic negatives. While one prominent manufacturer said that it was a pleasure to converse with a thoroughly competent solicitor, he declared that 75 per cent. of life insurance salesmen were not qualified to render intelligent service.

Among other points brought out by the survey was the tendency of agents to "knock" and misrepresent other companies, and a decided inclination to sell policies with regard to the largest commissions rather than with the purpose of serving the best interests of the prospect.

If public opinion is a fairly good guide—and the majority of intelligent people believe it to be—is it not imperative that we give serious consideration to this arraignment, which, though startling, is perhaps the most accurate thus far obtained? In view of the facts presented, facts obtained direct and at first hand, have we not been the victim of myopia in attributing in a large degree the difficulties of life insurance salesmanship to the apathy of the public, rather than to the erroneous impressions created by inexperienced, incompetent and dishonest salesmen?

There can be no doubt that a large percentage of the people of this country regard the life insurance solicitor as a nuisance, such opinion being based on nothing more substantial than a lack of knowledge of the institution of life insurance in its relation to the individual, the family and the nation. Not possessing confidence in the institution itself, there is no good reason why this class of people should possess confidence in its representatives. To meet the situation created by these people, and to educate them to an acceptance of the principles of legal reserve life insurance is the object of the proposed Institutional Advertising Campaign of the National Association. But we are not now discussing the people who do not know whereof they speak; rather let us give our attention to those who believe in the institution, but whose confidence has been shaken by the representative who misrepresents.

Such, evidently, were the men who responded to Mr. Russell's queries—lawyers, physicians, bankers, merchants and manufacturers. With these men, if the average holds good, there are 20 out of every 58, or over 30 per cent, with whom the life insurance agent is persona non grata. And to cap the climax, the reason for the attitude of these men is found in the agent, not in the institution. This, too, after the National Association, through its local bodies, has preached the gospel of clean ethics for a quarter of a century.

That the life insurance salesman is not welcome in the offices of 30 per cent. of the business and professional men of Syracuse, or for that matter in any other city, is not entirely due to the crude operations of the part-time man, as great an evil as he may be. A danger just as great is to be found in the full-time agent who is imbued with the very popular idea that no matter what he says or what he does, it is good business if he can "get away with it." With this man, "All's well that ends well," and any negotiations leading up to the placing of a policy ends well when he secures his commission, or even a portion of it. False and misleading statements, incomplete comparisons, rebating, and a score of other "neat" little tricks of the trade, enter and play their part, but these have no real ethical significance, except to assist in "getting away with it."

Almost invariably when a group of men get together one will hear the statement, "I don't know how he does it, but he gets away with it." Even men whom we have supposed to be honest beyond possibility of doubt give a congratulatory slap on the shoulder to the fellow who "gets away with it." Dick Croker "got away with it," and condemnation is softly tempered with approbation in the public mind because, and simply because he "got away with it."

The solicitation of life insurance will never reach the professional level to which it is justly entitled until we get away from the "get away with it" attitude. Let us be honest with ourselves and frankly acknowledge that a high standard of professional ethics can never be so elastic as to stretch to the nefarious expediency of simply "getting away with it."

The burglar, the sneak-thief, and the political grafter, sleep with one eye open on their respective getaways; the gangsters and the crooks plan their back alley retreats days before the crime is committed. The life insurance solicitor who renders to his prospect the modern idea of service, by fitting the policy to the policyholder regardless of commissions, who tells the truth, "the whole truth and nothing but the truth," is the man who scorns a double standard of business honesty.

Let it be understood, however, that this is not an attempt to prove that the great army of life insurance salesmen is inclined, when opportunity presents itself, to make clandestine journeys from the straight and narrow path of business rectitude. Such is not the case; an overwhelming majority of agents are honest and trustworthy.

Our argument is against the Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde of the business; the cowardly hypocrite of the double standard of business honor who filches from the legitimate life insurance agent his good name and who, by his actions, creates a suspicion in the public mind not entirely of himself in particular, but of all life insurance men in general.

We recently had a suit down in Louisville. A man was killed in a railroad wreck, and his family brought suit for $10,000 damages. One of the first questions the lawyer representing the railroad asked of the widow and those who were bringing this suit was: "What did you value your husband's life at?" The widow said that was a thing she could not value. The lawyer on the other side objected, and the court sustained his objection. Then the first lawyer said, "Well, what did he value his life at? How much life insurance did he carry?" "Two thousand dollars was all." "Well, that is all he must have valued his own life at." That point carried well, and that is all they got out of that case. For if a man didn't value his own life, certainly the courts are not going to do so.—H. J. Powell, in Northwestern Mutual Life's Field Notes.

FIRST NEW ENGLAND CONGRESS OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS PROVES ROUSING SUCCESS.

All Sections of New England Represented, with Attendance Far in Excess of Anticipations—Brilliant Addresses on Practical Subjects Create Much Enthusiasm.

With 300 delegates in attendance and all sections of New England represented, the first New England Congress of Life Underwriters, held on April 27, at the Parker House in Boston, was a notable success. The crystal room, where the morning session was held, proved inadequate to accommodate the delegates, and it was found necessary to use the Annex Assembly for the afternoon session.

President Clarence C. Miller, of the Boston association, called the meeting to order at 11 o'clock. In his brief introductory remarks he said that in the same room in which the delegates were then assembled, 24 years ago the National Association was launched. There was an audible stir of enthusiasm at this point of the proceedings; for a score of ladies, representing the New England Women's Association, headed by Mrs. Florence E. Shal, entered the room. The ladies were greeted with much applause.

Greeted by Percy V. Baldwin.

Mr. Miller introduced Percy V. Baldwin, who is a member of the executive council of the National Association. Mr. Baldwin extended formal greetings to the visitors and welcomed them to "Boston's crooked streets and straight-laced ways." As a slogan for the congress he suggested the pact of "The Three Musketeers": "One for all, and all for one."

Henry S. Waldron, of Springfield, Mass., and a member of the Western Massachusetts association, discussed the purpose and value of the congress. He said that since the Atlantic City convention the membership of the National Association had increased from 3,600 to over 5,000. According to the statistics which he had obtained, there were 13,000 men and women in New England carrying rate books, and in view of this he pointed out what a powerful factor in the upbuilding of the National Association the New England Congress might be.

Securing and Developing Prospects.

"Securing and Developing Prospects" was the subject of a remarkably strong address by Franklin W. Ganse, vice-president of the Boston association. Mr. Ganse said in part:

"The securing of prospects is of course vital. The successful agent must either write a very large percentage of those whom he interviews, or he must have one or more good plans for adding good names to his list.

"One of the hardest things about our profession is that clients or prospects are fewest when they are most needed—at the outset of one's career. In this it resembles other professions, more or less learned.

"The general agent knows of a dozen classes of men of every community who for special reasons ought to be approached with a definite proposition at a definite time. He may not be able to supply each of his agents with the actual names. It is questionable whether it is best to do this in most agencies, while it has been done successfully in some notable agencies. But, speaking broadly, the work of digging out his own leads, upon lines which have proved successful, is the best first step in handling the names successfully. They become the agent's own from the start, and he cannot know too much about them—who they are, where they come from, and why they are all selected.

"If the new man at the business puts in one-third to one-half of his time working up a first-class preliminary list, until he has 10 or 15 names ahead for days or weeks to come, he is doing well, and nothing should give him greater assurance of success than the possession of such a stock of well-selected raw material. The men who have failed after intelligently working up and working out such a supply of names, would be hard to find. Most new men who fail get into a vicious circle; because they have not secured the names of enough well-chosen prospects, they do not see enough men to strike an average; because of this, they get meager results; they become discouraged, not because they have not had good average results, but because they have never really carried out the one certain plan for success for a new man—to see a large number of likely people, with confidence of success. How many failures do you know who really did that?

Classes Enumerated.

"Some of the best classes of prospects are the following, in the order of their desirability, as I see it:

1. Those who in reply to letters or otherwise express a willingness to be interviewed.
2. Policyholders as indicated by their records.
3. Names furnished by recent applicants.
4. Parents of recent date.
5. Matrimonial prospects, both coming and going.
6. Changes of age.
7. Promotions and appointments.
8. Periodical salary increases.
9. Co-operative bank mortgages.
10. Purchasers of houses on terms.

"Important as it is to get prospects, it is more vital to lasting success to learn to develop them. This has several steps which too few of us follow to the end:

1. Start by securing enough well-selected prospects to keep busy—and do keep busy.
2. Develop, as a matter of course, as many as possible into applicants and policyholders.
3. Develop every policyholder into a client and a source of prospects.
4. Develop in every prospect, policyholder and client a real respect for our profession and a real knowledge of its fourfold service, which no other institution affords.

"It has been said that a profession involves "special knowledge applied to serving the welfare of others." We may well use the term "clients" of those whom we serve, because in the great American cause of "Thrift vs. Improvidence," in the outcome of which they are all vitally interested, we are advocates for the plaintiff and we are winning verdicts every day. The function of counsel, trained and confidential, is perhaps oftenest exercised.

Scope of Service.

"To return to the all-important undertaking of the all-round scope of our service to our generation; do we not emphasize one or two phases, instead of the whole thing?

1. Safety—few clients know that the great averaging of life insurance investments gives such safety as cannot elsewhere be approached.
2. Protection—this function we do not generally overlook, and we should not.
3. Secured Incomes—in forms which cannot elsewhere be furnished, an additional protection against the too prevalent misinvestment of family funds.

4. Self-chosen compulsion, the greatest aid for the much-needed American thrift. To induce a client to save money he would otherwise spend, to return it to him in his old age, if he needs it; and all the while to offer him with absolute safety protection for his family against his premature death—this is a service too few of our clients have been made to comprehend and most men knew themselves well enough to welcome the chains of such compulsion. In these days of possible war, let us not forget to fight a good fight for the protection of the families of these clients. Can we not apply to ourselves the words of Oliver Proudfoote's widow in "The Fair Maid of Perth," when she was asked whether she accepted Henry the Sixth as her champion in the trial by combat:

"I do, I do, most willingly, and may the blessing of God and St. John give him strength and fortune, since he strikes for the widow and fatherless."

Guy F. Wheeler, a prominent member of the Central Massachusetts association, and secretary of the Provident Life & Trust agency in Worcester, spoke on "The Psychology of Salesmanship." The salient points in Mr. Wheeler's address follow:

The Psychology of Salesmanship.

"The topic that has been assigned me and upon which I speak recognizes that even the matter of salesmanship is a process which operates under law. This is a scientific age, animated interrogation points stalk abroad. A multiplication of laboratories invite students to original research along varying lines. The development of modern science has been mostly along material lines. The study of the operation of the mind made a beginning many years ago, but the prosecution of such a study has lain dormant until comparatively recent years. With the development of psychological education and the aid rendered by laboratory experiments a new interest had developed, in this most fascinating subject. Out of the crude efforts of the alchemist has grown the modern science of chemistry, bringing its untold blessings to mankind.

"From the kite sent into the clouds to bring down its current of electricity we have come to the numerous and wonderful application of this marvelous power until we flash our messages through intervening space. May we not expect that the crude and, in many instances, absurd theories which have been put forth in relation to the operation of the mind may yet have equally wonderful development. But with our present knowledge of the operation of the mind enough is known for us to make some practical uses of present information. When Senator Hoar furnished for the Worcester Court House the motto 'Obedience to Law Is Liberty' he annunciated a great principle that operates in all realms. As we come to know the laws of nature and render implicit obedience, the law which was a tyrant comes to be our servant and the lightning which the ancients knew only as destructive is one of the greatest servants of to-day. The more we appreciate the universality of law, the more readily will we recognize that every operation of the mind must be in obedience to great mental laws.

Apperception.

"First of all, I would like to call your attention to that mental action known to the psychologist as apperception.

"An idea to be appropriated must be apperceived. Perception may be to a degree passive, apperception is always active. It is the mind rising in response to the stimulus of a new thought and appropriating it, but the idea as it is received will be colored or shaped in accordance with the sum total of previous ideas.

"From our childhood we have been receiving mental impressions beginning with the most simple images and concepts, and these have been accumulating until we have what is termed the apperceptive mass. Because of this fact, no two of us see things just alike. In reviewing a landscape the artist sees a picture, the builder sees the timber in the trees, the engineer sees the power in yonder waterfall, the boy sees the butterfly flitting from flower to flower, although all stand viewing the same bit of country. Now this is true in relation to everything, whether it be material things or abstract truths, and the salesman must recognize this fact and draw out his prospect. By embracing every opportunity for acquaintance with him, he will order the presentation of his proposition with a view to the mental state of the man he solicits. This brings us to another principle which should engage his attention, namely, the point of contact.

"Every new thought is appropriated by the mind as it links on to some previous mental conception. We will secure the attention and develop the interest of a man only so far as we find the point in his plane of thought to which we may attach the thought we seek to impress. This point of contact will be found in the experimental life. The closer a thing lies to the plane of our experience the more easily we become interested in it, and our appreciation of the matter is in proportion to its presentation in terms of our own daily life. An illustration drawn from a farm would fall flat when presented to the city born and bred, and nautical terms are meaningless to the landlubber who has never seen the sea. In taking advantage of this principle the salesman will find not only what enters into the life experience of his prospect, but also which of these experiences lies nearest to his heart. But, after all, the greatest power that moves men, and which we can use to the best advantage, is to be found located in the emotions. It may be pride, or acquisitiveness, or the love of home or children, but there is to be found somewhere in every man's daily experience a point of contact where the greatest power may be wielded; and the salesman, who is no student, while he may happen upon the right lines occasionally, cannot have the full degree of success that will be realized by the man who studies to take advantage of this great psychological fact.

Cumulative Impressions.

"Another principle which, rightly understood, cannot fail to encourage the insurance salesman is the power of cumulative impressions.

"Psychologists have sometimes termed this 'suggestion by repetition.' It is a fact that while the first impression may be slight, that subsequent impressions along the same line produce an ever-increasing effect. The nicety of the application of this principle consists in making an impression without irritating. To irritate a prospect is to repel him, but to wisely and tactfully repeat impressions previously made is to hasten the time when the preponderance of thought upon the proposition presented will overcome all objections.

"A final word along the line of non-combattiveness. It has sometimes been suggested that the matter of salesmanship is a contest between the wills of the salesman and the prospect. The salesman is urged by the power of his will to break down and overcome the will of the prospect.

"May this not be a mistaken attitude of mind? Let the contest be in the mind of the prospect between warring ideas, fears and desires, and let the salesman take his stand with the prospect and by a suggestion of lines of thought help the prospect's mind to the right conclusion. Let it be the prospect who goes in under the gentle and tactful leadership of the salesman, but never should the salesman antagonize the prospect. If the prospect is inclined to argue, give a sympathetic and kindly attention to all that he says, almost to the point of assent, and when he has used his ammunition and is tired out, gently draw him back to the consideration of what you have in hand.

"If we would influence men, our minds must meet theirs on the plane where they live, and time spent in finding their location will be richly rewarded."

Immediately following Mr. Wheeler's address, and prior to the buffet luncheon which was served during recess, National Vice-President Edward A. Woods informally discussed with a number of general agents the matter of raising funds to take up the income tax test case.

Taxation.

The first feature of the afternoon session was an address by Mr. Woods on "Life Insurance Taxation." Mr. Woods declared that the burden from taxation upon American policyholders is tremendous.

"Last year," said he, "it was over $13,000,000. This amount would have purchased $550,000,000 more of insurance; it would have added 14 per cent. more to the refunds of dividends returned to policyholders; it aggregated several times over all the executive salaries paid to all officers of all life insurance companies; it meant $63 taken from every $1,000 paid to the widow; and would have reduced the total cost of life insurance over 2 per cent. Further, the burden is increasing. In 1871 20 States levied no tax; now there is but one. In 1860 the tax was 70 cents on each $100 of premiums; now it is $2.26. In 1890 it was $2,000,000; now over $13,000,- 000, and this exclusive of the recent Federal burden put upon insurance by the last administration. It is curious that American States tax life insurance just about the amount that the German Government contributes toward compulsory insurance. In addition to the money cost, the attention of all the principal officers of companies every time legislatures generally meet must be diverted from constructive upbuilding of insurance or from effecting necessary economies to opposing exactions upon the policyholders in endeavoring to successfully oppose such parts of the 2,000 bills that were last year introduced to various legislatures affecting life insurance, most of them imposing additional burdens upon it; this alone being a very serious question."

He made particular reference to the fact that Massachusetts collected, in 1912, in insurance taxes, $1,144,409; of which there was expended for the insurance department but $72,825, leaving a profit to the State of $1,071,584—a profit all made by taxing losses. Ninety-three per cent., therefore, of the taxes collected reverted to the State treasury and only 7 per cent. was expended for supervision, notwithstanding the efficient form of supervision that Massachusetts gives and always has given.

Charles W. Scovel on Income Insurance.

Charles W. Scovel was the last formal speaker at the afternoon session. Mr. Scovel is well known throughout the country as a former president of the National Association and an acknowledged expert on income insurance. His latest utterance on the subject is a remarkably able exposition. The address follows, practically in its entirety:

"Three generations from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves."

"Only yesterday it was coined, this jibe at American speed in dissipating inherited money. To-day it has already lost its point. The fact has far outstripped the jibe. It takes nothing like three generations nowadays for the money to get away. The very moment a man dies, leaving insurance money or anything else that isn't nailed tight, the widow begins to be 'a shining mark for the mining shark.' Hundreds of millions of dollars every year are swallowed up by sharks of all kinds—to say nothing of all the other birds that so willingly lend riches their wings. Edward Atkinson, earnest student of living conditions, once studied this matter and gave his opinion that 'no less than 96 per cent. of insurance proceeds is dissipated before the end of four years.' Three generations? Three years is more like it—three years from wifehood to wash-tub!

"To remedy these sorry conditions, income insurance had to come. It has been slowly developing for two decades and within the last half dozen years has been perfecting rapidly. Insurance money need no longer be left as loose cash, the most losable and most spendable asset a man can leave. Just the contrary, income insurance money now stands out among all his assets as the very safest from loss or unwise spending, the very surest to carry on his care for dear ones to the very end of their after lives and even to grandchildren he will never see. Indeed, their income after his death will be far safer and surer than his own income while alive.

A Little Phrase, but Powerful.

"The little phrase 'payable monthly,' so recently put into the income policies, is the great big thing that is now changing the whole map of family protection. It is like Singer's shifting that tiny eye from the needle's tail to its head (where an eye ought to be, anyhow) and thus equipping the sewing machine to do its revolutionizing work in the world. The monthly payment idea made income insurance a really practical provision for livelihood needs. It applies the money just as the husband and father did himself—just as the wife and daughter has been used to handling it.

"This monthly money, coming in fixed amounts on a certain day, is actually worth more, dollar for dollar, than the same total coming irregularly and at longer intervals, as investment incomes usually do. The former means a cash basis, every dollar bringing full present value; steady comfort; peace of mind. The latter means a credit basis, with money spent before received; feast or famine; waste and worry.

"The rest of the world has been quick to apply the monthly income idea in all its latest pension and relief planning. The new laws for mothers' pensions or for workmen's compensations in many States—the more and more numerous plans of private corporations, churches and institutions—even Carnegie's Hero Fund and Uncle Sam's latest bill to pension soldiers' widows—all provide for income payable monthly. Lump sums or even quarterly incomes are no longer considered a fit provision for widows, children or old age. These various plans represent the expert judgment of social workers, actuaries, financiers and legislators after full investigation.

Small Incomes.

"How small an income it is worth while to provide, as being sufficient to keep the family unit unbroken and raise the children at home, is shown by the provisions made by law out of public funds. New Jersey, for example, allows $9 a month to a mother with one child under 16, with $5 more for a second, and $4 for each other such child. The Federal bill that passed the House this month allows $12 a month to the widow alone, with $2 more for each child under 16. A mother with three children would receive $18 a month under either scale. The Carnegie fund gives commonly sums varying from $20 to $50 a month. The plan recommended by a committee of the Protestant Episcopal Church to provide for the families of its clergy allows $25 a month as the minimum for livelihood, and adds an increasing allowance for educating each child up to $25 a month from 14 to 21 years. These families, of course, belong on a high social plane.

"Income insurance for the sums thus stamped by high authorities as sufficient for the purpose is well within reach of the great mass of family men able to carry policies of a face value from $2,000 to $5,000. A $2,000 policy, for example, will yield $170 of cash for funeral and other special expenses and then pay $10 a month for 20 years at least and as much longer as the widow lives. A man under 40 years with a wife not much younger can make this provision for his own widow and child (more than New Jersey bestows) by setting aside between $2.50 and $5 a month. And with the same saving and under the same policy he is providing likewise for his own old age. The non-producing years of wife, child or self (whichever need the unknown future may bring forth) are all included in the scope of this financial program—to say nothing of his burial fund and his loan value for any emergency use along the way.

Illuminating Comparisons.

"Under this plan the income figures over 6½ per cent. on the lump sum of $1,840 left with the company to provide it (and used up in so doing). That is half again as much as could be had from the class of sound investments proper for a widow's money. One dollar premium applied in this way yields about the same income as $1.50 of premium applied for lump sum insurance, if that lump sum is safely invested. To yield such returns throughout the widow's life is made possible only by grace of the annuity principle—whereby the hazard of long survival is averaged among many annuitants, precisely as the opposite hazard of early death is averaged among many lives at risk. That is why only a life insurance company can make such returns. That is also why this particular plan best fits the great bulk of cases, those in which every premium dollar must yield the largest income it can.

"There is another plan that is particularly attractive to men of larger means, and which is also apt to be the best for any case where the beneficiary is so much younger than the insured as to make the special annuity premium too large. This plan does not use up the principal in instalments, nor call in an annuity to help out. It is a simple matter of investment and can only yield regular investment rates of income. But it does keep the principal intact among the company's assets, withdrawable any time and never below par. Thus it provides not only the monthly income, but also a cash fund that can be drawn on for emergencies. Thus, also, it does not end with a single life, but will go on producing its income through the next generation and then pay the principal to a third generation now unborn.

"It enables a man to-day to rivet a livelihood to the lives of both wife and daughter, through a chain of monthly checks they cannot outlive and a principal they cannot lose—and then have that principal make sure that his own third generation will belong in the coat-sleeve class. All this might be done through a trust company, but not with the same guarantee of safety and precision, or the same prospect by the very best returns obtainable in changing future conditions or the same immunity from taxation, expense or trouble.

"These two fundamental plans can be combined and varied so as to fit the needs of any family, and with freedom of later readjustment to cover changed conditions, after-born children or grandchildren, etc. And these new income services can (in most companies) be applied to the proceeds of existing policies, though originally sold without any such provisions.

Looking Into the Future.

"These new services look far down the future. The policy into which a young man is putting money to-day may be still in force and paying monthly checks to his aged granddaughter a hundred years hence. That's a long time, and life insurance affords the only human machinery that can be set to run for a century or more with precision. You see, life insurance is, first of all, a science—the applied science of nature's mortality laws. For over two centuries its calculations have stood the test of experience. They are as sure as the calculations of astronomy.

"In both these sciences the personal equation, while it cannot be wholly avoided, is reduced to its lowest terms. And in life insurance all possible dangers through personal error are guarded against by 48 varieties of State laws and supervisions more rigid and exacting than are known in any other business. The other safeguard and guarantee of stability is that this business is peculiarly built upon broad averages in every direction.

"Life insurance investments get the strength and benefit of broad averages by three sorts of diversity: First, diversity of kind, including city and farm mortgages, and the widest variety of gilt-edge bonds. These two classes, with policy loans, include 90 per cent. of the assets. Second, diversity of space, by spreading these investments through all desirable parts of the land, with expert investment agents located in all sections. Third, diversity of time, each year's investments being added to the far greater bulk of securities obtained in past years, thus absorbing in the whole average the temporary fluctuations of market values and interest rates.

"Clearly, life insurance is the one institution of proven fitness to render this new service of lengthening the arm that each generation stretches out to help those who come after.

"The income service begins where the old policies left off. It does when the need begins and outlasts that need. It does for the family of the wage-earner or salaried man what no other machinery will do at all. For the rich man's family it does the vital part, the livelihood part, of the service he has sought through the trust company, and does it better.

"Lump sum life insurance is no longer the real thing in family protection. Monthly income insurance is that real thing. Its benefits endure. Its future development is beyond imagining. It will bind together in a steady progression the successive generations of mankind."

Local Arrangements.

President Miller and Secretary Leon F. Foss, of the Boston association, were responsible for the local arrangements in connection with the meeting and were the recipients of many warm congratulations. Every detail for the convenience of the delegates had been carefully planned. On motion of J. Everett Hicks, of the Boston association, a vote of thanks was extended to several of the speakers, who had traveled a long distance, and President Miller was also extended a vote of thanks for the graceful and capable manner in which he had presided over the sessions.

The date and place for holding the next congress will be announced early next year. The idea is to make the organization as simple and informal as possible, and it is understood among the various associations that the president and secretary of each association shall be members ex-officio of an executive council or committee on arrangements. This committee will be called together after the first of next year by the president of the Boston association, and the selection of a place for holding the next congress and the program of topics to be discussed will be arranged for at that time.

A Cincinnati Convention Reminder.

With the Cincinnati convention but a few months distant, local associations throughout the country are beginning to appoint delegates and alternates. As announced elsewhere in this number, the convention will be held on the 15th, 16th and 17th of September, at Cincinnati. As a preliminary reminder, A. F. Sommer, president of the Cincinnati association, has sent out the following communication to the president of each association:

"Just a few months until summer weather will bid us to forget the cares of business and invite us to betake ourselves to sea shore, mountain or country for recreation and rest. It is at this time that we survey the field for a spot presenting the greatest allurements. When you consider this matter, may we suggest that this year the vacations of all life insurance men either begin or end in the month of September, and in the Queen City of the West on the banks of the beautiful Ohio.

"Here is where the life insurance brains of the field will then scintillate. Here is where a new allegiance to the cause of humanity will be pledged. Here is where, in life insurance and entertainment, history will be made. Here is where good fellowship with all the stars in the life insurance firmament awaits you and here is where you are met by true Southern hospitality.

"We ask all members of the Life Underwriters' Association to so arrange their summer vacation schedule that they will be brought to Cincinnati during the middle of September, where a real live body of good fellows will show you what they can provide of profit and pleasure.

"At your next meeting you will kindly read this letter to your association, and say that to each of your members this is a very cordial invitation to come to Cincinnati and attend the national convention."

"Falsus in Uno, Falsus in Omnibus."

The temptation among insurance agents to conceal or shade the truth when he fancies it would prove advantageous is great, but advantage so gained is not real—is not a business success, and in the end is destructive, living only in memory as a plague. The agent, in common with other men, who is false in one thing is false in all and any seeming success is false and not lasting.—Preferred Pilot.

Big Difference Between "I Wish" and "I Will."

Every man dreams big things. The successful man is one who makes his dreams come true. So many men fail because they sit and dream of big things they are going to do tomorrow. They say, "I wish." The successful man says, "I will," and gets up and goes to work. Few men achieve success by one big stroke. As a matter of fact, enduring success is made up of numberless small achievements. Every big thing is composed of many little things, and the man who wins is the man who tackles the job just ahead and completes that and goes on to the next.—Old Line Life.

THE DOME DWELLER

By Robert J. Mix, Manager Prudential Insurance Co., New York City

ONCE UPON A TIME there was a man who decided to be shut up under a great iron dome! People tried to make him see that that was a dreadfully foolish thing to do, but he wouldn't budge, so they built the dome, placed it over him, and there he stayed day in and day out, year in and year out! Everywhere outside his self-imposed prison, the birds were singing, the flowers were blooming, the sun was shining and people, who for the most part were pretty good sort of folks, were living their lives, and, on the whole, rather enjoying themselves, but THIS CHAP INSISTED UPON REMAINING UNDER HIS DOME! He practically wasn't LIVING at all—he was missing all the things that make life worth while!

"He was either a crazy man or a fool," you tell me, and so he was; but do you know, friends, I sometimes think THAT YOU AND I ARE IN DANGER OF IMITATING THIS MAN! We don't shut ourselves up under an iron dome, to be sure, but we DO unconsciously confine ourselves within limits which are all too narrow; the BIG WORLD is all around us—the BLUE SKY is the only limit above our heads, and we don't REACH UP and STRETCH OURSELVES and EXPAND as we have a right to do—as it is EXPECTED that we will do!

It's a safe bet that comparatively few men EVER wake up to the knowledge that THEY'RE TRAVELING IN A VERY NARROW CIRCLE! Take yourself, for instance: do you suppose that you're anything like as BIG a man as you have a RIGHT to be—as you surely WILL be if you let yourself out? Have you ever tried to TAKE AN INVENTORY OF YOUR ABILITY—have you ever made a deliberate attempt to SEE WHAT SORT OF A MAN YOU COULD MAKE OF YOURSELF? If you're doing that sort of thing, then you're NOT under a dome—you're a GROWING man and your USEFULNESS IN THE WORLD and your EFFECTIVENESS will just as surely increase as your EFFORT continues! Tell me, my friend, has a man a Right to go on merely EXISTING? Isn't it the BOUNDEN DUTY of every individual to STRIVE CONTINUALLY—to develop EVERYONE OF HIS FACULTIES and thereby grow in the vocation which he has chosen?

A long time ago, I told you that I was strongly of the opinion that the MAJORITY OF LIFE INSURANCE AGENTS CLASSIFY THEMSELVES in about this fashion: THEY ARE $1,000 A YEAR MEN, OR $1,500 A YEAR MEN, OR $2,000 A YEAR MEN, OR $5,000, $6,000, OR $8,000 A YEAR MEN, these figures representing about the limit of income which each man seems to feel that it is up to him to earn, instead of feeling that THERE SHOULD BE NO LIMITS FIXED BY HIM TO HIS EARNING POWER—TO HIS EFFECTIVENESS AS A SALESMAN OF LIFE INSURANCE—the BEST "goods" ever sold by any living man!

The foolish chap that I described at the beginning of this letter could have had that iron dome removed in a minute IF HE HAD ONLY WILLED IT SO, and the glorious truth about you and me is that NO MAN CAN CONFINED US—THAT WE CAN GROW AND EXPAND AND BECOME BIGGER AND BETTER JUST IN PROPORTION TO OUR EFFORTS!

I repeat, my friends—this tendency to RESTRICT OURSELVES—to GROW NARROW—TO BE LITTLE WHEN WE MIGHT JUST AS WELL BE BIG—is natural to pretty nearly everyone of us—it's a tendency that we've got to RESIST—we've got to pinch ourselves every little while and WAKE UP—WAKE UP AND TAKE AN INVENTORY OF OURSELVES—find out whether we're GROWING and SPREADING—and if we find after an HONEST inventory that there's a DOME over us, for Heaven's sake, LET'S GET OUT FROM UNDER! This means YOU and it means ME and it means PRETTY NEARLY EVERY OTHER FELLOW!

DON'T—DON'T—DON'T LET'S BE DOME-DWELLERS—LET'S GET BUSY—LET'S BE LOTS BIGGER WRITERS OF LIFE INSURANCE!

SIZING UP THE PROSPECTIVE AGENT.

Those Impelled to Come; Those Compelled to Come, and a Few Expelled Who Come.

By Theodore A. Waltrip, Assistant Manager, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, Los Angeles, Cal.

The most interesting study of mankind is man, particularly so if that man aspires to be an agent of a life insurance company. One cannot spend many months in the office of a general agent without meeting all types of men. They come from all the walks of life, from factory, shop, store, office, railroad and ranch. They come from various motives and with varied ambitions. Some are impelled to come, some are compelled to come and a few are "expelled" who come.

It is the purpose of this article to indicate some of the things which general agents usually note, not that it will be helpful to general agents, but rather that it may aid some field men to see themselves as others see them, and thus assist them in correcting any detrimental habits they may have.

Dress.—Naturally the first thing that meets the general agent's eye is the man's clothes, their color, fit, age and general hang. It does not take long to determine how long a man has worn his coat, or how many weeks since his trousers were pressed, or his shoes shined, or his hat cleaned. A glance at the collar, tie, shirt-front and jewelry displayed all help to make a certain impression that is inseparably connected with the man's personality. True, "clothes do not make the man," but they do make an impression on the general agent as to what kind of a man is inside of them.

Posture.—The general agent who is a close observer and a student of human nature looks, of course, beyond the dress at the real man. He watches his gait, his posture. He observes him as he walks away and derives another impression from his step, his bearing, his composure. But while he is in the office these are the points he is noticing: the color of his hair and how he combs it, just how much he has to comb, the color of his eyes and how he uses them, whether he looks him straight in the face or keeps edging away on side glances, the shape of his face, forehead, chin, and whether he has used the razor since the last setting of the sun. He will take particular notice also of his teeth. There is no one thing that will impress the general agent more than the man's breath. If he possess not a sweet breath it is unfortunate for him, the whole agency and the insuring public with whom he must come in close personal contact. I am not referring to the man who has the odor of liquor or onions on him, but to the man whose stomach is sour or whose teeth are decayed, or who is an incurable dyspeptic.

Speech.—The foregoing have to do with the physical man and his dress and not the real man. We must get inside the "man's soul case." A man's speech will often betray him. His grammar, his diction, his tone, his gestures, all tell what kind of a man he is.

If he endeavors to monopolize the conversation, tells the general agent how much business he has written for another company and how much he can write for this in the next six months, providing a considerable advance and a big commission are allowed, the general agent has already formed his opinion of the man. His continued egotistical flow and gushing, gullible stories won't go down. It is much easier for a man to talk himself out of a job than it is to talk himself into one.

Character.—What is the man's character? That is the vital question that should concern and does concern the general agent. Is this man honest, truthful, sincere, energetic, ambitious, optimistic, zealous? Does he want work and is he willing to work? Will he stand square and play fair? Will he seek to serve the interest of the company and the insured? Is this man trying to deceive in any way? Is he Dr. Jekyll or Mr. Hyde? If he is attempting to deceive the general agent he will likely deceive the general public. The sooner, therefore, we know the real character of the man the better for the company. Some of the foregoing are little way marks on the road to character reading. There is one more source of information.

References.—A noted physician said to me recently: "After all, the most a physician knows about a man's infirmities is what the man honestly tells about himself." The references are supposed to give the man's reputation. But when the would-be agent begins to apologize and hesitate and over-look and evade the questions asked and give references that are fictitious names, that, too, helps the general agent to form his opinion, and it often counts for more than the letters that come in from the actual names submitted. The man whom the general agent most likes to see come in is the well dressed, neat, unassuming, erect, virile, positive, affable man who is willing to advise, not him, but with him, take the contract printed and go to work.

Four Little Devils.

There are four little devils that haunt every salesman.

The first is on the job bright and early; jumps on your shoulders and whispers: "No use trying to see your man before 9.30—give him time to open his mail." And if you waiver for an instant he straightway devours the front end of your precious morning.

The second little devil gets into the game at midday. "It is now a quarter to twelve," he adroitly suggests; "if you see a man now he will be hungry and will hustle you out so as not to be late for lunch." If you agree to this and knock off for lunch yourself he will tell you that "You won't see your man before 2 o'clock. He won't be back from lunch."

Early in the afternoon the third little devil appears and will whisper, "It's getting dark; you can't start an interview when your man will be tired and inattentive." And before you know it, this third imp will gobble up the other end of your day.

The fourth little devil is perhaps the worst of all. His day is Saturday. "You can't do anything on Saturday," he will say; "it's a short day, and no one will have time to listen." And so without even allowing you to start out, will swallow up the whole day.

If you don't watch out, these four little devils will steal every hour of all your days.

But they're liars—every one.—Equitable Agency Items.

Lending a Hand.

Life underwriters' associations have been of so much real good to the life insurance business that their value to it does not admit of discussion. They have aided in the eradication of some evils, have toned up the business and have materially improved its personnel. They have, in short, materially improved life underwriting conditions. We were led to these thoughts by the statement of an agent who said that he had withdrawn from his local association because it was of no especial value to him. That is a very selfish and wrong way in which to look at the matter. Anything which helps the business generally is a benefit to the individual agent and he owes it to himself and his fellow agents to "lend a hand" in the good work. The larger the membership of any association the greater its moral force, and instead of remaining on the outside and criticizing, every agent should become enrolled as a member and so make the association more efficient. If the organization is not just what he would like it to be, why not join it and help to increase its efficiency? The associations need the agents and the agents need the associations. As Rudyard Kipling says:

"The strength of the pack is the wolf,
And the strength of the wolf is the pack."

—The Indicator.

"The Paper Association."

Inspired perhaps by the phenomenal success of a certain life insurance company domiciled in New York City, in selling life insurance without solicitors, a New York agent has conceived the brilliant idea of organizing a new Life Underwriters' Association, to be managed and conducted through the mails.

The absurdity of the proposition serves as the only excuse for a recital of its purpose and plans. We do honestly confess, however, that there are certain facts set forth in the following story, which should receive the earnest attention of the Life Underwriters' Association of New York and other local bodies located at various points in the State. No action has been suggested that could not properly be considered by the local associations as they now exist.

If it has been impossible thus far to obtain a satisfactory solution to certain problems through the local associations of New York State, what particular brand of magic will accomplish the desired result through the United States mails? Evidently old Doc Cook is on the job again. "The Paper Association" is just about as thin as its name implies, absolutely impracticable and utterly visionary. But let the East-ern Underwriter tell the story:

There is considerable talk among prominent life underwriters in Greater New York concerning the formation of a new Life Underwriters' Association to operate independently of the Life Underwriters' Association of New York. The proposed association, should it materialize, will be styled The Paper Association, and confine its activities to metropolitan and State matters. Each agent on becoming a member of the organization will be required to sign a pledge binding him or her to report all complaints to the body in writing, and to vote on all matters and questions submitted to them through the organization in writing, thus guaranteeing a forceful expression of opinion for or against all points in dispute.

All meetings will be held on paper, the complaints and questions coming to the association's governing board or committee are to be collated and submitted to the members in writing for their attention and action. It is anticipated that this will bring about a larger and more hearty participation in the discussion of the many matters of importance to the life underwriter.

Those contemplating the formation of the new organization believe that the present Life Underwriters' Association does not obtain an expression of the views of its own members, to say nothing whatever of the views of life underwriters generally. In the New York association there are about three hundred members at the present time, and it is seldom that more than fifty are in attendance at the monthly meetings.

Attention is called to the fact that the superintendent of insurance licensed about 27,000 agents to write life insurance in New York State during 1913, and it is believed by real life insurance men—those who make their living selling life insurance—that that number is ridiculously large. The report of the department shows that there was ordinary business written in the State in 1913 of $295,816,360, which would give an average of less than $11,000 for each license.

In New York City alone there are probably 1,500 life insurance agents who make the principal part of their income from selling life insurance. It is estimated that there was probably $150,000,000 of life insurance written in New York City and vicinity in 1913, and with 1,500 men writing that amount the average would be $100,000 each. It is contended that these 1,500 agents should be consulted frequently and that their views should be known.

The qualifications for membership in the new organization will be:

1—Its members shall be reputable men who are real life insurance agents.

2—They shall consent to express their views from time to time in answer to every written question sent them.

As stated, the organization is to be conducted by mail. Questions are to be sent to the members and they are to answer such questions "yes," or "no" or "neutral." In this way the views of the life insurance fraternity will be known.

Among the first questions to the members of the proposed association will probably be found the following:

Do you think 27,000 life insurance licenses in New York State are too many?

If a life insurance agent is licensed for one company, do you consider another license necessary should he desire to place a case in another company?

Do you consider a bookkeeper eligible for a life insurance license?

Is it right that a general insurance broker should be allowed to place life insurance without any expense to himself for a license, while a life insurance agent is not permitted to place general insurance without passing an examination and paying the State $10?

Is it right as between citizens of the same State, that the manager of one company should be allowed to ask for 1,000 licenses for his company without charge and even without the knowledge of the men who are to be licensed, and that another manager may not apply for any license except at the expense of $2 to his company?

It is planned that the association shall be the aggressor, and instead of saying to the individual member "Go ahead and prosecute," the association will say, "We will handle the affairs of our members; we will lay all facts before the State insurance department head and district attorney."

The sponsors of this new association say that there are 15,000 agents licensed in New York City at the present time and maintain that there are probably of this number only 1,500 who are real life insurance agents; that some definite work will have to be done on the part of the 1,500 if licenses to sell life insurance are to be issued to life insurance men only.

The Farmer as a Prospect.

There are many general agents and managers with considerable territory in agricultural districts who are continually deprecating the unkind fate which has confined their operations to rural districts. Such men are prone to look with envious eyes upon that class of company representatives whose agency activities are almost exclusively within the larger cities. On the other hand, the metropolitan representative has intimate knowledge of the dangers, so far as eligible prospects are concerned, of high living, high business pressure and high blood pressure. It has been said on good authority that considering wealth per capita, the Wall Street district of New York, is the cause of more rejections by medical departments than any other section of the country.

We have been told times innumerable that our young men are deserting the farms and flocking to the cities, and poor old Silas, with the inevitable mortgage on the farm, has been the subject of our sincerest sympathy.

Notwithstanding, Silas is getting along pretty well, thank you! The actual facts with relation to the farmer are almost incredible. Of the total wealth of the United States, $50,000,000,000 is represented in farms. There are 10,000,000 people engaged in farming; which means that there are more persons connected with agricultural pursuits than in all other occupations combined. As to the farmers' financial ability to purchase life insurance, it would be well to remember that the income of the average farm family is more than twice that of the average city family.

Therefore it is apparent that the agent with country territory to cover is not, to say the least, at any great disadvantage as compared with the fields operated by his city brother.

As an additional word of encouragement, let us quote certain statements of Herbert Myrick, editorial director of the American Agriculturist:

Summer, almost here, finds agricultural conditions more perfect than at this date in years. The reserves of moisture in soil and subsoil are larger and more universally distributed throughout the country than at this time since similar conditions in 1896 resulted in the bumper crops which ushered in the good times that followed.

Now, as then, stocks of goods on merchants' shelves are small, people have liquidated their indebtedness, money is easy, winter wheat is in more than perfect condition and a full acreage is being planted to other crops.

With ample reserves of moisture, frequent cultivation will insure even against drought. The great crops now in prospect * * * indicate healthy improvement in business from now until harvest, to be followed by renewed activity in commerce and industry. Indeed, the business prosperity which should follow anything like a full harvest may exceed all expectations.

Conditions justify confidence, optimism and wise preparation for expanding business. This is my judgment after personally touring many States, getting special reports from all sections and weighing carefully every factor in the agricultural, industrial and financial situation. Except for untoward events, good times are at hand. Away with pessimism!

J. F. Kight Indicted.

J. F. Kight, of the Kight Audit and Abstract Co., was indicted for violating Section 29, act of June 1, 1911, of the laws of Pennsylvania, on April 30. Action was taken in pursuance of proceedings instituted by the Insurance Department of that State, but no date has as yet been set for the trial. The indictment recites, in substance, that Kight on October 28, 1913, made misleading representations and incomplete comparisons of two insurance policies issued by a New York company, with the intent of inducing the policyholder to allow them to lapse. It is reported that the counsel for the defendant intends to test the constitutionality of the act by a motion in the Quarter Sessions Court to quash the indictment.

Death of Hervey S. Dale.

Hervey S. Dale, general agent of the Union Mutual, at Chicago, after an illness of several weeks, died April 17, at Pass Christian, Miss. Mr. Dale was born at Stevens Point, Wis., July, 1857. His family moved to Chicago in 1864, and after graduating from high school, Mr. Dale was associated with his father in Government contracting. In 1878 General Sheridan appointed him to a position in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, and later he was promoted to chief of the department for the Chicago division. In 1890 he was appointed manager of the Union Mutual at Chicago. He was one of the veterans of the Chicago association, and on February 20, 1894, was elected treasurer, and each succeeding year was the unanimous choice of the membership for that office. At the 1913 convention of the National Association, he was elected treasurer of that body.

What the Local Associations Are Doing

Life Association News has no paid correspondents. We depend entirely upon the secretaries of local associations to send us stories of all meetings of their respective associations. If an account of the last meeting of your association does not appear in this department, ask the secretary of your organization why he did not send us the particulars.

Immediately after each meeting, on the same day if possible, secretaries of local bodies should send us a full account of the business transacted, including copies of all speeches, or extracts from the most important of them.

Akron.

Three new members were admitted at the regular meeting of the Akron association. The principal speaker was Rev. L. N. D. Wells, of the First Church of Christ. Wells claimed that the work of the life insurance agent is similar and next to that of the clergy; the clergy being interested in urging a man to provide for his future life in hereafter, and the life underwriter was endeavoring to convince the man of the necessity to think of the future welfare of his family after he himself has passed away.

Battle Creek.

F. W. Calvert, district manager of the New England Mutual in Battle Creek, Mich., is responsible for a round-up of insurance men which took place on April 28, for the purpose of organizing a local association. A considerable number of agents and managers signed applications to join. The second meeting will be held in the near future to elect officers.

Buffalo.

The members of the Buffalo association laid aside their books and suspended the pursuit of the prospect on the evening of April 28, to meet in the theater of the Buffalo Club for the most successful annual banquet the local insurance men have known. There were song and jest, comical monologues and sober serious speech.

The guest of the evening was Joseph A. DeBoer, of Montpelier, Vt., the president of the National Life Insurance Association. Mr. DeBoer proved an accomplished after-dinner speaker. His experience as former State Senator of Vermont and former representative in Congress gave promise. The other speakers of the evening included Henry W. Hill, former State Senator; J. M. Laird, of Hartford, actuary of the Connecticut General Life Insurance Co.; Dr. Vertner K.

n, and William D. Justice, of Buffalo. Joseph E. Gavin made a toastmaster of apt introductions.

During the dinner, the Electric City Quartette, from the stage of the theater, sang a dozen or more of the better sort songs and just as a preparation for the more serious speeches, W. F. Schmieding tangled up the German dialect a Dutch diversion and Frederic W. Zander had a whole lot of fun portraying Daniel Webster spoofing Rochester on the occasion of his only visit there.

What credit is due the life insurance agent for the reform and the advances that have been made was convincingly outlined by Mr. DeBoer. "The men in the front offices of many have learned," said he, "all the great lessons of insurance, not from their pleasant theories of finance hatched in those confines, but from the solicitor in the field.

It took the life insurance game just twenty-five years to learn that it was in business first of all to serve the public. The man who wanted insurance asked for this and for that. The solicitor came into the front office and demanded the same. The man in the shop, the man in the home, the yet made widows demanded those protections. So, step by step, we got policies which provided automatic extension, cash-up clauses, cash surrender values, loan values, etc. The possibility resting on the insurance men of to-day is nearly stupendous as the management of Government itself."

Mr. Hill pointed out that Buffalo's port to-day nearly equaled the commerce of London, and was already as great as that of Liverpool. He held that the Buffalo men have controlled the commercial policy of the State for the last twenty years, repeatedly by their stand being able to check vicious legislation originating from New York. Dr. Kenerson contributed to the thought that married men live longer and that there should be a bachelor tax imposed immediately on every unmarried man more than twenty-five years old.

Chattanooga.

The annual meeting of the Chattanooga association, held in the evening of May 1, at the Hotel Patten, proved one of the most interesting meetings the association has held during the two years of its existence.

The report of President J. W. Bishop showed that the association has made wonderful progress during the year. The most important report and one commented upon by the officers and a number of the members was that of the publicity committee, having in charge the publication of the Insurance News, which has proven largely responsible for the progress of the association. The fact that the plan of the local association has been termed the "Chattanooga Plan" by insurance men, insurance publications and newspapers from one end of the country to the other, and is being rapidly adopted by others, has served to direct attention to Chattanooga and give an unusual amount of advertising. The reports of the secretary and treasurer showed that the membership had grown and the finances of the association were in splendid shape. The election of officers resulted in the following:

Paul W. Shepherd, president.

Ed E. Brown, vice-president.

T. M. Keys, treasurer.

James M. McGaughy, secretary.

Executive committee—C. H. Royalty, chairman; J. W. Bishop and C. H. Grimm.

Following the business session the members repaired to the ball room, where the annual banquet was spread. On this occasion a number of invited guests, consisting of several Chattanooga business and professional men, were present and they all responded to toasts assigned to them. This proved to be quite a happy event and the occasion devolved itself into a regular love feast. The addresses by several of the members and those interested in the work of the association demonstrated the fact that they were keenly alive to the wonderful amount of advertising Chattanooga was receiving through the adoption of the Chattanooga Plan or Life Insurance News by the various organizations throughout the country. The chairman of the publicity committee, Julius J.

Cohn, coming in for considerable praise for the work he has done in promoting the plan. The retiring president, J. W. Bishop, was also warmly congratulated for his untiring efforts in preaching the gospel of insurance publicity to other organizations.

The program of the evening was as follows:

C. H. Royalty, toastmaster.

Address of retiring president, "Our Association," J. W. Bishop.

Address of incoming president.

"Life Insurance and the Pulpit," Rev. Ira M. Boswell.

"Life Insurance and the Press," Walter C. Johnson.

"Life Insurance—a Public Benefaction," Ed E. Brown.

"Life Insurance and the Examiner," Dr. Raymond Wallace.

"Life Insurance—a Necessity," Hon. Emil Wassman.

"Life Insurance and the Banker," Herbert Bushnell.

Chicago.

"Are you in favor of attempting to prevent the placing of life insurance policies in Chicago by anyone who is not a member of our association?" This was one of a series of questions sent out by President E. A. Ferguson, of the Chicago association, some time ago, in an endeavor to obtain a consensus of opinion. There was a considerable difference of opinion upon this one question, and it formed the main subject for discussion at the meeting of the Chicago association on the evening of April 23.

The following resolution was offered by J. F. Oates, of the Northwestern Mutual, and was unanimously adopted:

Be it resolved, That a representative committee of fifteen members of this association be appointed by the president:

1. To devise ways and means by which the will of the association as expressed in the recent replies to the president's circular may be carried out.

2. To devise plans for bringing into the membership of this association all of the life insurance men and women of Chicago.

3. To initiate efforts, the purpose of which shall be to limit the payment of commissions on life insurance to life insurance men only.

The committee as appointed by President Ferguson is as follows: S. T. Chase, Connecticut Mutual; I. H. Offner, Mutual Benefit; J. F. Oates, Northwestern Mutual; G. M. Herrick, Provident Life & Trust; J. D. Stevens, Massachusetts Mutual; H. D. Wright, Metropolitan; F. A. Cotharin, Union Central; R. W. Stevens, Illinois Life; G. H. Kromenaker, Mutual Life; Max Lindauer, Connecticut Mutual; Dr. H. C. Castor, Connecticut General; J. B. Thorsen, broker; F. E. Jones, New England Mutual; Alfred McArthur, National Life, U. S. A., and C. F. Axelson, Northwestern Mutual.

J. W. Janney, Provident Life & Trust, read resolutions in memory of Hervey S. Dale, who for many years was treasurer of the Chicago association, and at the Atlantic City convention was elected treasurer of the National Association.

The Executive Committee reported upon the deliberations of the Round Table Club, which is composed of the prominent general agents and managers affiliated with the local body. The membership of the association is now 378, and the clerical work in connection with it is considerable. It was therefore decided to pay the secretary a salary of $20 a month.

Each member was supplied with a circular giving the questions submitted by the president, together with the answers received. The opinions secured showed that a majority of the members did not favor having after dinner speakers who talked on subjects other than life insurance; that, on the contrary, they were in favor of addresses exclusively on life insurance, either by members of the association or others. It also developed that a majority preferred general discussions on such topics as rebating, twisting, unfair competition, etc. Nearly 80 per cent. of the members who expressed an opinion were willing to contribute toward the expense of prosecuting agents for infractions of the law against rebating and twisting, while a great many expressed a desire to contribute to the expense of securing more publicity for the association in order to strengthen its standing with the insuring public.

As to question ten, the votes were eighty-four in favor of attempting to prevent the placing of business by agents not members of the association; eighty-four voted against such proposition; eight members against attempting such action at this time, and twelve of those who voted on other questions did not answer this question.

The matter was then taken up for debate and the following participated in the discussion: C. F. Ayelson, Northwestern Mutual; George M. Herrick, Provident Life & Trust; J. H. Stevens, Massachusetts Mutual; Frank E. Jones, New England Mutual; F. A. Cotharin, Union Central; H. D. Wright, Metropolitan; Dr. H. C. Castor, Connecticut General; R. W. Stevens, Illinois Life; Alfred MacArthur, National Life U. S. A.; Max Lindauer, Connecticut Mutual; George A. Kromenaker, Mutual Life; James B. Thorsen, broker; Miss Sarah F. Jones, Equitable of New York; George F. Lust, National Life U. S. A.; John T. Burford, Standard Accident; Dr. A. E. Awde, Union Mutual; J. F. Oates, Northwestern Mutual.

There was much said on both sides of the question. H. D. Wright, superintendent of the Metropolitan, claimed that there were a large number of reputable insurance men who saw no particular reason why they should join the association and that the association should not under any circumstances attempt to prevent such men from placing business; that the correction of existing evils was largely in the hands of general agents and managers.

F. E. Jones favored legislation that would give the Insurance Commissioner authority to examine into the qualifications of agents before he licensed them.

John T. Burford advocated a policy whereby the association would create such a favorable opinion in the public mind that the insuring public would prefer to deal with members of the association, and R. W. Stevens said that the association ought to make membership in itself a badge of honor. Miss Sarah F. Jones, of the Equitable, gave a concrete instance of unfair competition.

Cincinnati.

With a view to permitting healthy competition in annual elections, Charles J. Stern, at the regular April meeting of the Cincinnati association, introduced an amendment to the constitution permitting a month to elapse between the report of the nominating committee and the election of officers. The amendment was adopted and President Sommer appointed as members of the committee J. S. Drewry, C. J. Iredell and Ralph Holterhoff.

The meeting was held at noon at the Business Men's Club, with Dr. Lee K. Frankel, sixth vice-president of the Metropolitan Life, guest of honor. Among other guests present were Major Brinkerhoff, of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, and a number of officials of local companies. A telegram was received from Millard W. Mack, who was attending the meeting of the executive committee of the National Association. Mr. Mack regretted his inability to be present at the meeting, but stated that from the plans discussed in New York with regard to the coming convention that gathering promised to be the most successful in the history of life underwriting.

Dr. Frankel's subject was "The Ideal Agent and His Equipment." He declared that life insurance should be no longer looked upon as a business; that it should be considered as a social institution, and that agents must realize the necessity of being able to meet the changed conditions. He said that the time was coming when a life insurance agent would find it necessary to be as well educated in his special line as the lawyer or doctor or minister, and that in Germany at the present time the universities have courses preparing a man for life insurance salesmanship. Dr. Frankel was much interested in and discussed the results that had been accomplished in Cincinnati with regard to the public welfare. Cincinnati had reduced its typhoid rate to one of the lowest in the United States.

Major Brinkerhoff discussed the assistance that life insurance men could give in educating the public by means of legislation. It was his opinion that many of the burdensome laws placed upon the statute books were not due to a spirit of vindictiveness on the part of legislators, but rather to their ignorance.

In the evening Dr. Frankel addressed the students of the University of Cincinnati on "Conservation as Applied to Life Insurance."

Columbus.

A business session of the Columbus association was held at the Athletic Club on the evening of April 20. Movement was started to organize a Columbus-Cincinnati Convention Club. Last year the attendance at the Atlantic City convention was quite satisfactory and this year it is proposed to send a much larger delegation to Cincinnati. Dr. Lee Frankel, sixth vice-president of the Metropolitan Life, was the principal speaker. The subject of his address was "Conservation of Life and Preservation of Health." Dr. Frankel went into his subject thoroughly and presented many new facts to his audience. Several applications for membership were received and Charles E. Holmes, the new Columbus manager of the Mutual of New York, was elected.

Delaware.

The regular April meeting of the Delaware Association was held in Hanna's Cafe in Wilmington. At the meeting two new members were admitted, Frank L. Cates and John Dougherty, both of whom were present. The various reports of the officers were read, showing the association to be in an excellent condition.

C. B. Palmer, secretary of the organization, who is also Delaware representative of the association on the national executive committee, made an excellent report of the last meeting of that board. A letter was received from the Cincinnati association, asking the members to be present at the national convention which will be held in that city in September.

Aubrey Vandever, a member of the association, made an address on "How to Get Applications." A vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Vandever.

It was voted to have the meeting in the evening instead of noon as heretofore.

Jeremiah McDonough will make the address at the next monthly meeting and his subject will be "Agency Organization." One new application was received for membership. City Treasurer James F. Price, president of the organization, presided. Besides those mentioned the following were present: W. W. Knox, Arthur W. Swarts, George D. Kelly, Jr., C. Higgins and Frank C. Hughes.

Detroit.

Warren M. Horner, chairman of the National Committee on Education and Conservation, addressed the members of the Detroit association at a special meeting held on April 22. Mr. Horner explained the modified plans of the committee represented. Mr. Horner emphasized the benefits which would accrue from local advertising by referring to the success of his own agency in Minneapolis, where he had advertised in the local newspapers. During the past year he had written an unusually large amount of personal business, had called upon only twelve or fifteen prospects. All of this had come to his office as a result of his advertising.

The speaker dwelt upon the plans for institutional advertising, stating that in the funds raised, three-quarters of the amount is to go to local associations for local publicity, while the remainder is to be remitted to the National Committee on Education and Conservation. Among the members who gave approval of the scheme were Donald Clark, of the Mutual Benefit; H. Wibirt Spence, of the Mutual Life; W. D. Clibee, of the Pacific Mutual; Charles S. White, of the Northwestern Mutual, and Raymond Russell, of the Mutual Perfit. The matter is to be brought before a business meeting of the association for formal action.

The part-time man was the subject for discussion at a meeting of the association held on the 1st inst. Henry Farmer, of the Phoenix Mutual, started the ball rolling by declaring that part-time men did not have sufficient knowledge of the business or experience to explain the policy provisions, particularly in the case of income or business insurance. Mr. Farmer believed that the part-time man should be eliminated because he militates against the work of the full-time man.

Donald Clark, of the Mutual Benefit, supported Mr. Farmer so far as one case of part-time men is concerned. He was of the opinion, however, that there was a field for the part-time man, particularly in small towns, where frequently he develops into a full-time man. He was in favor of a law which would require every agent who applied for a license to pass an examination, showing himself qualified to engage in the business.

C. W. Lisk, of the Northwestern, told how unsatisfactory conditions were when he found himself in competition with brokers, bootblacks and other part-time men.

H. Wibirt Spence remarked that in many instances the part-time man was an evil, particularly in cities, and that the same objections that have been raised as to part-time men could also be made with regard to the lazy full-time man.

A. G. Richards was of the opinion that the solution to the problem would be found when general agents refused to license part-time men.

National Executive Committeeman Henry Farmer reported briefly upon the recent meeting of the National Executive Committee. It was decided that the June meeting should be postponed. A Cincinnati Convention Club was started and a roll will be kept open for some time. A committee was named to draft suitable resolutions on the sudden death of John J. Oliver, secretary of the Michigan State Life.

District of Columbia.

National Vice-President Edward A. Woods delivered an address before the District of Columbia association on the 1st inst. Mr. Woods declared that the taxation of life insurance funds in the United States directly affects twenty-five million people. Among the other speakers were Senator Sherman, of Illinois; Representative Goulden, of New York; Representative Campbell, of Kansas; National President Ernest J. Clark, and Charles F. Nesbit, Superintendent of Insurance of the District of Columbia.

Grand Rapids.

Warren M. Horner and H. Wibirt Spence were the principal speakers at a meeting of the Grand Rapids association, held on April 25. Mr. Horner's remarks were largely devoted to the institutional advertising campaign, although he touched on other subjects of interest to his audience. Mr. Spence followed and supported Mr. Horner's arguments. As there was present a number of prominent citizens, both speakers took this occasion to talk non-technically.

Indiana.

Outlines of the general plan for a national campaign of education on the subject of life insurance were given by Warren M. Horner, of Minneapolis, in an address at a dinner given by the Indiana association at the Hotel Severin on the evening of April 16.

Mr. Horner took the position that life insurance is not understood by the public, and that a campaign of education, conducted by the insurance people themselves, would be of great benefit to the public, as well as to those engaged in the insurance business. The campaign is to be carried on through the medium of institutional advertising in publications of national circulation. These advertisements will be entirely impersonal and will not name or make reference to any company or agent or any individual plan or form of policy. The purpose, as explained by Mr. Horner, is to acquaint the people with life insurance as an institution without advertising any company. The entire expense of carrying on this campaign will be borne by life insurance agents all over the country, the plan providing for a tax of 5 cents on each $1,000 of insurance written by agents who agree to contribute to the fund. Already the National Association is committed to the plan, and many State and local associations also have fallen in line.

In addition to the national campaign, it is planned to have local associations supplement the work with local campaigns of education, conducted along similar lines.

It was brought out by Mr. Horner that the life insurance companies had been solicited to contribute to the educational fund, but that they had declined to do so. The objections raised by the companies, he said, were numerous. They said if they started in on a campaign of advertising they would be hounded to death by solicitors for all kinds of advertising. Another objection was that the plan might help a mail order insurance company. Other objections raised were that the agents themselves should pay the bills; policyholders might object to the use of their money for the education of the public, and that the companies do not wish to come together on any common ground. But Mr. Horner said he thought the principal trouble with the companies was a lack of sympathy with the general proposition. He designated this stand as a short-sighted policy on the part of the companies. He predicted great benefit to the insurance business as a whole from the campaign just being started.

Charles F. Coffin, vice-president of the State Life Insurance Company, of Indianapolis, made a short talk, in which he took issue with Mr. Horner regarding the position of the companies. He said that under present insurance laws in many of the states the companies would not be permitted to spend money for the purpose of education, and that this was the one great reason why they were not able to join in the movement. It was not from a lack of sympathy on the part of the companies, he said.

Charles H. Orr, of Ft. Wayne, made a speech in which he explained the campaign of education through newspaper advertising that the life insurance agents of that city are carrying on, the plan being similar to the one proposed in Mr. Horner's plan.

The Indiana association celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its organization on May 4 at the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce. President George W. Wilson, of the State Life, officiated. E. A. Edwards, of Edwards & Osborne, general agents in Indiana for the Provident Life & Trust, gave an interesting talk on reminiscences. It was an interesting fact that Mr. Edwards is the only charter member of the association who is still identified with it. The following new members were admitted: J. L. Shields, Phoenix Mutual; Albert Kahler, Indianapolis Life, and Frank L. Jones, Equitable, of New York.

Northern Indiana.

A resolution to the effect that the members of the Northern Indiana association will not favor any attempt to escape taxation under the new income law, and will go on record as opposed to any such proposition, was passed yesterday at the noon meeting of the association held at the Commercial Club. The resolution was submitted to W. Orr and C. B. Fitch, to be properly worded for the minutes.

The discussion regarding "Life Insurance News," which is a new form of advertising by the association, took up much of the meeting time. C. W. Orr, a member of the executive committee of the national association, also read a report of the meeting held recently at New York City.

The members of the Northern Indiana association are counting on more than filling the ten places allowed them at the Cincinnati convention. They predict that a large number besides those who will represent the Northern Indiana association officially will be in attendance.

Iowa.

The Iowa association held a meeting on the 2d inst. at the Grant Club in Des Moines. There was a discussion of the next meeting, which will be held at Colfax, thirty miles east of Des Moines. At this time the wives and lady friends of members will be entertained by the association. There were also general discussions on "Fitting the Policy to the Man," and "Insurance at Risk."

Kalamazoo.

The first regular meeting of the Kalamazoo association was held at noon on April 20 in the Commercial Club Rooms and was largely attended. Many new members were secured and the association has a very auspicious start. Mr. Leslie P. York, of Kansas City, Mo., southwestern representative of the Equitable of New York, was guest of the association at its noonday lunch.

Mr. York addressed the members, outlining the route which will develop the recently organized association into a powerful, influential and successful body. Mr. York spoke on the subject, "Efficiency in Life Insurance Salesmanship." Mr. York impressed the value of perfect business methods in accomplishing the best results, declaring that any man in any business or profession could not possibly be successful unless he treated his clients, customers or prospects, as the case might be, on the square. Mr. York declared the insurance business to be the greatest business of the age. He cited facts which proved the insurance assets to be second in the world only to the combined assets of the railroads of the United States, exceeding five billion dollars.

Kansas City.

The April meeting of the Kansas City association was in the nature of a jollification at the Baltimore Hotel. About 50 members with their wives and guests enjoyed a banquet, danced, played cards, listened to inspiring talks and witnessed some vaudeville stunts by the members. The entire second floor of the hotel was reserved for the association.

Knoxville.

The regular monthly meeting of the Knoxville association was held on April 25. The following new members were admitted: J. H. Newman, Union Central; S. E. Turner, Mid-Continent Life; Chas. G. McNabb, Mid-Continent Life; R. W. Mizell, Union Central; H. C. Kine, Mid-Continent Life; Thomas L. Cate, Home Life, and Grover C. Summers, Pacific Mutual.

A. S. Caldwell, vice-president of the Volunteer State Life, delivered an interesting address, in which he urged attendance at the regular meetings of the association as being essential to fulfilling the objects thereof as well as for gaining information and enthusiasm so necessary for the successful pursuit of the profession. Mr. Caldwell endorsed the plans of the Committee on Education and Conservation, showing the great benefit which would result in the public mind.

T. S. McKinney, who represented the association at the mid-year meeting of the National Executive Committee, briefly reported the proceedings of that gathering and dwelt particularly upon the advisability of organizing a Cincinnati convention club. He also urged the prompt payment of annual dues to the National Association, and gave some attention to the work of the National Committee on Taxation and the proposed textbook now in the course of preparation.

A movement was inaugurated for organizing a Knoxville-Cincinnati convention club.

Lansing.

The Lansing association met at noon on April 11, at the Hotel Downey, to enjoy a banquet and to vote upon the question of entering the National Association.

The principal speaker at the banquet was H. Wilbirt Spense, of Detroit, representative of the National Association. Before the banquet Mr. Spense said, "The object and purpose of the national organization is to advance the best interests of the cause of true life insurance, and this is done principally along educational lines. Instructors are now giving lectures in colleges, universities and high schools all over the country, and one will lecture at M. A. C. soon."

"Life insurance is generally misunderstood by the public. Some of the people's minds have become fogged concerning it, and they are believing it is an intricate and difficult proposition, which is a mistake. Simple, plain life insurance should be understood by everybody, and it is our intention to have it looked upon as an institution. If the women really understand what life insurance really means to them, many more of them would be protected by it. A wife is sometimes indifferent, or luke-warm on the question of having her husband insure his life for her benefit, but we hope as soon as we can, through our educational efforts, to make her understand what it really is, that we will be able to protect many more widows and orphans."

Favorable action was taken and Mr. Spense was authorized to present the application for membership of the association to the officers of the National Association.

Lima.

Among the speakers at the regular April meeting of the Lima association was Assistant Superintendent of Agencies Hommemyer, of the Union Central, and John Allam, president of the Toledo association. The past month has been the first of this association in its publicity campaign, but during this short period the members feel that results have been secured. It is the intention of the association to publish three articles each month for distribution among local newspapers.

Los Angeles.

The Life Underwriters' Association of Los Angeles has introduced an innovation in the form of a series of meetings at which technical subjects relating to life insurance are given a prominent place on the program. The plan is proving valuable in increasing the membership of the association, and is also highly profitable to the members attending. The March meeting of the Los Angeles association was devoted to a discussion of the legal side of the subject of trusts, comparisons being made with life insurance. The address was made by Judge William R. Hervey. The April meeting was an evening with the medical department, and three strong addresses were made by medical men of authority. About eighty members and guests, sixteen of whom were practicing physicians, attended the meeting.

After the dinner and usual preliminaries, President Chipron called on former President Frank E. McMullen to announce the purposes of the meeting. Dr. Harley E. MacDonald, who is an authority on blood pressure, was the first speaker of the evening. Dr. MacDonald spoke on "Blood Pressure," illustrating his lecture with the sphygmomanometer, an instrument of his own invention, and a chart, "How to Live a Hundred Years." He stated that 11 per cent. of all applicants for life insurance are rejected, but that with proper use of his instrument that ratio can be reduced to 5 per cent. He showed how both diagnosis and prognosis are greatly aided by taking the blood pressure. He also stated that persons who are overweight or underweight, or have moved to new locations to benefit their health, should subject themselves to the blood pressure test, for doing which they may receive favorable consideration by the medical department, even though they had been previously rejected.

Dr. J. E. Cowles, the next speaker, supplemented Dr. MacDonald's address with practical tests which he had made. He then gave a complete analysis of the human heart, with an explanation of blood circulation. He said that not more than 20 per cent. of the power of which the heart is capable is used under normal conditions. The remaining 80 per cent. is reserved for unforeseen contingencies. Speaking of the mechanism of the heart, he asked how many men-made engines would run without stopping for eighty or even a hundred years. His paper contained many suggestions which should have a tendency to place the agent in closer sympathy with the work of the medical department. Dr. John R. Haynes, who is a national authority on life conservation, brought this portion of the program to a close with an interesting paper on "Conservation of Lives," reciting many facts and figures relating to mortality experience.

Louisiana.

"When Does Competition Cease" was the subject discussed at the monthly luncheon-meeting of the Louisiana association, t Kolb's restaurant, New Orleans, April 28. President Crawford H. Ellis, presided and there was a large attendance and a great deal of interest shown in the discussion. H. L. Garic, of the New England, chairman of the committee on entertainment, outlined the subject and paved the way for its consideration. J. W. Smither, of the Union Central, was in favor of any action that meant ethical and correct practices in competition. He elaborated on the idea in an interesting way.

Dr. E. G. Simmons, of the Pan-American, said, in part: "I believe that competition should cease when the application has been signed and the applicant has submitted to a medical examination at the hands of the company's regular examiner. I can see no good reasons why the same business principles that apply to other lines of business in the United States should not apply to the business of life insurance. For example: A man orders from a wholesale grocery house a bill of goods, the same to be shipped on certain terms and conditions. If the goods are delivered in accordance with the order made for the same, he must accept that bill of goods or else his credit will be materially affected with the wholesale houses in the country. Again, how long would a retail merchant last if he refused to accept goods shipped to him that he had ordered in good faith? It would not be long until he would not be able to buy a dollar's worth of credit anywhere in the United States."

D. R. Metzger, of the Metropolitan, said that his position on the subject was governed by instructions from his company and that these orders absolutely forbade any undue advantage being taken of a competitor. He mentioned an instance where he had written an application for $10,000, his prospect telling him that he had taken out a policy in the Pacific Mutual and had been asked by the agent of that company to consider an additional policy amounting to $4,000. When the policy was sent out from the Metropolitan, instructions came with it not to deliver until the Pacific Mutual had been given the opportunity to deliver the extra $4,000. Mr. Metzger said this very clearly defined the attitude of his company on this question.

"I believe," said T. P. Thompson, of the Equitable, "that competition should cease so far as one's butting into another man's business—before it begins. Every man should have insurance and almost every man with a policy has too little. Why should I devote my time to aggressive and predatory work when by walking further down the block I may find another prospective customer? Why get into a controversy and strain one's nerves for half a chance when you can calmly have another man, just as good, all to yourself. When I am challenged to competition I gladly enter the lists. When someone comes in on my business I am quite ready for defense and eager for comparison. I am ready to show the virtues of my company's insurance, but I will not try to drag the other fellow's company down to do this. This is not for any 'holier than thou' reason, but purely as a matter of policy. Dignity and proper defense, also the sincere assurance of your company's integrity and that it will carry out its obligations, that economies are well preserved in its methods—these things all count best in my judgment."

Wilson Williams, of the New England Mutual, said:

"It is hard to define the bounds of competition when so many different methods are employed in soliciting life insurance. No two men canvass alike, and the successful producer gets results very often because of his original methods. There are any number of agents in this city who never sell insurance until they have the policy in hand. Competition in such cases certainly cannot be considered closed with the examination of the prospect. He is not at that time even an applicant. By the agent's own agreement he is only obligated to 'look the policy over.' This privilege of inspection before giving his decision certainly leaves the case open to competition until settlement of the premium is effected, and this alone should end the competition on such cases."

"If before medical examination, it is known that an applicant has signed with the understanding that policy, if issued as applied for, will be accepted and paid for, this statement by the applicant should end the competition, because of the binding contract already made. This method of writing business is to be commended, and for the best interests of our business should be encouraged. No agent need fear competition from my office on such cases."

J. H. LaSance, of the New York Life, believed in fair methods and endorsed generally the remarks made by Mr. Thompson. So long as the case is open he would use his best efforts to obtain the business.

Frank L. Levy, of the Equitable, stated that it was very difficult at all times to draw a sharp, well-defined line as to where competition should cease. He stated that in the main he agreed with the sentiments expressed by Mr. Metzger, of the Metropolitan; Mr. Smither, of the Union Central, and Mr. Thompson, of the Equitable.

He placed himself emphatically on record as opposing that kind of competition that involves the undoing of work already done by a competitor, the unsettling of the applicant's mind by forcing competition on him in cases where the applicant had gone so far as to make a decision to give his business to a solicitor who had previously obtained his application and had him examined.

Western Massachusetts.

The Western Massachusetts association held a meeting on April 24 at Springfield. The speakers were Benjamin Franklin, of Pontiac, Mich., and Guy F. Wheeler, agency secretary of the Provident Life & Trust of Worcester. Mr. Wheeler delivered his address on "The Psychology of Salesmanship from the Agents' Viewpoint."

Memphis.

The Memphis association did two things at a meeting which was held at the Chickasaw Club at noon on April 24.

A plan looking toward a system of educational publicity on non-partisan lines advertising life insurance was discussed and probably will be undertaken and the officers for the ensuing year were elected.

The following will be in the saddle for the coming year:

J. E. Lippitt, president; J. B. Marmon, vice-president; C. A. Weathers, secretary; J. W. McKinney, treasurer; G. M. Anderson, W. G. Erskine, Henry Lake, Jim Rawlings, Joe Smith and C. D. Williford, executive committee.

Minneapolis.

Insurance Commissioner Preus, of Minnesota, declared at the April meeting of the Minnesota association that he thought the companies should decline to renew the licenses of all agents who, after one year's service, are unwilling to devote their full time to soliciting. Mr. Preus' remarks had largely to do with agency organization and efficiency. He stated that the agent's or agencies' first duty was to the State, while the second duty was service to the prospect in fitting the policy to the man. With regard to his emphatic views on the part-time question, he excepted agents in rural communities whose business is exclusively insurance. Rebating and twisting, he attributed largely to part-time men scattered through business institutions. Several new members were admitted.

Secretary Harry W. Butts read a letter from C. E. Learned, secretary of the St. Paul association, inviting the members to be present at a dinner to be held at the Commercial Club of St. Paul on May 4. A communication was also read from A. F. Sommer, president of the Cincinnati association, urging a large attendance for the annual convention. The next meeting of the association will be held on the 23d inst., and the subject to be discussed will be "The Part-Time Man."

Nashville.

At the April meeting of the Nashville association a committee composed of President W. A. Alexander, N. A. Crockett, Reau A. Folk and Lee L. Loventhal was appointed to prepare resolutions on the question of taxation. The following resolution had been prepared by the committee and was unanimously adopted:

Whereas, The institution of life insurance is one of the most beneficent in our civilization, yielding only to the church and schoolhouse in its upbuilding and uplifting influence upon our social and economic life; and

Whereas, Such an institution is entitled to and should receive every encouragement and consideration from government; and

Whereas, The life insurance companies doing business in this State are called upon to pay, in addition to property and other taxes, a burdensome privilege tax of two and one-half per cent. (2½%) upon the gross premiums received from business in this State; and

Whereas, This is entirely disproportionate, constituting an impost that cannot be justified on the underlying theory of taxation that the burdens of government should be distributed in accordance with benefits received from government; and

Whereas, The burden necessarily falls upon the policyholder; and

Whereas, It is repugnant to every sound principle of social economics that so heavy a tribute should be required of the citizen who, with loving forethought, is making through life insurance provision against want and charity for his loved ones; and

Whereas, The State property gives recognition to the beneficent relation of life insurance to society, through the exemption from taxation of fraternal orders furnishing life protection; and

Whereas, No just reason can lie for exempting one branch of the institution of life insurance and taxing another branch; therefore be it

Resolved, by the Nashville Association of Life Underwriters, that we recognize the premium tax of two and one-half per cent. (2½%) now imposed by this State as burdensome, disproportionate to other tax imposts, unjust and in view of the nature of life insurance wholly unwarranted. Be it

Resolved, That the members of this association pledge themselves to the task of enlightening policyholders to the fact that this tax necessarily falls upon them, so that a public sentiment will be created which will be reflected in proper remedial measures by our legislators.

New Jersey.

At the Down Town Club in Newark, on April 30, the New Jersey association held its third annual banquet. President Theodore F. Keer officiated as toastmaster. Among the speakers were Vice-President Edward W. Rhodes, of the Mutual Benefit; James V. Barry, assistant secretary of the Metropolitan; F. W. Tasney, supervisor of the Prudential; Donald G. C. Sinclair, former president of the New York association, and Robert F. Ross.

New York.

Edward A. Woods, vice-president of the National Association, disclaims all ability as an orator, yet those who listened to his address before the April meeting of the New York association are inclined to dispute his modest opinion. The meeting was held on the evening of April 22 in the Rose Room of the Hotel Astor, with an attendance far below that which was anticipated.

Seldom, if ever, have the members of the New York association listened to an utterance more inspiring than the message of Mr. Woods. While the speaker touched lightly upon the taxation problem, his remarks were largely devoted to the modern idea of service to the policyholder. He told of conditions in the days of his father and when he was a boy. His father was a college professor, but made shopping trips to market with a market basket over his arm, while he, the son, ran around bare-footed during the summer months. In the days of his father, Mr. Woods said, the blacksmiths were the dentists. He brought his story down to date by tracing the improvement in transportation facilities and in the establishment of the telephone and telegraph lines and all the other various adjuncts of modern progress in inventive ability, showing how cheapness is frequently at the expense of service and that the modern idea is service rather than price. "You can go to Pittsburgh by the B. & O.," said he, "or you can go to Pittsburgh by the Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania route will cost more money, but you can get infinitely better service and at the same time you get there sooner."

In developing his subject the speaker declared that 25 or 30 years ago it was seldom that a life insurance agent even thought of fitting the policy to the needs of the policyholder; that in those days it was much safer to mail a policy than to deliver it personally and be under the necessity of explaining its provisions or lack of provisions. Such agents could not write business under existing conditions. He made a strong plea for the elimination of the part-time man, especially in metropolitan districts, as the part-time man or one-case agent did not have the experience or knowledge necessary to give the policyholder expert advice.

Public opinion, he thought, was a fairly good guide, and when an agent deserved respect he was treated accordingly, but when conditions were such that any man might obtain a license to solicit insurance the agents deserved the cold reception which was sometimes given them.

An experience of good service was cited by Mr. Woods in the case of a woman who had just come into possession of $1,200 on a policy on the life of her husband. The agent took the widow to a bank and induced her to deposit $1,000 at interest and saw to it that she opened a check account for the $200 balance. As an illustration of the dangers which frequently befall beneficiaries without the expert advice of an experienced life insurance salesman, Mr. Woods called attention to a case with which he was personally acquainted. A wealthy man in Pittsburgh died in February, leaving his wife life insurance to the extent of $300,000, and every cent had been dissipated by the widow in several weeks. He also mentioned another case where a $4,000 claim was paid to a widow who had always lived in ordinary circumstances in a mill town in Pennsylvania. She immediately invested $1,800 of the sum in a piano player. Statistics proved, said the speaker, that a large majority of estates over $5,000 are dissipated in seven years. Another instance cited by Mr. Woods was in the case of where the widow of a rich man received $500,000 from accident and life policies. The estate owned a laundry and several other large enterprises. At the present time, however, this woman, who is 70 years old, has lost everything and is working as a laborer in the laundry which she formerly owned. Mr. Woods declared that he had never seen a case of a widow with too much life insurance and that, generally speaking, there was no such thing as over-insurance.

He then discussed the taxation problem and later in the evening mentioned the fund being raised to pay expenses of counsel in an income tax test case.

Several new members were admitted. Louis L. Hopkins, a member of the National Committee on Education and Conservation, explained the modified plans of his committee as decided upon at the mid-year meeting of the executive committee of the national body held on the previous day.

Nebraska.

D. L. Johnston, a prominent attorney of Omaha, was the principal speaker at the May meeting of the Nebraska association, held at Omaha on the 2d inst. Mr. Johnston wrote the present "Law of Decedents," and fully explained its provisions and the reasons for their adoption. The next regular meeting will be the last before the summer vacation.

Oregon.

Fifty members and guests were present at the regular monthly meeting of the Oregon association held on April 21 at the Commercial Club in Portland. Section 2 of the by-laws was amended by action of the association to read as follows:

The association membership shall be composed of such duly elected city sub-agents, medical examiners and office employees of legal reserve life insurance companies licensed to operate in the State of Oregon. They shall be entitled to all the privileges accorded to active membership.

A communication was read from Garner Curran, deputy commissioner of the World's Insurance Congress, with reference to holding an insurance day on April 19, 1915, at the Panama-Pacific World's Exposition. The object of this communication was to arouse interest in this proposed insurance day, to the end that a large delegation from Oregon might be present at that time in San Francisco. A committee was appointed to take the matter in hand.

The secretary announced that a membership campaign would be inaugurated during the next 30 days with the purpose in view of bringing into the association all reputable agents who are not now affiliated with the association. Insurance Commissioner Von Valkenberg, of Idaho, gave an interesting talk relative to securing business in his State.

Horace Mecklem, general agent of the New England Mutual, delivered a remarkable address relative to his system of selling life insurance. Mr. Mecklem illustrated his talk by a chart, showing scientific observations of the value of each call made by him and the value of each day's work throughout a period of four years and three months. It was the consensus of opinion that this address was a magnificent exemplification of what work and persistent attention to the details of the business would enable any man to do.

Mr. Millor, supervisor of agencies for the Connecticut Mutual, gave a talk reviewing the history of life insurance over a period of 30 years.

A. H. Averill, president of the Portland Chamber of Commerce, was present as a guest of honor and discussed the plans which his organization has in view for the upbuilding of Oregon.

Horace D. Ramsdell, president of the Portland Commercial Club, spoke for a few minutes and gave his ideas as to what should constitute an agent's ideal with respect to his relation to his client.

The large attendance and the character of this meeting was particularly inspiring to the officers of the association, as it shows a tendency on the part of the Oregon underwriters to come to the front and be a force in the community, not only among life insurance men but among the general public.

Central Pennsylvania.

Largely as a result of the efforts of the newly elected president of the Harrisburg association, Dick Oliver, a very successful banquet was held by the association on the evening of April 30, at the Engineers' Club. Mr. Oliver presided and National President Ernest J. Clark and National Vice-President E. A. Woods were the speakers.

The entire membership of the Harrisburg association, numbering 18, was present and in addition 22 invited guests, most of whom were agents from adjacent cities and towns. The purpose of the meeting was to increase the association by non-resident membership. This was a signal success. Applications with dues paid for a year were received from 23 men.

President Clark spoke very effectively on the subject of "Advantages of Membership in Local and National Bodies," and Mr. Oliver, in his characteristically forceful manner, presented the ever-interesting subject, "Taxation." A gain of over 100 per cent. in membership in one evening, inasmuch as the previous membership comprised almost all of the leading men in the life insurance business in Harrisburg, is good progress and it is the hope and expectation of the association that it will double its membership again within a few months.

In order to better typify the aim of the association the name has been changed from the Harrisburg Association of Life Underwriters to the Central Pennsylvania Association of Life Underwriters.

In an effort to express their appreciation of the services of Mr. Clark and Mr. Woods the members enthusiastically voted both men honorary life members of the local body.

Pittsburgh

The speakers at the regular April meeting of the Pittsburgh association were T. H. B. McKnight, of the Pennsylvania lines, and C. F. C. Arensberg, of Patterson, Crawford, Miller & Arensberg, attorneys at law. This was the first meeting presided over by the new president, William M. Duff, and it was held in the English room of the Fort Pitt Hotel on the evening of April 20, dinner being served at 6.30.

In the course of his remarks Mr. McKnight stated that he carried over 70 different policies. The speaker dwelt largely upon the systematic keeping of accounts and the budget system and illustrated his talk by the use of charts. The subdivisions of expenses he classified as follows:

Investment—Includes amounts invested, put into savings accounts, insurance premiums, interest on money borrowed for purchase of securities, etc.

Rent—Covers rent, if one lives in a rented house; or maintenance of property, repairs, renewals, interest on mortgage, insurance, and property taxes if house is owned.

House—Includes expense of running the household—details to be kept in a separate account.

Allowances—Certain portion of income to be turned over to wife for her personal expenses and charities—also similar allowances to children as they grow old enough.

Educational—Covers schooling of children, lectures, concerts, theaters, excursions, amusements, etc.

Stewardship—Covers church dues and all contributions to charity.

Personal—Includes all a man's personal expenses, clothing, car fare, tobacco, etc.

Medical Attention—Covers those unexpected and irregular but certain expenses for doctors, dentists, oculists, etc.

Taxes—Covers occupation, income and all taxes but those on house occupied by owner which are included under rent.

From an educational standpoint the address of Mr. Arensberg deserves special mention. He gave an exhaustive resume of the legal problems which arise in connection with notes and bills—negotiable instruments.

Puget Sound.

At the annual meeting of the Puget Sound association the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, W. D. Mead, Pacific Mutual; first vice-president, R. C. Stuart, New York Life; second vice-president, Charles C. Thompson, Metropolitan; secretary, A. B. Furner, Penn Mutual; treasurer, P. B. Duren, Union Mutual. Retiring President I. A. Nadeau was presented with a handsome watch fob set with diamonds as a token of appreciation of his work done during the year. President Mead in his inaugural address urged that steps be taken to establish a course on life insurance at the University of Washington, a lecture campaign be conducted to spread the gospel of life insurance, and that concerted effort be made to secure legislation penalizing misrepresentations and other reprehensible field practices.

Rhode Island.

Edward A. Woods, vice-president and chairman of the committee on taxation of the National Association, was the principal speaker at a banquet held by the Rhode Island Association in the Narragansett Hotel on the evening of April 28. It was the monthly meeting of the association and it was attended by 130 underwriters and their friends. Among the speakers were Mayor Gainer and ex-Mayor P. J. McCarthy.

Maurice C. Stearns was toastmaster and the following acted as a committee of arrangements: George M. Parks, William H. Gardner, H. M. Smith, W. H. Greene, John E. Marshall, George H. Collett, F. M. Donnelly, W. M. Warren, W. S. Ruden, A. L. Intlehouse, H. M. Wheaton and A. M. Crum.

Mr. Woods, the principal speaker, said in part, in speaking on "The Taxation of Life Insurance":

"For the first time in the history of the country, when the issue was fairly up, the President of the United States and both Houses of Congress, after a consideration lasting all summer, decided that life insurance was itself a self-imposed tax by the provident and thrifty classes of the community, principally to provide for the wives and children and thereby save the State from later dependency, and that it was uneconomic to tax a tax. Having won this victory, largely by the aid of insurance agents throughout the entire country in presenting the case of the policyholders to their various Congressmen and Senators, it is a good time now to bring about some abatement in the burden imposed by 48 different States.

In closing he gave figures showing the relationship of life insurance to dependency and philanthropy, showing the reduction of poverty, crime, dependent orphans and aged and better social conditions brought about, in the opinion of the world's leading economists, by the institution of life insurance.

Richmond.

At a called meeting of the Richmond association, held April 22, the president reported the death of Col. Cunningham Hall, who was one of the charter members of the association in 1893 and served the association with marked ability and fidelity as its president for three years.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the association:

"That in the death of Col. Cunningham Hall this association has lost one of its most valued and active members, who was ever in the forefront of every movement for the advancement of his profession of life insurance and the good of his fellow workers.

"That in his removal from our midst this association feels that this city and State has lost a citizen whose example is worthy of emulation.

"That this association attend the funeral in a body; that these resolutions be spread upon the permanent records of the association and a copy sent to the bereaved family.

"THE RICHMOND, VA., ASSOCIATION OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS.

"E. M. Crutchfield, T. Garnett Tabb, W. B. Freeman, A. P. Wilmer, S. B. Love, Committee."

At a meeting, held on the 4th inst., the principal speaker was Second Vice-President Hardwicke. Mr. Hardwicke explained the purposes of a Cincinnati Convention Club, and also discussed the possibilities for Richmond winning the 1916 convention. First Vice-President Samuel B. Love took up the question of the various trophies which are donated annually at conventions. Several new members were admitted.

Roanoke.

The Roanoke association held its regular April meeting in the Japanese tea room at Roanoke, with President Brooks Marmon as host. After luncheon there was a discussion on several matters in relation to the National Association and Mr. Marmon, who expected to attend the executive committee of the National Association, was instructed to convey to that body assurances of the association's hearty co-operation.

St. Louis.

The monthly meeting of the Life Underwriters' Association of St. Louis was held at the Washington Hotel April 21. The membership committee, having had a successful campaign for new members, submitted 73 new applications, bringing the total membership of the association up to 200.

A Cincinnati Club was organized in order that the association might have a large delegation to the Cincinnati convention, which meets in September. The local association means to secure the national convention of life underwriters for this city for 1916.

Under the able leadership of W. J. Bilheimer, of the Equitable Life, a most unique and novel entertainment was arranged, which opened with a pledge to Old Glory and the singing of America. Each member then gave the State or country in which he was born and it proved that 20 States and 3 foreign countries were represented in the association.

Good fellowship was the keynote of the entire meeting and it is certain that few members left without having met every other man present. The closing feature of the program was a mock court trial, The People vs. Life Insurance Agents, the case being "Resolved, That agents' commissions in life insurance should be reduced."

Music was also a feature of the meeting, which closed with a light luncheon. At the next meeting, to be held in May, the probable speakers will be the Insurance Commissioner of Missouri, Hon. Charles G. Revelle, and President DeBoer of the National Life Insurance Co. of Vermont.

The following telegram was received by President Bloome: "By direction of the executive committee in session we send our hearty congratulations on your remarkable record adding to your membership 73 new members at the meeting of April 21. Special announcement evoked the greatest enthusiasm among us all here and added inspiration to our work.

St. Paul.

Twenty members of the Minneapolis association were guests of the St. Paul association on the evening of the 4th inst. Ambrose Tighe was the principal speaker, and gave a review of the history of human life. Warren M. Horne, chairman of the National Committee on Education and Conservation spoke on the plans of his committee as finally decided upon at the recent meeting of the National Executive Committee. E. W. Randall, president of the Minnesota Mutual, spoke briefly on the improvements and discoveries in different lines during the last century, and stated that life insurance in its present form was one of the greatest improvements.

San Francisco.

A special meeting and dinner of the San Francisco association was held at the Hotel Stewart last month for the purpose of celebrating the completion of 50 years of continuous service on the part of John Landers as manager of the Manhattan Life and to compliment him upon his promotion to resident vice-president of that company. The speakers were George B. Scott, Hon. Warren R. Porter, A. D. Morrison of Chicago; W. L. Hathaway and Rev. F. W. Clappett. W. G. Taffinder presided. The following resolution, drawn by a special committee appointed by the association and beautifully engrossed upon copper, was presented to Mr. Landers:

"The San Francisco Life Underwriters' Association, recognizing in the official advancement of John Landers the loss of an active co-worker in the beneficent field of life insurance and desiring to testify to the high esteem and regard in which he is held, does hereby, on the completion of his 50 years of service as general agent of the Manhattan Life Insurance Company tender him its sincere felicitations and its best hope for long life and continued activity and records its opinion hereby that among the workers in the vineyard no single individual has labored more truly and honestly for the betterment and uplift of his fellow-men.

"The association also desires that these sentiments, expressed with the same sincerity, be tendered to Mrs. Helen Landers, his devoted life companion for more than 47 years.

"While the members of the San Francisco Life Underwriters' Association regret the loss of his active personal support, they recognize the imperishable effect on the association and its work, of his many years of effort in its behalf, his sincerity, his sweetness of nature, his kindly judgement, his optimistic spirit and his quiet generosity.

"That the record may be perpetual, we, a committee designated and appointed by the San Francisco Life Underwriters' Association, do hereby subscribe our names.

"FREDERICK WILLIAM CLAPPETT, Chairman.

"WARREN R. PORTER,

"W. G. TAFFINDER.

"San Francisco, Cal., March 14, 1914."

William L. Hathaway, Commissioner of the World's Life Insurance Congress, made the presentation and spoke in part as follows:

"I cannot imagine any greater honor that could be conferred on any man than to have an expression such as is engraved on this copper coming from the body of men with whom I have been associated throughout a long and active business life. * * * I think a great deal of thanks is due the committee planning these resolutions in this manner. * * * In behalf of this association, Uncle John, I take pleasure in presenting to you, for your future happiness, this token."

"Uncle John" Landers, in accepting the tablet and in knowledging the felicitations and good wishes tendered him, said in part:

"Little did I realize that it was possible for me to reach the goal that I have attained in the profession of insurance and the goal I have acquired in your affections. I cannot find words to express my gratitude and thanks, not only to each and every one of you who have honored me by your presence, but to those who have sent me telegrams and letters of congratulation from all over the United States. I am simply overwhelmed at the reception that I have and am receiving from day to day from my kindred spirits and old friends in California. * * * Your kind sentiments have touched me keenly and I cannot say to-night how sincerely I feel at this reception. * * *"

At the conclusion of Mr. Landers' remarks, resolution was introduced by Mr. Scott, seconded by Mr. Hathaway and unanimously carried, electing Mr. John Landers to a life membership in the San Francisco association.

Prior to the dinner a short business meeting was held, at which the following six men were elected to membership: Walter C. Marr, Paul G. Hausman, Garner Curran, J. Allen Fiske, Raymond T. Hyman and George B. Shelton.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. Wann, seconded by Mr. Porter and unanimously carried:

Whereas, The President and directors of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, recognizing the dominant factor which insurance played in the rebuilding of San Francisco to a point where it is now possible to hold a great exposition, have declared April 18, 1914, as "Insurance Day" and are issuing invitations to those engaged in the commerce of insurance and its allied professions to be their guests on the exposition grounds from 1 to 5 p. m. on that day, to hear and view an elaborate program complimentary to and commemorative of insurance achievements; and

Whereas, The Hon. Hiram W. Johnson, Governor of the State, has issued a proclamation in which he says: "In recognition of the part insurance companies have had in the rebuilding of San Francisco, plans have been made for a celebration on April 18 at the exposition grounds in San Francisco. It is my earnest hope that adequate expression will be given at that time to the confidence and good will so splendidly earned by those companies that met their obligations honorably and courageously in the hour of overwhelming disaster"; and

Whereas, The Hon. James Rolph, Jr., Mayor of this city, has also issued a proclamation in sympathy with the recognition of this day allowing it closely to insurance benefits; and

Whereas, It seems desirable that the entire insurance world should thoroughly understand the degree to which San Francisco insurance men appreciate these honors, be it

Resolved, That the Life Underwriters' Association of San Francisco heartily endorse the plans being prepared by the exposition officials for that day and pledge ourselves to, in the largest degree possible, individually and collectively, swell the attendance and enthusiasm of that occasion.

South West Virginia.

The regular monthly meeting of the Southern West Virginia association was held on April 27 at Huntington. The following new members were admitted: E. H. Hughes, Penn Mutual, and J. H. Riggs, Metropolitan. Amendments were made to the constitution reducing the annual dues of members other than general agents, managers and superintendents to three dollars and increasing the annual dues of general agents, managers and superintendents to $10. Also providing that the regular meetings be held on the third Friday of each month, alternating between Charleston and Huntington. There was a discussion as to the proposed institutional advertising campaign of the National Association.

THE IDEAL OFFICE ASSISTANT

An employer hires a bookkeeper, stenographer or clerk to relieve him of—not to add to his cares.

He asks the same thing of his writing machine.

He wants it to "stand up," to do its work, to be reliable, quick to respond, ready for emergency or long continued work.

These qualities make the L. C. Smith & Bros. typewriter prominent in the typewriter world.

The ball bearings at all frictional points place it in a class by itself from a mechanical standpoint.

have been known to object to life insurance; widows never do. Every life which has any productive value is in a sense held by its owner in trust for the persons dependent on it. Living it may be able to fulfil the obligation. Only through life insurance can provision be made against early or unexpected death being in effect an act of involuntary bankruptcy.

This Company has an unusually complete equipment of plans, adequate to meet the needs of every person who wishes to provide through insurance for the protection of his dependents; for his own later years, or for the losses which may at any time overtake him by reason of accident or illness.

hanged greetings and renewed acquaintances, until "Auld Lang Syne" was sung, there was not a break or a dull moment.

Some members of the association wrote parodies on popular songs, which were either built about some phase of the business or some member of the association. One after another these songs were sung to the accompaniment of an orchestra.

At the conclusion of the dinner the guests turned their attention to the platform at the rear of the hall, where nine empty chairs were arranged. At a signal from the orchestra each of these chairs was immediately occupied by as many members of the association.

These daring amateur minstrels were Charles H. Burrows and F. L. Wells, ends; W. G. Marot, interlocutor; Charles H. Stephenson, soloist; E. E. Purrington, F. W. Northrup, C. J. Kirkland, O. H. Bradley, G. R. Churchill, chorus.

Mr. Hasbrouck spoke briefly on the great change that had taken place in the insurance business. In the past 25 years, he said, it had developed wonderfully in every way.

"There are better companies," he declared, "a finer class of agents and the whole scheme of insurance, once a lottery, unstable, unsafe and distrusted, has become a solid, responsible and thoroughly reliable institution. Undoubtedly the State Department of Insurance has had much to do with this growth and improvement and will in the future continue to be the same important force.

"There is a feeling of confidence on the part of agents and companies in the department and it is to be hoped that this will be strengthened. The department and its officials will always be ready to receive suggestions and work for the interest of the men in the home office and in the field."

It was Mr. Hasbrouck's first public appearance since his appointment to the office and he was cordially received.

Mr. Kidder expressed pride in having been the first president of such a flourishing organization as the Syracuse association. He referred to the many changes that had taken place in the city since he left six years ago and was glad to know that the association had kept pace with the general growth of the community.

Mr. Scovel, who attained popularity here as a result of his insurance lectures at the university, reviewed the establishment and growth of underwriters' associations.

"These associations," he said, "are working for the interest of the policyholder as well as for the companies and the agents. It is not only organization and unity, but the growth of public opinion within the profession, that has had such a notable result in cleansing and strengthening the business."

Texas.

The officers and committees of the Texas association had an interesting luncheon at the Oriental Hotel at Dallas on April 20 as guests of Orville Thorp, president of the association, at which time a movement was launched for a big rally of life insurance men to be held at Dallas on May 30. The executive committee addressed a communication to each member of the association as follows:

"The Texas Association of Life Underwriters will be one year old next month. The secretary of the National Association report to us that our association has done more effective work in the first year of its existence than any other association ever organized in the history of the National body. We should all feel proud of this record and should give the Texas association our undivided support in the future. Our work has just begun and with proper support in the future it will prove a lasting benefit to legal reserve life insurance business in Texas.

"There are many good life insurance men who have held back waiting for our organization to be tried. They wanted to find out whether this was really an organization that was going to do things, or whether it was a 'flash in the pan.' This is a natural condition. However, now that our association is established and bids well for great work in the future, it should receive the approval and support of everyone connected with the life insurance business of Texas. This is not a one-man or one-company organization. We all look alike. We are all legal reserve life insurance men, irrespective of the company we represent. Therefore this work should be carried on by all alike, as we all receive the same benefits. You have been advised of the good work the association is doing. Detailed statements of the work have been published in various insurance publications, and especially in 'The Texas Insurance,' extract of which was mailed you about the middle of March.

"In order to start this work for the next year under favorable conditions, and with an enthusiastic support of approval behind it, the executive committee is arranging for a big rally of life insurance men at Dallas on May 30. A special committee on program and arrangements has been appointed. Arrangements are being completed with a number of life insurance men with national reputation, including all the officers of the National Association, to attend this big meeting. You are especially urged to attend. We also ask that you appoint yourself a committee of one to urge your many life insurance friends to attend this big rally.

"A banquet will be given at 7 o'clock in the evening, followed by an interesting business meeting. If you can be with us, sign the enclosed card and mail it at once. Any of your life insurance friends desiring to attend the meeting should address A. C. Bigger, 15th floor, Southwestern Life Building, for reservations at the banquet."

The Texas association is now thoroughly organized. It is an established organization, having for its purpose the advancing of the best interests of the cause of true life insurance and to bring those engaged in the business into more intimate and friendly business relations throughout the entire State of Texas.

Over 200 active agents representing about 40 different companies are now identified with this organization. It is hoped and confidently expected that during the next year this membership will increase to 1,000 active members. The association has devoted considerable time during the first year of its existence to clearing up the field of Texas and eliminating from the life insurance fraternity irregular work on the part of agents. Some very effective work along this line has been accomplished, and while the work is only just begun, a great good has already been rendered legal reserve life insurance in the State.

Topeka.

At a meeting of the Topeka association held on April 20 plans were made for a general campaign to increase the membership of the three local associations in the State. It is intended that the officers of the three associations shall send out letters to every licensed agent in the State calling attention to the benefits which accrue from membership in a local association and suggesting that each agent join the association geographically most convenient to him.

There was a discussion as to the ethics of the employment of agents. Several of the members were of the opinion that a general agent should not employ an agent of another company until three months after he had severed his connection with the former company. There was some objection to this stand. President H. O. Garvey stated that it was not good ethics for a general agent to induce men to sever connections with other general agents. He declared that he had no hesitancy in telling an agent what he could do for him after an agent called upon him. A committee of three was appointed to draft resolutions on the death of Samuel E. Barber, who died recently. The committee is composed of Charles A. Moore, Equitable of New York; Henry H. Hall, New York Life, and J. E. Spaulding, North American.

The following resolution was passed:

Whereas, A just and All Wise Providence has taken from our midst our good friend and worthy co-worker, Samuel E. Barber, and

Whereas, For true friendship, genial good nature, loyalty, service to his friends, the State and the cause for which he labored, our friend occupied a position which few men can attain; therefore be it

Association of Life Underwriters, realizing the irreparable loss to the profession which he so efficiently served, hereby express our sincere regret and extend our deepest sympathy to the bereaved family, his immediate associates, and his host of friends, and be it further

RESOLVED, That these resolutions be spread upon the records of our association and engrossed copy be made and delivered to the family of the deceased.

Utah.

George D. Adler, of the National Life of Vermont, was elected president of the Utah association at the recent annual meeting of that body. The other officers are as follows: George F. Eckstrom, of the Mutual Benefit, as first vice-president; D. H. Livingston, New York Life, second vice-president; E. F. Mills, Northwestern Mutual, secretary, and A. E. Denne, treasurer.

West Virginia.

The McLure grill in Wheeling was the scene in the afternoon of April 18 of the largest gathering of insurance men ever held in the State of West Virginia, the occasion being the regular monthly meeting of the West Virginia association, which had as its honor guest, Mr. J. M. Craig, actuary of the Metropolitan of New York City.

The meeting of the association was preceded by a luncheon served at 1:30 o'clock, covers being laid for about a hundred. Mr. George C. Crook, president of the association and local manager for the Metropolitan, acted as chairman of the meeting, and introduced Mayor H. L. Kirk as the first speaker.

HOME OFFICE: LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

Mayor Kirk, in his usual happy vein, extended a most cordial welcome to the distinguished guest and to the out-of-town members. He expressed his own well grounded belief in life insurance and dwelt particularly on the influence of the institution in promoting the welfare of the people generally.

The next speaker was the honor guest, Mr. Craig, who took for his subject, "Industrial Insurance." In his opening remarks he stated that in June of this year he would celebrate his forty-eighth year as an insurance man, having commenced his career in 1866 as office boy in the office of the National Life Insurance Company of New York City. He spoke of the birth of industrial insurance and referred to the time when it was sneeringly called a "five-cent business." He had been present at its birth and labored in its behalf for almost half a century until now when industrial insurance numbered more than twenty-seven million policyholders or a little over one policy to every fourth man, woman and child in the United States.

Even in West Virginia, where towns are few and far between and not very readily accessible, the industrial companies have nearly two hundred thousand policyholders. He dwelt on this wide dissemination of industrial insurance as being calculated to promote habits of thrift among people of the lower stations of life, and pointed out the fact that many holders of $5,000 and $10,000 policies had gotten their initial lesson in the beneficence of life insurance at five and ten cents week.

In conclusion, Mr. Craig referred particularly to the work of the solicitor as being the important factor in the growth of the business.

At the conclusion of Mr. Craig's address there were short speeches by a number of local men, after which the meeting adjourned.

Myron Eckert, of the Travellers; F. B. Kearney, of the Michigan Mutual; H. W. Koons, of the Western and Southern; Lee Burt, of the United States Life, and R. L. Hartzell, of the Equitable Life. The new officers, while they do not take charge of the affairs of the association until after the May meeting, are already planning a big year for 1914-15.

The regular program for the meeting was the discussion of the subject of taxation, and the address of the evening was to have been made by the Hon. Oscar E. Diser, who, on account of a previous engagement, was unable to be present. In his absence R. L. Hartzell read extracts from a number of reports and addresses concerning the taxation of life insurance premiums. He said in part, to illustrate the excessive amount taken from the life insurance policyholders that, "This tax falls directly upon the policyholders, who pay it, and thus increases the cost of their insurance.

"The public is often told that these taxes do not affect the policyholder. Any tyro in economics knows that the consumer pays ultimately the expense of the business, but in the case of life insurance peculiarly, the policyholders must pay. Large numbers of the greatest life insurance companies are purely mutual, and in the case of these companies there is no one else but the policyholders to pay; other companies are strictly required to transact their life insurance business upon the mutual plan with restricted dividends to stockholders so that every loss or expense falls upon the policyholders. Even in the case of stockholders, no one ever heard of taxes being paid out of stockholders' profits, and no one ever will. All classes of companies are taxed alike, and an increase of taxes merely means an increase tax upon the policyholders."

A taxation committee consisting of Messrs. Hartzell, Hawkins and Hankins was appointed by President Eckert to further investigate the excessive tax levied in this State and see what remedy might be applied.

WHERE AND HOW TO SECURE APPLICATIONS DURING VACATION PERIOD

MONTHS OF JULY, AUGUST AND SEPTEMBER MAY BE MADE PROFITABLE BY AGGRESSIVE AGENT READY TO TAKE ADVANTAGE OF SPECIAL HAZARDS.

Farmers Prosperous in Summer, Roads to Isolated Localities in Good Condition—Bank Clearing and Dividend Disbursements, Together with Usual Casualties Incident to Season, Indicative of Great Opportunities.

By EDWARD A. WOODS, General Agent, Equitable Life Assurance Society, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. Woods needs no introduction to the members of local associations, being well known throughout the country in the capacity quoted above and as vice-president of the National Association. In this article (copyright, July, 1913), he gives a score of reasons why business during the summer months should compare well with the other months of the year—and these reasons are all based on uncontrovertible facts.—Editor's Note.

Is it true that we must consider the summer months, July, August and September, poor months for business?

Of course, any agent can make July, August or September a poor month. Such an agent can, and generally does, make any other month a poor month. Such an agent, who finds the summer too hot, will also find the winter too cold. If he finds the farmers too busy in harvest time, he will find business men too busy in December. If he finds the roads too dusty in the summer, he will find them too muddy in the spring and the weather too cold in the winter to drive. Anyone hunting for excuses instead of results can find them in the summer time—and every other time.

Farmers Prosperous.

Why should the summer months be poor months? The principal industry in this country is farming. The farmer reaps his harvests, markets it and prepares to receive his money for it during the summer months. The $9,000,000,000 derived from our crops is largely earned and paid out in the summer time. It is then when the weather is hottest and the days are longest that he works the hardest, from before most insurance men are up until sundown at night, six days of the week and by no means eight hours a day. Actual money is much closer not only to the farmer, but to the entire farming community in the summer months than at any other time of the year. When we say "farming community" we mean the towns and villages affected by crops and the money received from crops. In the winter and spring, money, to these communities, seems far off; in summer it seems close at hand, almost cash. And it is always wholesome to remember that $50,000,000,000 of our national wealth is in farms and this year's farm products, and that 10,000,000 persons are farmers—more persons are engaged in farming than in all other occupations combined.

It does not require any special pleading to show that the summer months should be profitable; it is not reasonable to suppose that when June, as a rule, is the best month of the year excepting only December, there is any good reason why business should necessarily suddenly fall off in July and August. It is the business of the shrewd salesman of any kind to find business and to discover opportune time for presenting his business to his various clients. There are, of course, classes of persons difficult to insure in the summer time, but there are numerous classes of persons who can be insured in the summer time better than in any other period of the year.

Transportation Better in Summer.

Transportation is better in the summer than in any other period. During many of the fall, winter and spring months many places are inaccessible, and many other places are at least uncomfortable, because of poor transportation and hotel facilities. In the summer time classes of persons can be reached because of open roads that cannot be so well reached at any other time; and the combination of being able to reach the rural communities just at the time when their money is coming in makes it exceedingly opportune for this class.

But the opportunity for summer business is by no means confined to the country districts. Consider in how many trades and businesses there is more activity in the summer than in the winter: Building is largely done in the summer time. Transportation is heavier in the summer. In the winter time much building, navigation and transportation is entirely closed down. Railroad excursion travel; many lines of business that have to do with recreation and with summer excursions, such as baseball, restaurants, summer hotels, ice cream places, drug stores, and numerous occupations that will occur to many, do their largest business in the summer. It is then they make their money and it is then that it will be most convenient for them to pay their first and renewal premiums upon life insurance. If we will but think of the many enterprises that are closed down in winter, we will realize how many are working hardest in summer.

Bank Clearings.

Bank clearings of the country show that the aggregate business of the country in the summer months is very great; for example, the total bank clearings of July are seldom exceeded by those of any other month of the year excepting only January, October, November and December, and neither in July nor August do they vary 10 per cent. from the highest record for the year. The dividend disbursements and interest payments made July first exceed those of any other month of the year with the possible exception of January.

Special Hazards.

There are special hazards about the summer time, and there are special reasons why certain classes should listen to insurance arguments in the summer time. Persons about to leave on vacations have often sought insurance for that very reason. Every year—and this year, probably, will be no exception—there have been death claims paid through this agency from summer casualties, on water or land, by railroad train or automobile, by persons drowned when bathing, upset in boats, and in various other ways during vacations. We paid ten claims from summer accidents alone in our single agency in 1911—five from drowning, four from automobile accidents, and one struck by lightning, and last summer we paid three claims from drowning. There are many illnesses due to summer heat and to various causes peculiar to the summer time. Indeed, summer is noted for high mortality from many causes.

Many persons coming home from vacations are particularly susceptible to insurance arguments. They feel well; they feel that the examinations can be passed at that time. Starting in a new work year, they perhaps come home with a resolution to start now to save, and the insurance argument comes in then most opportunely.

Many have more leisure to consider an insurance proposition in summer than any other season, who in the busy winter or spring season say that they will take it up when they have "more time." Long summer evenings furnish a good opportunity, in many appropriate cases, to present insurance to a man on his own front porch, surrounded by his family, or in the cool of the evening in his yard or garden, much more favorably than in a busy, crowded office.

The Vacation Bluff.

Some agents are really anxious not to see the prospect. Of course, in such a frame of mind it is very easy to find persons out or indisposed to listen. It is therefore very easy to persuade one's self that all one's prospects are on vacations. The idea that during the summer months the entire country is on a vacation is a delusion that only need to be referred to. Probably 98 per cent. of the people in this country work at least fifty weeks out of the year. Nor are all the vacationists away at one time, nor does the ordinary vacation extend over two weeks. Therefore, making full allowance for the prospects who are on vacations, there is an ample number at home, and an agent merely deceives himself by justifying his letting up in the summer on the ground that "all his prospects are on vacations." There come times, with some agents, when really they are thinking about one prospect, and because this man cannot be seen they justify themselves for doing nothing. The error here is that the energy of the agent is on a vacation and ought to be brought back.

Lack of Effort.

The greatest reason for any agent's small summer business is the lack of effort on his part. It is not suggested that we work through the summer without taking vacations. But it is particularly urged that each agent decide now, when and for how long and in what way he will take his vacation, and not charge the life insurance business with work during the summer time when he is really not working at all. If it is decided to take a vacation and be away one week or two weeks, work should be done up to the time one goes and should be commenced the day one gets back; and commenced, too, with the full knowledge that it takes some time to get back into working-trim, just as it takes some time for a train to start up after coming to a full stop. But the most insidious and vicious form of taking a vacation is when the agent pretends to be working, but with the idea that "this is summer time, anyway," and he is perfectly justified in coming to work late and in leaving early and in half "loafing;" and yet charges the life insurance business with twelve months' work out of the year. A shrewd man in every line of business will work hard while he is working and will rest thoroughly while he is resting.

THE PROFESSIONAL ASPECT OF THE PRACTISE OF LIFE INSURANCE.

Pronounced Tendency on Part of Home Offices and Field Forces to Maintain the High Standards Compatible with Professional Aims.

By Griffin M. Lovelace, Superintendent of Agencies, The Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co., Hartford, Conn.

This study was first read before the Honor Roll Meeting of the Connecticut Mutual last September. Mr. Lovelace has since carried his message to The Insurance Institute of Hartford and the local associations of Connecticut, Maine, Central Massachusetts, Western Massachusetts and Utica. Article copyright 1914. In view of the many claims that the solicitation of Life Insurance is conducted on a non-professional basis, it is refreshing to consider the other side of the question.—Editor's Note.

The possibility of interest in a discussion of this subject was suggested by the frequent references we see and hear to life insurance as a profession.

Only a few days ago an insurance journal contained a comment attributed to the vice-president of a prominent life insurance company which began with these words: "Life insurance is now commonly referred to as a profession."

Doubtless most of us—particularly those of us who are agency men in the field or office—have made similar references. Yet, in the same breath, we speak of life insurance salesmanship, though it is not common to consider salesmanship a phase of professional activity.

But we might easily point out respects in which professional men are really salesmen. After all, lawyers and physicians sell their services, and we know that of two lawyers or physicians who are equally competent one has a way of making his services satisfy better than do those of the other. The degree in which personality is injected into his methods, the manner of receiving the client and treating his case, the effort to please as well as to serve, the use of tact—so many of the salesman's means make of a professional man a business success when without them he might be a failure. Many a successful lawyer has been described as a good "business getter"; many a physician as a "man whose manner in the sickroom does the patient good." Such professional men owe a good part of their success to the fact that they make use of what we would probably classify under the psychology of salesmanship.

Nothing Incongruous in Discussion.

So we may be sure there is nothing incongruous in a discussion either of the "salesmanship aspect of the practise of law or medicine" or the "professional aspect of the 'practise' of life insurance." (I take the liberty of using the word "practise" since it is defined as "the pursuit of a profession or calling.")

It is the purpose of this paper to outline those characteristics which seem to give to the work of certain life insurance men something of a professional aspect.

It is not necessary to remind anyone that there is a distinct difference between a business and a so-called profession; that, aside from the special education involved in training for the "professions," the term "profession" implies certain qualifications, a certain natural fitness or aptitude for the work to be done, together with a natural inclination to such work, and a conviction that one can render service of a high order. We do not expect a man to engage in a mercantile or manufacturing business for any other reason than that he believes he has an opportunity in such an occupation to earn a substantial living. We do not even expect a man to engage in such a business because he has selected it as the one which he likes better than any other. We know that, ordinarily, the choice of an occupation or a business is largely a matter of chance. A young man beginning his business life usually takes the best position that is offered to him. He may consider, with almost equal inclination or satisfaction, the offer of a position in a rubber goods factory or a position as a clerk in a real estate office. What the average young man is chiefly interested in, in making his choice, is to select that position which offers him the greatest opportunity to succeed; the chief measure of success, in his mind and the minds of others who may advise him, being the financial profit, present or future. To be sure, he may be somewhat influenced in deciding between two or more positions by his preference for one business over another. He may consider it more dignified to be engaged in the manufacture of automobiles than in canning vegetables; but, after all, the chief consideration would unquestionably be, in most cases, the opportunity to make money.

The Actuating Motives.

On the other hand, there can be no doubt, I believe, but that the average young man who considers entering a profession is largely actuated by other motives. While we do not expect the young man of professional ambitions to be unconcerned as to his financial prospects, unless, perchance, he contemplates entering the ministry, we should, nevertheless, probably be shocked to hear a young man say that he was taking up the study of medicine because he believed he could make more money at that than at anything else. There can be little doubt but that the average young man who takes up medicine, or law, or even engineering, is particularly actuated by a feeling that he would make a better doctor, or lawyer, or engineer, than anything else; that he is by temperament, inclination and mental bias better qualified to do well the things which would be entrusted to his care as a member of a certain profession than to follow another occupation.

It seems to me, ethically speaking, entirely proper for a man to engage in the "selling" of life insurance for the same reasons which would prompt him to undertake to sell shoes or hardware—simply because he believes that life insurance offers him the best opportunity available for profit and advancement; for the public, including our agency novitiates, do not realize the inherent professional qualities characterizing life insurance work, as they do in the case of the long-recognized professions. Yet understanding, as we do, the true character of the institution of life insurance and knowing what is required of the conscientious agent, we cannot entertain a very good opinion of the man who, after a reasonable experience as an agent, is not actuated, in a considerable degree, by higher motives in inducing men to insure and in assisting them to select the contracts and forms of settlement which best safeguard their interests. As the conscientious agent's knowledge of life insurance and of his obligations to clients is enlarged he will abandon what we may call the strictly commercial view of the business for the professional one.

"Profession" Defined.

A profession is really a calling; to use the Latin derivative, a vocation from vocare, to call. Adopting the literal meaning of the word, we may say that, in general, the man who embraces a profession feels himself called by his peculiar mental attainments or inclination to follow a particular career.

Originally, the term "profession" applied only to the three learned or liberal professions—medicine, law and theology. But of late years the word has taken on a much broader meaning, as we see from the following quotation from the Century Dictionary: "Specifically, a vocation in which a professional knowledge of some department of science or learning is used by its practical application to affairs of others, either in advising, guiding or teaching them, or in serving their interests or welfare in the practise of an art founded on it. Formerly theology, law and medicine were specifically known as 'the professions'; but as the applications of science and learning are extended to other departments of affairs, other vocations also, receive the name. The word implies professed attainments in special knowledge, as distinguished from mere skill; a practical dealing with affairs, as distinguished from mere study or investigation; and an application of such knowledge to uses for others as a vocation, as distinguished from its pursuit for one's own purposes."

Clearly, the modern conception of a profession is of an occupation the purpose of which is service to mankind. In a broad sense, the word "professional" may be applied to nearly every occupation in the sense that one's attitude toward his business may be professional or purely commercial, according as one is actuated, in the prosecution of his duties, by the professional or by the commercial spirit. It would be folly to contend that in the practise of life insurance, or even the learned professions, one's conduct should be in no degree commercial. The necessity for living comfortably and for doing one's duty in the proper support of one's family makes it obligatory upon even the professional man that he be a good "business man"; but it is obvious that the true professional man's, personal or commercial interest must always be secondary to the interests of the client he serves—that he would not advise a transaction which would be less favorable to his client than another in order to increase his own compensation. A lawyer who would counsel a circuitous procedure in order to increase the size of his fee is not truly a professional man; nor is the physician who prolongs the period of attendance on a patient beyond what he honestly considers necessary. The professional man's chief thought, always, is to advise, guide and serve his clients in their highest interests to the extent of his ability.

The Idea of Service.

The finest tendency in modern business is the extension of the idea of service. While it is probably true that keen competition is the chief cause of this tendency, nevertheless the effect of service, whatever the original reason for it, is to quicken the business conscience and give to many lines of business something of a professional atmosphere.

But what is the professional aspect of the practise of life insurance? We must consider the character of the business, the attitude of mind of the agent and his acts in the service of his clients.

First, the character of the business: Let us recall the dictionary's phraseology—"A vocation in which a professional knowledge of some department of science or learning is used by its practical application to affairs of others, either in advising, guiding or teaching them, or in serving their interests or welfare in the practise of an art founded on it." This describes accurately the work of the trained life insurance field man.

Vocation of Great Merit.

It seems to me that a profession must be a vocation of great merit, based on some sound theory of usefulness to man and capable of being maintained on a high moral plane. When medicine or the law is used to the hurt of man, when they are not maintained on a high moral plane, they cease, it appears to me, to fall under the classification of professions; the shyster lawyer, the quack doctor are not professional men. Clearly, the institution of life insurance is founded on a sound theory of usefulness to man, and can be maintained on a high moral plane. As in the original professions, the purpose of life insurance is altruistic, not in the sense of being philanthropic, but, in a more etymological sense, altruistic in that it involves service for the benefit of others. Life insurance furnishes a means by which a man may guarantee the fulfilment—against the event of his death—of his natural duty to his family and his social obligation to his fellow citizens to care for those who are dependent on him. (The man who fails to support his family while alive must answer to the community. Clearly, his responsibility to the community for the protection of his family does not cease, morally speaking, through his death, any more than does the responsibility to his family. At some time in the distant future it may also become a legal responsibility and life insurance be required by law. In Germany, as we know, industrial life insurance is already compulsory by law.)

Life insurance is an institution through which men of the present generation, rich and poor, may bind themselves together in a common act for the economic welfare of the generation to come. If every man in the United States carried insurance to the limit of his ability to pay premium there should be practically no poverty in the next generation.

Life insurance encourages thrift, provides a competency for old age, furnishes a bulwark of safety to individuals and corporations in time of stress; and, not to multiply the illustrations of the ways in which life insurance is beneficent, is every way qualified to be considered worthy of the efforts of the man who seeks a professional opportunity—an opportunity to make a single effort serve two great purposes—to furnish him and his family a living and to serve his fellow citizens.

The Agent a Teacher.

The business of life insurance is of a professional character in still another respect. The agent is a teacher—a teacher of the principles of a great economic institution—an institution founded on science, maintained by the joint efforts of men of all conditions to their mutual benefit, individually and as a community, and yet not fully understood or appreciated by the uninitiated, and even by many who have been induced to participate in it. Nearly everybody has, at best, a vague idea of what life insurance is; and, without the constant effort of the agent to teach its principles, the need of it and the scientific necessity for early action in securing its protection, the sum total of the practical knowledge of life insurance to say nothing of the results to the community, would be infinitesimal as compared with what has actually been accomplished. So much for the professional aspect of our work and it is inherent in the character of the business.

Second, the attitude of the agent: Here lies the fork in the roads. One leads to a commercialization of life insurance, often the exploitation of the public for personal gain or self-aggrandizement; the other to a service, unselfish and beneficent, yet remunerative—professional in the full sense of the word.

Meeting the Requirements.

It is obvious that the principal function of one engaged in any of the original three learned professions is to give counsel in matters of law, medicine or religion. In this respect the practise of life insurance is quite similar, since the chief function of the life insurance agent, in serving his client, is to advise him as to the best way in which to protect his and his family's interests through the instrumentality of life insurance. Therefore, knowledge of the technical phase of life insurance, as related to field work, is, of course, fundamental. The professional agent cannot be content to possess only superficial information. It is his duty to know thoroughly the various phases of life insurance and its practises, and to be able to determine, by investigation and careful consideration of the conditions surrounding each case, what contract provisions offered by his company will best meet the requirements. The highly technical character of life insurance contracts makes it incumbent upon the professional agent to earnestly seek and study the most effective and lucid methods of presenting his recommendations, in order that the purpose to serve well may not be defeated by failure on the part of the client to thoroughly understand the information and advice given. The professional aptitude applies not only the knowledge and ability, but also the desire and purpose, to advise to the advantage of the client in a wholly disinterested way. It seems to me that the keynote to the correct professional attitude in law, medicine or life insurance is sincerity, a quality of character belonging to the genus honesty. Man is the highest type of the genus animal. So, too, sincerity is the highest type of honesty. Mere honesty is required by law but there is no law by which sincerity may be enforced or the violation of it punished; and yet, I dare say, our net losses economically resulting from insincerity in general business negotiations are as great as the net losses caused by statutory dishonesty. Sincerity marks a man, morally speaking, as a thoroughbred. The true professional man is wholly sincere in all his representations and counsels to prospects and clients. It is his chief aim to serve the people who repose confidence in him according to the Golden Rule, to the best of his know-age and ability and as he would wish to be served were the relation of adviser and client reversed.

A consideration of the true professional man, whether he be legal, medical or life insurance adviser, must also take into account pride in his professional skill and in the esteem which he is held by his clients, his professional colleagues and the community at large, as an exponent of his profession. The true professional man strives not merely to gain, but especially to deserve confidence; and there is, obviously, a good distinction between the gaining and the deserving of the trust of those with whom we have business or professional relations.

A Confidential Relationship.

Because of the intimate character of the affairs treated between counselor and client, the professional man occupies a very confidential position. We know that such a relation exists between the professional life insurance agent and his clients, and it is doubtful if any other business adviser, even an average lawyer, learns more of the intimate details of a man's personal and family affairs, or has so good an opportunity to assist in the devising of means to safeguard their interests. This confidential relation is another strong feature of the professional aspect of our business, and the agent who violates confidence of this nature is guilty of conduct as reprehensible as would be the divulging of private information secured by the physician or lawyer, who is legally bound to professional secrecy.

Third, the acts of the agent: So high are the standards set for professional men that they really involve character. A man's acts reveal his character. Whatever may be the intellectual attainments of a physician, lawyer or life insurance agent-adviser, however thoroughly he may claim to be ethically correct in his attitude toward his profession, we can judge, by his methods and the kind of advice he gives, whether his attitude is really a commercial or professional one.

Diagnosis the First Step.

The commercial methods of salesmanship may be observed in any retail shop. But how similar are the methods of some non-professional life insurance agents! If the prospect suggests an ordinary life policy or a 20-payment endowment and the agent furnishes it, without knowledge and discussion of the client's needs, his action is not materially different from that of the grocery clerk who hands out soap when requested. It is essential to get business promptly; as we said above, the professional man must also be a good business man; we must never lose an opportunity to get our man examined. It is professional to ask the company to issue any form of policy before we have satisfied ourselves that this form of policy is the one that will best serve our client's requirements? The facts in the case may indicate a very different contract. There are men who are influenced in a careless choice of their life insurance by what some friend has said of his policy; but, while it may be all right to buy articles of commerce because they have served our friends well, it is clearly an unwise practice for a man to select a certain life insurance policy merely because a friend has recommended it. Such a course is almost as foolish as it would be for a hay-fever sufferer to take a remedy found effective and recommended by a friend to whom it had been prescribed for indigestion. Diagnosis is the first step of any professional adviser. We could not think very highly of the physician who, if a patient could complain of rheumatism, would furnish a prescription for the relief of rheumatism without first determining whether the patient really had rheumatism, or neuritis, or some other ailment. It is unnecessary to ask whether you would consider such an act professional. Of course, a great many men try their life insurance under pressure or persuasion of the agent, and, in a large percentage, perhaps in the majority, of cases, take what the agent proposes. In a great measure the client is in the hands of the agent, as he is in the hands of his lawyer or his physician. I am sorry to say that there are agents who make it a point to exploit contracts which pay the largest commissions, irrespective of the needs of their clients. I know an agent who says, frankly, "I shall sell the policy that nets me the most money." Clearly, this agent is not actuated by the purpose of service; he thinks only of himself. He consoles himself with the argument that all policies are good and give a man his money's worth. Indeed, they are all good, but no one policy will best meet the requirements of all clients any more than the same last will fit every foot; and if a man buys a policy which does not best meet his needs, then he does not yet get his money's worth.

The professional agent studies his client's case as carefully as does the conscientious lawyer. He gets at the material facts—the beneficiaries to be protected, their ages, their condition, the prospect's estimate of what he considers an adequate income to be produced for each (no matter whether the insurance is to be settled in a lump sum or in instalment or interest payments), and any other information he may be able to obtain which will help him to formulate a plan suitable to his client's needs. His thought all the while is not "How much can I make out of this?" but "How can I do a good job?" His whole effort is directed to a sincere effort to give each client as nearly a perfect fit for his case as possible.

Making Everything Clear.

The professional agent is not content with merely making a sale. He sees to it that his client knows what he is getting. He realizes that few men fully understand the highly technical details of a life insurance policy contract. As a good business man he does not, of course, violate a rule of salesmanship by talking his client out of a favorable decision in his zeal to tell all he knows; but if the opportunity for a thorough discussion of all the points involved does not come before the transaction is closed, the professional agent seeks an opportunity, on delivery of the policy or afterwards, to make everything plain.

Every step in the sale of a policy by a professional agent is characterized by a positive effort to give adequate and disinterested service.

We should note another characteristic of the genuine professional man. His faith in the power of his profession to serve vital interests of men inspires in him an enthusiasm for his work, which is a potent factor in his success. Enthusiasm, zeal for the extension of the benefits of one's profession characterize the professional physician, lawyer, life insurance agent. It is inconceivable to me that a serious life insurance man of even moderate experience can fail to catch this inspiration. It makes a keen pleasure of hard work.

The Full Time Agent.

The adjective "professional" used as an antonym of "amateur" deserves consideration in this discussion in connection with the question of "personal efficiency" or "professional skill" referred to above. By a professional artist, for example, as opposed to an amateur, we mean, of course, one who plies the brush or modeling tools for a living rather than for mere pleasure or pastime; and since persons who earn their living by art or business naturally devote more time to it and consequently attain a greater degree of skill than amateurs, the word "professional" is now much used colloquially to express efficiency. I like very much and frequently use the term "professional life insurance agent." Obviously, that means not only an agent whose attitude and acts are professional in a broad sense, but also one who gives his entire time to life insurance and who has attained a high degree of technical skill through an energetic and persistent practise of his profession.

I submit that we are not inclined to rate very high the services of any so-called professional man unless he devotes his entire time, concentrates his thought and applies his best energies to his daily practise. We feel that he has not really qualified as a professional man until he is doing things worth while, and it is obvious that the doctor, or lawyer, or life insurance agent who does not acquire an extensive practise cannot command confidence in the same degree as does the man who is working hard at his profession and constantly achieving results. When we employ a lawyer we prefer one whose counsel stands the test of the courts from day to day; we want advice based on experience, not mere theory. Before entrusting our health or the health of our loved ones to the care of a physician, we select a man who is known to be, every day, showing men, women and children how to get well; he commands our confidence and gets our call. So, too, people prefer to do business with the life insurance agent who is known to be daily putting his profession into practise effectively. While there are, of course, exceptions among part-time agents, as a rule, I should for this reason prefer advice in insurance matters from a full-time agent rather than from a part-time man. High efficiency can only be maintained through constant, close application to one's business. Efficiency results from knowledge and skill, both of which are acquired and maintained through experience. Not only must the true professional man possess special knowledge and make high service his guiding principle, but he must work hard to maintain and increase his efficiency, if he would give the best service and rise to prominence in his chosen profession. Constant, high-tension work keeps the mind alert, maintains interest in one's duties, inspires admiration and confidence in the minds of clients, and achieves results; and good results increase confidence in one's self, stimulate pride in one's work, give the joy that springs from the sense of success and mastery. It is not enough to be merely capable and disinterested. No professional reputation was ever founded on these only; no high position ever attained, no great esteem ever won through those alone.

The Worker.

However great the intellect, however high the technical attainments, however ethical the attitude, however strong the desire to achieve and serve, no professional man ever won distinction solely through these factors of success. These may be the bricks, the mortar, the wood, the metal, with which to build the structure, but without work the edifice can never be completed. If you want to win for yourself a high position in life, build a reputation as a successful professional man in your chosen field of endeavor; if it means anything to you to establish a name for your family to be proud of; if you would make and eventually leave an impress of strong character and forceful enterprise on the community in which you live; if you would be a leader in the life insurance profession in your community, as men are leaders in other professions, you must be a worker—a constant, indefatigable, enthusiastic, purposeful worker. Stop and think of the successful professional men in your town. Are they idlers or workers? Do they work spasmodically or regularly? The answer is obvious. The man you look up to in your town, whom you admire for his achievements, whose reputation is high, whom you may have envied for his position in life—whether he be doctor, lawyer, engineer or life insurance agent—is a man who has worked long and hard. Talents do not insure success. It is only the faithful improvement of them that brings position, reputation and wealth; and they may be improved only through work—patient, persistent, courageous work.

Self-Made Men.

We often speak of "self-made men," meaning usually men whose parents were unable to give them a thorough education or to help them through influence. As a matter of fact, every truly successful man is self-made. It's the only way. Of Napoleon, Lincoln, Bismarck, Pasteur, Gladstone, Edison, only two of them have been self-made, in the usual meaning of the word. Yet these men have all risen to greatness only because they have worked unceasingly for some great purpose.

The tendency in life insurance field work to-day is distinctly professional. The idea of efficient service to policyholders pervades home office and field, and to this end both are bending their energies in a concerted effort. Home offices are doing more than ever before to really educate and train the field and more than ever before the field men are trying to acquire the knowledge and experience which will qualify them for efficient service. Home office and field are united more than ever before in an effort to maintain the high standard of personal character compatible with professional achievement. Not only is there a conscious effort to raise the standard of professional skill among present agents, but also to increase the requirements for any new agency representation. In both home office and field it is realized to-day more than ever before that, generally speaking, it is only the entire-service man who can be expected to develop into a professional life insurance agent. Perfection in these matters is, of course, unattainable, and yet we know that both home office and field have their wagons hitched to that star, seeking two keys of success, the ideal success which, as President Eliot of Harvard has said, is "service rendered" and that material success which is the inevitable result of professionally efficient methods and steadfast, daily labor.

Plans for the Cincinnati Convention Well Under Way Central Location Assures Large Attendance.

The Cincinnati association has made rapid progress in planning for the entertainment of the delegates, alternates and guests who will attend the Twenty-fifth Annual Convention of the National Association, which is to be held in Cincinnati on Sept. 15, 16 and 17. On Tuesday, Sept. 15, there will be a luncheon for the ladies and in the evening of that day there will be a reception and ball. Hitherto for a number of years the afternoon of the second day of the convention has been reserved for some form of entertainment by the local association.

However, in view of the ever increasing amount of work which comes before the convention, the Executive Committee at a conference held prior to the mid-year meeting of the National Executive Committee, decided that it would be necessary to devote the afternoon session of the second day to the regular business of the convention. Therefore, immediately following the afternoon session of the second day there will be a boat ride on the Ohio River and supper will be served on board. On Thursday evening the annual banquet will be held at the Gibson House. Special arrangements have been made for the entertainment of the ladies, among the features arranged for is an automobile ride about the city. The special sub-committees which will attend to these details of pre-convention activities are as follows: Finance committee, C. J. Stern and E. R. Ferguson; souvenir committee, A. F. Sommer and John L. Shuff; reception and boat ride, M. W. Mack, W. A. R. Bruehl and A. F. Sommer.

It is believed that the attendance at this convention will compare favorably with the number present at Atlantic City last year. There has been a remarkable increase in membership of local associations, which would naturally swell the ranks of delegates, alternates and guests. Other than Cincinnati, the city is centrally located, and although it is not generally known, the city is about 100 miles from the center of population of the United States. It is within a 24-hour ride of 65,000,000 people, 18 hours from New York, 18 hours from Canada, 26 hours from the Gulf of Mexico, and 48 hours from the Rocky Mountains.

President J. M. Bloodworth, of the St. Louis association, visited Cincinnati recently, and stated that in all probability the St. Louis association would travel on a special train, and that he confidently expected an attendance from his local body and other nearby points of at least 100 underwriters.

He loved the anvil chorus,
Each day his hammer raged—
Loudest of all the knockers,
Look where they have him caged!

PUBLIC OPINION OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES MOULDED BY THE AGENT.

the Life Insurance Business Now Bears the Stigma Which So Many Unthinking Men Attach to It and the Remedy.

By Thomas L. Fansler, General Agent, Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. Fansler looks at field conditions straight in the face. He does not blame the public, which has been exceedingly patient, but points an accusing finger at the Life Insurance Politician—the mere business man. The remedy he suggests is the elimination of the man who places a higher value on commissions than upon honor.—Editor's Note.

Public opinion is the predominant sentiment in a given community on any matter of general concern or interest. This sentiment is created, perhaps unconsciously, but certainly by personal contact of one citizen with another in the routine ordinary business or social life. Mr. Lincoln once made the statement that public opinion on any subject always has a "central idea" from which all its minor points radiate. If this is correct, it is most important that we should know what the public regards as the "central idea" in life insurance.

The medical profession is held in high esteem by the public because it has as its great "central idea" the alleviation of suffering and the prevention of disease by the spread of intelligence and the betterment of the sanitary conditions under which the people live. In every city and town the banker is usually regarded as one of the foremost, if not indeed the leading, citizen. Why? Because the great "central idea" in the commercial activities of every community is confidence, and the banker knows right well that the success of his bank depends—not only upon the efficiency of the management on the inside—but especially upon the degree of public confidence to create and maintain on the outside. What is true in the instances cited warrants us in the broad statement that public opinion on any question under discussion will be determined by the representatives of that particular interest.

Company Known by Its Agents.

There is an old adage which says: "Tell me the kind of company you keep and I will tell what you are." I want to phrase this a little and say with all the emphasis at my command that a life insurance company is known by the agents it keeps. In any given community an insignificant company, as far as size is concerned, may stand in the very front rank if its representative is a man of sterling qualities and in whom the people have absolute confidence, while in some community a really meritorious company may be in great disfavor because its agent is untruthful, dishonest or in his personal life. Let us be very frank in discussing this topic. We cannot afford to hurry over it. There are several vital questions which may be asked and should be answered. Let me put three questions and I will ask the association to help answer them:

What is the public attitude toward life insurance, and especially the life insurance agent?

Who is responsible for this condition?

How can we remedy it?

Question one—It is easy to say that life insurance never was so popular and so much appreciated by business men as it is today. I think that is true, and it is true because there never were so many honest, well trained, conscientious field workers as are now engaged in the business. But the process of elimination has not gone far enough. Recently two men from the life insurance association undertook to get an expression from the business men of that city of their estimate of the life insurance agent. They sent to a large number of the leading citizens several questions, with request for full and frank answers. These questions were:

1. Is the average life insurance agent welcome to call upon you?

2. Have you a favorable impression of the manner in which life insurance is sold in your city?

The result of this inquiry was that about 30 per cent. of the leading lawyers, physicians, bankers, merchants and manufacturers were not favorably impressed either with the agent or his methods of doing business. One prominent manufacturer stated that in his opinion 75 per cent. of the agents in Syracuse were not qualified to render intelligent service. If we take this man's opinion as representative we may conclude that the public regards service as the great "central idea" in the life insurance business.

Dignity and Life Insurance.

Last year Meredith Nicholson wrote a book, to which he gave the unique title, "Otherwise Phyllis." The book contains some interesting characters and, as usual, there is one, "the black sheep of the flock," who, after wasting his inheritance, disgracing his family, disappears and is not heard from for 16 years. He finally returns to the home town and, after being questioned as to where he had been and what he had been doing, is made to say: "In five years I had played in all my chips and had to sneak around office buildings trying to sell life insurance, which wasn't dignified nor becoming in a member of the haughty house of Holton."

Further on in the same story, in speaking of another member of the Holton family who had been unfortunate in business and found himself in reduced circumstances, the author uses these words: "Not much left for Will now but to go out and hustle for life insurance; the common fate of inglorious failure."

I ask you, gentlemen, how long must the life insurance business bear the stigma which so many unthinking men now attach to it? It is for us as members of this association to answer. Is this great institution of life insurance dependent upon the man who sneaks around from office to office, or upon the one who has made an inglorious failure of everything else, to perpetuate its usefulness to the people? I say no!—a thousand times no!

Question two—Who is responsible for this condition? I do not hesitate to say that the trouble is not wholly due to the field force. Whatever trouble or discord there has been or may be in the life insurance business to-day arises from a lack of faith and mutual confidence among life insurance companies and life insurance agents. Too long we have been standing over against each other instead of standing by each other. The insuring public might well ask: "Oh! companies and agents, how long will you continue to abuse our patience; how long will you trifle with our confidence?"

Public Exceedingly Patient.

The public has been exceedingly patient. In no other business in the world would there have been such patience with, or confidence in, an enterprise in which there has been such constant and often unscrupulous warfare as has prevailed in this business. We have played politics too long with this great trust committed to our keeping. I read some time ago a comparison between a politician and a statesman. A politician was described as a man who studies events and conditions as they relate to, or may influence, the next election. The statesman is one who considers events and circumstances as they relate themselves to, or may mould, conditions for the betterment of mankind in the next generation. Let us get rid of the life insurance politician, the mere "business getter," whether at the home office or in the field force, and put in his place the life insurance statesman, who can and will follow a conservative, constructive policy of "insurance building."

The third question—What is the remedy? First a real genuine desire and determination to clean house. This housecleaning should begin at the home office and should not stop until the house is put in order. Any home office management which will sacrifice a principle for an ethical expediency is not the kind of management to whose care the funds of widows and orphans can be safely entrusted. Companies must remember that safety is more important than size; that men are of more value than money; that every policy that goes out from the company should bear the signet of honor and the seal of fidelity.

That such contact means to the beneficiary at some time in the near or distant future a guaranty against want; it means home and education and an equal chance in the race of life. These sentiments are not inconsistent with the highest official ability. As a final word—there should be in our several agency managements a sifting of the wheat from the chaff. We want no man in our agency force who would not rather miss a sale than to swerve an iota from the truth. We want no man to represent us who does not draw a sharp distinction between business building and business getting. We want no man among our salesmen who places a higher value upon commission than upon honor.

We are working along the line and to the end that the life insurance business in this great field of Philadelphia is big enough to welcome to its service all who believe that "there is nothing finer in life than truth and nothing baser than a lie," and if we would secure the durable satisfactions of life they must be built upon character.

President Hegeman of the Metropolitan Acknowledges Receipt of Message Sent to Him by National Executive Committee.

At the banquet given to the members of the National Executive Committee by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company on April 21, Hugh M. Willet, chairman of the committee, suggested that a message be sent to President Hegeman, of the Metropolitan, expressing birthday congratulations and good wishes and the high esteem in which the National Association held that gentleman. The response was most enthusiastic and the members signed one of the menu cards as a round-robin of greeting to be forwarded to Mr. Hegeman.

Mr. Hegeman in a recent cablegram to Haley Fiske, vice-president of the company, makes reference to the message sent him at the request of the National Executive Committee, and states that he desires to express his sincere appreciation. He received first the cable message and later the round-robin signed by the guests, together with an account of how enthusiastically the proposition to send the message was adopted. Mr. Fiske states that Mr. Hegeman desires him to tell the members of the association how valued the tributes are; how dearly he will treasure the round-robin which came nearly 4,000 miles with its message of comradeship; how highly he appreciates the honor conferred upon the company by the acceptance of its invitation to a function which, to Mr. Hegeman and his associates, has come to have the significance of an annual national holiday. Mr. Hegeman also desired that the members of the National Association should feel that the latchstring of the Metropolitan's doors is always open and any member of the association when he comes to New York will always be welcomed.

"I have," said Mr. Hegeman, "most cordial sympathy with the members of the executive committee of the National Association in their work, and most hearty desires for their prosperity, collectively and individually."

WHY NOT "BRIGHTEN UP"?

An Idea Very Essential in Life Insurance Soliciting
One Overlooked by the Ordinary Agent.

By Hubert H. Ward, General Agent Pacific Northwest, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company.

Mr. Ward has made it necessary that we give a considerable amount of gratuitous advertising to certain paint company, but the word picture he paints makes adequate compensation. The "Grouch," is always a failure; hence the necessity to "BRIGHTEN UP."—Editor's Note.

It is almost impossible nowadays for one to take a rail journey without seeing large billboards along the rail tracks with the words "Brighten Up! Sherwin-Williams Paints Cover the Earth." There is a little sermon for insurance agents in this sign. Do you, Mr. Agent, find Those signs of the Sherwin-Williams Co. are good advertising. They will make the average householder stop and think and wonder if his house and barn need a new coat of paint. For some years I sat on a board in Cleveland with a member of this firm, and it is an education to come to know something of their methods of doing business. Cleveland originated the "Brighten Up" idea for employes of manufacturing plants, with such innovations as shower bath, serving hot coffee with lunches, having lunch rooms, etc., and this idea started in the Sherwin-Williams Co. In other words, before they told the world at large to "Brighten Up" they "brightened up" themselves—a very great essential in life insurance soliciting and frequently overlooked by the ordinary agent.

Now, Mr. Agent, as you go about soliciting life insurance you find many men who impress you probably with the thought that they should "brighten up." Some of those you meet are perhaps down in the slough of despond over business and need to "brighten up." Mr. Agent, are you like the average run of mankind? Do you want to see the other fellow "brighten up" and not start the game yourself? In other words, suppose—providing you have the thought that some of your prospects ought to "brighten up"—suppose you "brighten up" yourself first, and then you will be in a better position to help them.

Try it systematically and continuously. Let your smile "cover the earth"—at least that particular part of the earth where you happen to be soliciting life insurance. If you will do this, and if you will work the "brighten up" idea for next month, I will predict that each one of you will double your volume of business and double your number of applications.

The Sherwin-Williams Co. is the largest paint manufacturing concern in the world, with several manufacturing plants in the United States and Canada, and with headquarters at Cleveland. They claim to make the best paint on earth. I know they make a mighty fine paint. If their paint was poor the "brighten up" part of their ad would fall flat and they could not truthfully say that their paint "covers the earth," but they make a good paint. In other words they follow up their ad with results. In order to make good paint it is essential that they have, first, good materials; second, a good process, and third, good workmanship. If they were weak in any one of these three requisites their paint would not be what it is, but it is my belief that they usually strong in all three. They pay good attention to at third requisite, and they know that in order to have good workmen, those workmen must have contented minds, they must be happy. They know that a workman cannot do good an afternoon's work on a cold lunch eaten on a bench when he can after having had a cup of hot coffee and a dish of hot soup in a dining room with tables covered with clean white oil cloth.

They do all this for their workmen and they get a better afternoon's work out of them as a result. Now, Mr. Agent, here the Sherwin-Williams Co. have three requisites—good materials, good process and good workmen—I would call your attention to the fact that you have good materials and a good process.

Therefore, Mr. Agent, we invite you to join our "brighten up" club. Let us see if we cannot "cover the earth" with a new idea concerning life insurance salesmanship—good materials (our present most excellent line of policies); a good process (the helps furnished you by our company and by our agency to increase your efficiency); good workmen (your own good selves brought to your highest standard of efficiency) a resultant of those "brighten up" methods which we are endeavoring to promulgate).

Mental Condition.

While the proper mental condition of an agent is most essential (namely, a light heart, a forceful attitude and a pleasant smile), yet there are certain little external appearances which count for much in the success of the life insurance agent—a clean shaven face each morning, clean linen each morning, well brushed clothes each morning, well polished shoes each morning. All these little essentials (which so many people think of as "non-essential") count in the final analysis.

Mr. Agent, "cover the earth" with your personality, but let that personality impress itself upon your hearers in all ways possible, a clean mind, a clean heart and clean clothes. In other words, the appearance of "fresh paint" from hat to shoes. We furnish you, Mr. Agent, with canvassing "paint," and we furnish you with the brush necessary to apply that "paint." Your workmanship, however, will be good or bad according to the way in which you know how to handle the brush. The brush is a knowledge of what you are selling. The "paint" is the policies which you are selling for your company, but the workmanship is not the company's. It is yours—it is your own individual effort. Therefore, no matter what the company does for you, no matter what I may try to do for you, it is all of no avail if you leave the "paint cans" unopened and the brush wrapped. In conclusion, "Success (like paint) comes in Cans"—"Failure in Can't's." Therefore, drop out from your vocabulary the word "Can't" and bring to the front your "Cans," which are: "I can succeed." "I can sell life insurance." "I can make money selling life insurance." "I can work faithfully and hard." "I can be efficient." These, Mr. Agent, are some of your "paint cans." The Cans of Success. Use them. "Brighten Up" and with them "Cover the Earth"—not only with your optimism, but with applications for life insurance for your company.

Business.

"Business is poor," said the beggar,
Said the undertaker, "It's dead."
"Falling off," said the riding school teacher,
The druggist, "Oh, vial," he said.
"It's all write with me," said the author,
"Picking up," said the man on the dump.
"My business is sound," quoth the bandsman,
Said the athlete, "I'm kept on the jump."

The bottler declared it was "corking!"

The parson, "It's good," answered he.

"I make both ends meet," said the butcher,

The tailor replied, "It suits me."

CHARLES W. SCOVEL ADDRESSES PENNSYLVANIA STATE CONFERENCE OF MOTHERS' PENSION BOARDS.

Advocates an Important Application of the Monthly Income Idea Which Has Received Little or No Attention Heretofore.

Former National President Charles W. Scovel, of Pittsburgh, who has given much study to the various phases of monthly income insurance, made a brief address at the closing session of the State Conference of Mothers' Pension Boards, held at Pittsburgh, June 2 and 3, in which he advocated an important application of the monthly income idea that seems to have had little or no attention heretofore.

The central aim of the mothers' pension movement, now spreading over the country, is to bridge the gap from the father's death until the children become wage earners—allowing the mother just enough monthly money from the State to supplement her own efforts and enable her thus to keep the family unit unbroken through its period of greatest stress. The sums proven sufficient for this vital purpose range from $9 to $18 a month for the smaller families of from one to four.

Mr. Scovel pointed out that the minimum ordinary policy, for only $1,000, of which so many millions already are in force, will by itself accomplish that purpose for a great proportion of those families. This is a fact of vast significance to society, that ought to be known and spread, not only by all social workers, but by all agents and cashiers who write insurance and settle policy claims.

The subject of Mr. Scovel's talk was "The Ounce of Prevention." After referring to the tremendous social value of the 29,000,000 industrial policies, averaging $140 each, in providing for burial and other expenses at death of both young and old, he pointed out that the $17,000,000,000 of ordinary insurance now in force on the lives of adults are divided among 9,000,000 of policies for the lowest unit—$1,000. He then emphasized the fact, so frequently encountered by the social worker, that the family receiving $1,000 or $2,000 on the bread-winner's death has commonly spent it all (often unwisely) within a few months, or a year or two at most, and after that brief period of easy money is left even more helpless than before.

Spreading the Knowledge.

"You social workers," he continued, "can help better than the life agent can, better than anyone else can, in making these many billions of dollars in policies of $1,000 to $2,000 yearly effective as whole tons of prevention to keep these many millions of families from ever needing mothers' pensions. How? By spreading among those families, as they come to know and trust you, the knowledge that even these small policies can be and ought to be paid—not in one sum at death—but in the shape of monthly income, extending at least over the years until the oldest child or children can go to work, and continuing (where $2,000 or more is carried) throughout the mother's life, however long.

"You can tell the father while living that he ought to have his policies, present and future, made payable that way. You can tell the mother that, if she has not done so, she can and ought to choose to take the proceeds that way. This is a work of educating the people. The life agent must keep after new insurance; he has neither time nor favorable opportunity to do very much of this educational work, even if he knows the facts. And this whole subject of monthly income insurance is so new and so vast that it will take a long time for the rank and file of the agencies to learn it fully.

"As applied to the $1,000 policy, the monthly income idea gives a family service that surprises one, I confess, when I figured it out last night—and I had already been studying the general subject a great deal. The widow can have the income spread over just the number of years needed to bring her oldest child or children to the wage-earning point. That $1,000 will yield, for instance, $9.50 a month for 10 years, or $18 a month for 7 years, or $17.67 a month for 5 years—and these sums will be increased by yearly dividends. Remembering that New Jersey provides a mothers' pension of only $9 a month for a widow with one child, and that our Alleghany County board finds the average pension it has granted to be $18 a month for an average family of four, it will be evident that even this smallest unit of $1,000 can be made to bridge the yawning chasm of helpless years for a large proportion of families. Tell them so!

"The $2,000 policy opens a wider vista of service for all the family, especially if the insured adds the trifling special premium required to prolong the income throughout the wife's life—only 36 cents a month, at age 35 for both. That $2,000 will yield (1) $170 at death for funeral and other expenses; (2) $10 a month for the widow's life, however long; or (3) if she die soon after her husband, $10 a month for 20 years in all (long enough to help bring up youngest child; or (4) if the father lives on, say, to age 65, he can draw $1,045 in one sum or a life annuity amounting to $10 a month for his own old age; and (5) all the while the bulk of the money paid in by him has been held in his loan value (more ready for emergency use than other invested savings) amounting in the second year to 37 per cent. of what he has paid in; tenth year, 67 per cent.; twentieth year, 85 per cent.; and thirtieth year, 100 per cent.—all his money back for old age support. For all this he has had to lay aside (deducting dividends on the scale now paid) only $4 a month for the first year at age 35, gradually decreasing to $2.30 a month the thirtieth year.

"The many millions of families whose heads now carry $1,000 to $3,000 of insurance have no idea that it can be made to yield any such service. Nor will most people realize, until your mothers' pension work becomes generally known, that these $9 to $18 monthly incomes will really keep the family unbroken. You, who are proving the latter fact, are the very ones to tell the people to make their existing policies payable monthly—as real ounces of prevention."

HAVE A DEFINITE PURPOSE IN WHAT YOU ATTEMPT

By Chas. J. Rockwell, Field Supervisor The Edward A. Woods Agency, The Equitable Life Assurance Society, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Singleness and fixity of purpose are absolutely essential in order to arrive at any successful result in this business or in any other. Laying down a plan of action and then sticking to it is the only way to "get there."

We would laugh at the man who, wishing to drill a well, first drilled 10 inches here, then 10 inches there, and kept shifting the machinery all over a ten-acre field; because this is so plainly absurd. We all know that the man who will drill that well is the man who stands by the spot he has selected for his well and drills away. He has a definite purpose, a concrete plan carefully made, and he will not be diverted from it. As a logical result he succeeds.

The carpenter, before he attempts to use saw or chisel, plainly marks out the lines he intends to follow. The contractor insists on plans and specifications before beginning to erect the building. Nothing will they leave to chance, but must have their purpose clearly defined. In all walks of life, business, the professions or mechanics, it is the man with a definite purpose, which he unswervingly pursues, who attains results worth while. Why?

We have all heard of men who possess that marvelous power called personal magnetism; which enables its possessor to make others see and accept his point of view as their own. These men seldom hear a refusal; they get applications with but little argument and no waste of time. This wonderful power, so useful to an agent, is a cultivated one; and if we will study and endeavor to emulate the methods of these men we may learn something of the secret of their power. And one thing will impress you at once—that all men possessed of personal magnetism are very much earnest. They never trifle, never dally, never vacillate; they are always in tremendous earnest, with a clear idea of what they want, and their very intense earnestness makes them magnetic. Their minds are filled with one controlling idea; in other words they have a definite purpose.

This earnestness has a most direct effect on the prospective applicant, and another, highly valuable, though less direct effect upon the agent himself. The agent who has concentrated his mind on a definite purpose, and through this concentration has become in deadly earnest, when this earnestness has developed magnetism which will not be denied, and which will bring applications readily, is certain to be stronger, broader and more contented.

Mark it down, that the man who succeeds in anything is the man who sets himself a task to do, and makes it his business enough; so that, even though he falls short of his aims, the result he does achieve is still a credit to him. Fail!! What is no disgrace to fail—trying for the ideal. The best men you ever knew have had failures; but what they accomplished while trying to succeed has made them great to us. The only man who never failed is the man who has never adopted a high standard. Such a man does not know, and never will know his own measure, nor his own worth.

It will pay us all to try ourselves and fail; remembering that each effort makes us stronger for the next trial. Standards of agents many times differ, not because one is more capable than the other, but because one has a willingness and desire to big things and the other has not. It is just as easy to think about a 20-story building as it is about a one-story building; and the thought is a great deal more broadening.

Never look behind when running a race—unless you want to lose it. Then forget the rejected applications, the postponed risks, the cases you failed to close and all the other disappointments. Keep your eye on the finish; know the objective you want; stick to a line of attack; do not allow yourself to be side-tracked, or scatter your efforts. Concentrate! Remember that even the mighty Mississippi River was of little use to commerce until its waters were hemmed in by levees and directed to one certain channel instead of being permitted to wander about seeking a straight course to the sea and never finding it; and in the meantime wasting the usefulness of its vast volume of water. Stay on the main line, yourself, and set yourself a purpose; and when you have done so, concentrate on its accomplishment all the powers that you have and can acquire; become fiercely earnest, and you will win.

Cultivate Your Crop.

Who with 10 fertile acres is content to make a meager living by working only one?

You, too, have a fertile field to cultivate—the insurance field. And a mighty productive field it is for the man who puts energy and ambition into working it right.

Are you covering your ground, or only working a little patch of it?

There's many a farm in this country, once abandoned and being worn out and worthless, that is to-day making a good living for its owner.

Just a difference in methods, that's all.

A little more system, a little more intensive cultivation, a little more science, a little less trusting to luck, will wonder for the insurance agent as well as the farmer—FOR NO INSURANCE FIELD IS EVER WORKED OUT.

Prepare Your Soil.—Let the people know, for instance, that you are selling "the best there is in life insurance."

Sow Your Seed.—See six or eight people a day and every day, day after day. The number of good prospects will vary in proportion to the number of people you see. Not every one will be a good prospect, but I do say there is an absolute law of average, varying with the personality of the man who is seeking for good prospects.

LECTURES ON LIFE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Local Association Conducts Successful Educational Campaign in George Washington University, Young Men's Christian Association and the Business High School.

by James Lee Bost, General Agent, Home Life Insurance Company of New York, Washington, D. C.

The District of Columbia has lately become a prominent center of life insurance education. The occasion for this is the recent establishment of a course of lectures on Life Insurance at three of Washington's popular institutions under the direction of the committee of education and conservation appointed by the local Life Underwriters' Association. This committee is represented by George C. Jordan, Orville B. Brown, Edward S. Brashears and James Lee Bost.

As chairman of the committee, the writer has been requested to prepare an article for the LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS, descriptive of the manner in which this educational campaign has been conducted, with the view that it might contribute some profitable suggestions to other associations not yet started in this far-reaching movement.

When the committee met for discussion of the work, it decided that its attempt the first year, so far as institutional advertising through lectures is concerned, would not extend beyond a preliminary degree. Therefore, after choosing the institutions which were considered most desirable it selected a limited number of topics rather general in their scope. The institutions chosen were the George Washington University, the Young Men's Christian Association, and the Business High School. Calls were made upon the authorities of these institutions to explain the object and to gain their co-operation in the plan. It may be frankly said that there was considerable doubt in the committee's minds whether our purposes would be properly understood and approved. However, a few moments only were required in each case to gain the necessary confidence and co-operation desired.

At one institution it was found to be just the thing the authorities had been contemplating; at another, the slight suspicion of the proposition, which was at first evident, was quickly removed by citation of the fact that the members of the calling committee represented different companies, and that the proposed scheme was in no manner for the benefit of any individual person or company. Such a thing as representatives of competing companies working together in harmony in contradistinction to the old-time method of competition in the business seemed novel and unique and caused a smile of satisfaction very apparent.

The plan of lectures being accepted and the dates for them arranged from one to two weeks apart, it was then necessary for the committee to secure lecturers of distinctive ability and national prominence, in order to make the experiment a pronounced success.

At the university the course was presented to the classes in economics and political science; at the Young Men's Christian Association to classes studying commercial and general business methods, and at the Business High School to the two upper classes, consisting of about 600 members.

The subjects and lecturers selected for the George Washington University were as follows: March 27, subject, "Life Insurance—Its Conservation as to the Home, Estate, Community, Corporation, Nation and Individual," by Prof. S. S. Huebner, dean of the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce of the University of Pennsylvania, and author of a text book on Life Insurance, now in preparation for schools and colleges. Second, April 24, "History of Life Insurance," by Henry Moir, actuary of the Home Life of New York and author of several important books on actuarial science, as well as other more popular works. Third, May 8, "Life Insurance as a Profession," by Stewart Anderson, editor of the Massachusetts Life Insurance Company, and well-known as a lecturer on life insurance subjects. Fourth, May 15, subject, "Policy Contracts—Their Principal Forms with Ordinary Terms, Clauses and New Features," by Neil D. Sills, general agent in Richmond, Va., of the Sun Life of Canada, and ex-president of the National Association.

Each of these subjects was most carefully prepared and forcefully presented, and were listened to with deep interest and enthusiasm on the part of students and faculty, as well as by many general agents and sub-agents who attended.

At the Young Men's Christian Association, the subjects and lecturers were as follows: April 19, subject, "General Principles and Effect of Life Insurance," by Charles F. Nesbit, superintendent of insurance for the District of Columbia. Second, April 24, subject, "History and Evolution of Life Insurance," by Graham C. Wells, a practical and successful life insurance writer and general agent at Pittsburgh for the Provident Life and Trust Company of Philadelphia. Third, May 8, subject, "Life Insurance as a Profession," by Stewart Anderson. Fourth, May 15, subject, "Policy Contracts," by Neil D. Sills. The lectures on the two latter subjects being held on same dates and topics as those of the university, the classes of the two institutions were merged for these dates.

At the Business High School the topics and lecturers were as follows: April 23, subject, "General Principles and Effects of Life Insurance," by Charles F. Nesbit, superintendent of insurance for the District of Columbia. Second, April 30, subject, "Life Insurance as a Profession," by Dr. Louis I. Dublin, statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, of New York. Third, May 7, subject, "History and Evolution of Life Insurance," by Dr. Frederick L. Hoffman, statistician of the Prudential Life Insurance Company, of Newark, N. J., and fourth, May 14, "Specific Services of Life Insurance with Various Policy Forms," by J. H. Jefferies, secretary of the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Philadelphia.

At the Young Men's Christian Association and the Business High School, the subjects were presented with much added interest by being thrown open to general discussion by way of questions and answers after their formal presentation. At the latter institution, where the students are quite young, with minds more or less immature, it was most interesting to observe the unbounded enthusiasm of both the boys and girls over the opportunity to learn more of the subject by asking questions. It seemed unmistakable ability of the young mind to grasp the general principles of Life Insurance. A short story told at the beginning of the lecture was sufficient to hold the interest of all to the end.

The committee was careful to see that the editors of the local papers were furnished with proper data regarding the purpose of these lectures, as well as with abstracts of lectures as they were severally presented, with the result that an account of every lecture was printed in all of the papers, varying from a short mention of two inches to nearly a column, according to space limited by the over-crowding of news columns by the Mexican situation.

The institutions where this work was conducted have expressed hearty gratifications over the manner in which they were given, as well as the strong personnel of the lecturers, and have signified a desire to have a more extensive course presented to them next season.

WOMAN'S INTEREST AND INFLUENCE IN LIFE INSURANCE.

Never before in the history of the World has so much attention been given to the interests and influence of Woman in her relation to moral, social and economic welfare. Feminism, no matter what our conception of the meaning of the term may be, undoubtedly indicates a rapidly growing movement which eventually will sweep before it the antagonism and rivalry of sex which thus far in the evolution of the human race have characterized society.

Lamartine was in advance of the time when he said: "Any real rivalry of the sexes is the sheerest folly and most unnatural nonsense." We of this day need claim no special gift of prescience by discerning in our mind's eye an era in which Woman's interests will be as many and as varied as she chooses to make them; an era of intellectual equality with opportunities divorced of the present inhibitions now peculiarly and, until recent years, firmly attached to the activities of the gentler sex.

It must be admitted that the emancipation of feminine individuality will, as a natural consequence, carry with it a corresponding burden of responsibility. But with this responsibility will also come the privilege to acquire the physical, mental and moral strength and fortitude necessary to successfully meet the situation.

One immeasurably important phase of economic and social service with which Woman has hitherto been deplorably unfamiliar will then be given the consideration justly deserved by an institution created, supported and perpetuated for her—Life Insurance.

The topic for the Prize Essay Contest at the Cincinnati Convention will be, "Woman's Interest and Influence in Life Insurance." The subject is so timely and its ramifications are so many that it should prove a remarkably inspiring and prolific theme.

Is there any human agency bearing such an important relation to Woman, concerning which she understands so little? Life Insurance is an island of security, peace and plenty. Yet more than three million American women are desperately struggling in the surrounding breakers of poverty, and thousands more are sinking exhausted in the cold and merciless sea of destitution. The ignorance of Woman as to the real purpose of Life Insurance results in such needless and pitiful sacrifice of even the actual necessities of life, that it points the finger of shame at American civilization. Argue as we may, Life Insurance is the great and only protector of the homes of thousands of American families; argue as we may the facts of the situation prove that in thousands of families there is no protection in the form of Life Insurance, and upon analysis we find the reason of his to exist in many cases because of an objection on the part of the wife.

Various theories have been advanced why the women of this country apparently take so little interest in an institution which at some future period could be of such vital importance to them. Whatever the psychology of these objections may be, the constantly broadening sphere of woman's interest and influence will eventually do much to solve the problem. A man sometimes declines to insure his life because under most policy forms he realizes that he will never see the tangible evidence of the completed transaction; a wife discourages her husband from insuring his life in her favor because she sees the tangible evidence of present expense, but at the same time does not take cognizance of the compensating benefit which will eventually accrue to her. In Life Insurance a negative influence is generally equivalent to direct discouragement. Leaving out of consideration the sentiment which actuates a man to insure his life for the benefit of those dependent upon him, why should a man economize now so that his wife may not suffer after his span of life has been spent, when he is not interested in the proposition? He does not care because she does not care, and she does not care because she does not understand.

It occurs to us that until the Feminism movement, the great majority of women must have lived for the then present alone, or else they were simply remissive of the past. In the Feminism movement the past is but a series of lessons learned, and the present is the threshold of the future. This habit of thought, taking into account an element of time which in days past was denied to Woman, means a complete readjustment of mental processes. A new factor—the future—an earthly future—arises, and the contemplation of this once forbidden realm will necessitate a comparison of present actions with ultimate results. Thus in the development of a mere habit of thought will Life Insurance receive from woman a tremendous impetus. But Life Insurance will not be the only new channel into which the feminine mind will be directed. Many phases of the new sphere of mental activities will present themselves, each demanding recognition. So that Life Insurance will receive its proper and just share of thoughtful consideration, the Committee on Education and Conservation has in course of preparation a series of "human interest" stories which will focus the attention of Woman upon the one subject which should not be overshadowed by affairs of minor importance.

The foregoing is but one aspect of "Woman's Interest and Influence in Life Insurance," and consistent with the facts of the case we have taken into account the lack of interest and the negative influence of Woman in Life Insurance as evidenced by indisputable records.

There are, however, a few women who, whether or not it was born with them, acquired, or thrust upon them, are most ardent advocates of Life Insurance. We refer to the woman solicitor, many of whom have met with notable success. Theoretically, at least, the solicitation of Life Insurance is a field in which Woman should be a star of the first magnitude. Life Insurance is inextricably entwined with the heart and the home; its appeal, all things considered, is largely on a sentimental basis. Therefore, woman, a creature of "intellectualized emotion," is by her very nature endowed with the qualities necessary to an effective presentation of the subject. Her innate gentleness and modesty, if not always securing an interview, certainly precludes a brusque or offensive reception.

There is also another field in Life Insurance where Woman's interest and influence is powerful to a marked degree. A wife's kindly interest in her husband's business, brings to bear a tremendous psychic influence upon his mental attitude, and his mental attitude is nearly always indicative of success or failure. At the agency meetings of one of the largest agencies in this country, the presence of the wives of the solicitors is always encouraged. It has been found to be good business policy, and, then again, as Miss Mulock said, "The deepest tenderness a woman can show a man is to help him do his duty."

Puget Sound Association Issues Monthly Bulletin.

To the Puget Sound association has fallen the honor of being the first local body affiliated with the National Association to issue a monthly bulletin to its members. The object of the bulletin is to keep the members in touch with association activities and will contain other matter of interest and value. It is planned to reprint timely articles which may appear in the various home office publications, and when desirable, to also make use of matter from some of the insurance periodicals. The bulletin is the idea of A. B. Furner, the newly elected secretary of the association, and Mr. Furner will edit the publication.

Back to the Farm, Life Insurance Agents!

The Fourth Estate is the leading publication for the makers of newspapers. It is read very closely by advertising men. It exerts a great influence among those men whose business it is to reflect the tendencies of the times and to mould public opinion.

An idea of its power for good or evil may be accurately gauged by taking into consideration the class of people which it serves and the opinion which these people have of the publication. Ogden Mills Reid, editor of the New York Tribune, has said: "I consider it an absolute necessity for every man who wants to keep thoroughly informed on what is going on in the newspaper world." Norman E. Mack, publisher and proprietor of the Buffalo Times, declared: "I consider it would be impossible to keep in close touch with matters pertaining to the journalistic profession unless I went carefully through The Fourth Estate every week it is issued." Charles H. Grasty, president and general manager of the Baltimore Sun; Dr. Talcott Williams, director of the Pulitzer School of Journalism; Clark Howell, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, and many other journalists have expressed warm encomiums along similar lines.

Mr. Reid, Mr. Mack, Mr. Grasty, Mr. Williams and Mr. Howell are men who reflect, direct, make and break Public Opinion. They rely, so they say, upon that which they read in The Fourth Estate.

So, this is what these men and thousands of other editors, publishers, advertising managers and newspaper men read as a caption to a letter appearing in The Fourth Estate issued May 16, 1914.

NEWSPAPERS LOSE $100,000,000 INSURANCE SOLICITORS GET VAST SUM THAT SHOULD BE SPENT IN ADVERTISING

Following this is a lengthy communication signed R. S. S., which is an argument to prove that the life insurance solicitor is not worthy of his hire; that the commissions paid solicitors is an unnecessary expense; that $100,000,000 paid annually to solicitors by the various legal reserve life insurance companies should be diverted to advertising in the newspapers. All this is bolstered up by reference to an advertising campaign of the German Potash Syndicate and to the (so-called) success of the Postal Life in selling life insurance by the non-agency-newspaper-advertising-plan.

Has The Fourth Estate sold its birthright for a mess of potash? Not exactly, but it has given official recognition to a silly diatribe of the genus potboiler, which is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of piffle, punk and palaver. The Perlmutter of its double-tongued arraignment being the Postal Life.

Advertising is a powerful leverage of modern salesmanship, but it has never developed such conditions as to mean the elimination of the salesman. We advertise in order to prepare the way for salesmen. And if our advertisements are written with sufficient PULL, to say nothing of PUNCH and displayed in the proper mediums, the work of the salesman is made less difficult. But, above all, good advertising never serves as a substitute for the salesman; on the other hand, it demands more salesmen.

As to the first P in the pod—the German Potash Syndicate—the article in The Fourth Estate says:

Sir: Although there are few who deny the force of the maxim that "it pays to advertise," the fact remains that the advertising solicitor is still something of a missionary. Although there are many large concerns whose business has been built up by means of advertising, there are still many business men who have to be convinced that money spent in advertising is money well spent.

Of course, it follows that the concerns who have made advertising pay thoroughly understand the business of advertising. Many of them employ high-priced specialists to prepare their copy, and this frequently results in advertising material which is as readable and instructive as the articles upon which the circulation of the publication is based.

A notable example of this phase of the advertising business is the propaganda of the German Potash Syndicate (Die Deutsches Syndikat die Kaliwerke), whose intelligent and persistent use of space (chiefly in Southern locals and farm papers) has gradually educated the people in the use of potash as a constituent element in commercial fertilizers.

Twenty years ago a favorite formula for a cotton fertilizer was 8 per cent. phosphoric acid, 2 per cent. nitrogen and 1 per cent. potash. Such a limited use of potash means that the Potash Syndicate, which virtually enjoys a monopoly of the manufacture of mineral potash salts, sold only from 150 to 300 pounds of kainit or sylvinit (the common carriers of potash) for each ton of commercial fertilizer sold in this country. The syndicate thereupon wisely determined to create a demand for potash. Disregarding the local manufacturer, whose interest it was to influence the use of phosphoric acid (mainly manufactured from phosphate rock, a domestic product), they went straight to the farmer—the ultimate consumer—with carefully designed and instructive advertising showing the beneficial effects of potash upon growing crops, in which were shown corn, cotton, peanuts, wheat, tobacco—all of the heavily fertilized crops—as grown with and without fertilizer, with lightly-potashed and with heavily-potashed fertilizer.

The result of this intelligent appeal to the farmer was that, every year, he began to demand more and more potash, so that, to-day, the average cotton-fertilizer formula, instead of including a mere 1 per cent. of potash, usually carries from 2½ per cent. to 3 per cent.—and the business of the canny Teutons in this country has doubled or trebled.

We are glad to be furnished with such an excellent e ample of the benefits accruing from institutional advertising. Doubtless the advertising campaign served its purpose of educating the farmer of the South as to the use of potash as a fertilizer, but the ultimate maximum success of the propaganda did not depend upon a mail order business. Orders received were in direct ratio to the follow-up arguments of salesmen. To advertise is well begun; remember though, that well begun is but half done. Thus endeth the reading of the gospel of Potash.

This way to the Big Show! Learn how 20,000 life insurance agents are to be driven back to the farm. See R. S. S. in his wonderful, marvelous, stupendous, astounding, sensational, death-defying feat of juggling $100,000,000 (count 'em if you can) in one hand.

To be serious, and one must need be serious at this juncture, R. S. S. attempts to convey the impression to the readers of The Fourth Estate that the Postal Life has met with such success in selling life insurance on the mail order plan that the estimated $100,000,000 annually paid to solicitors by other companies is an unnecessary expense. In other words, he has attempted to tell the most influential body of men on this continent that all life insurance agents are thieves, and that the commissions made in selling life insurance are illegitimate graft—for the life insurance agent—but that the same commissions would be perfectly proper graft for advertising men. For quoth the gentleman, "What a mellon-cutting there would be if this enormous sum were spent in advertising."

The so-called success of the Postal Life in selling life insurance by advertising and through the mail is the great standing joke of the insurance world. To quote:

An even still more striking example of the power of intelligent advertising is furnished by one of our New York life insurance companies. At the corner of Nassau and Liberty streets, in the very heart of the financial district, is a fifteen-story building owned by a life insurance institution that is perhaps the best example in the world of the pulling power of properly prepared copy, because it does not employ one solitary agent, but gets all of its new business through advertising. The institution in question is the Postal Life Insurance Company; and its success is all the more remarkable because of the fact that the life insurance business has been so traditionally a business of solicitation that the persistence of the life insurance agent has become a by-word and a standing jest. The saying is common, "Sticks like a leech, or like an insurance agent."

The company began modestly about nine years ago. Its organizer and president, Mr. Malone, believed that the life insurance business, because of a quasi-public character, should be freed from the oppressive burden imposed by the excessive selling cost necessary under the agency system; and he began with the proposal that the Postal Life would dispense with agents and give the benefit of the agent's commission to the man who paid the premium. He was laughed at. Of course! Reformers are always laughed at—at first! But the idea grew. The Postal pounded away. It bought space intelligently—and used it intelligently. After a while it began to be seen that it was not difficult to persuade a man that $60 ($100 less an agent's commission of 40 per cent.) was less than $100, and then men began to wonder why they had never sensed that self-evident proposition before; in fact, it seemed a little strange that anybody should ever have been silly enough to suppose that the insurance companies really paid the insurance agents' commissions. But the Postal's thoughtful advertising campaign made it so clear that the ultimate consumer—the policyholder—must of necessity pay all the expenses, including the agents' commissions, that in a little while it became very easy to convince the average man.

And the Postal Life with nearly $15,000,000 of insurance in force and nearly $10,000,000 of assets, is today selling its policies not only throughout the United States, but in foreign lands, and is covering a wider field than perhaps any other life company.

But what is of peculiar interest and significance to publishers is the fact that the Postal has proved that the great business of life insurance can be successfully conducted without agents, but through advertising and correspondence.

The agency companies now spend on their agency organizations more than $100,000,000 a year. What a melon-cutting there would be if this enormous sum were spent in advertising!

This would result in an educational campaign which would reach to remote parts of the world where even the ubiquitous agent is unknown; many more people would learn about insurance protection than know about it now, and after a while they would buy life insurance the same as they now buy any necessary commodity—the same indeed as they now buy fire insurance.

More power to the Postal Life. May its prestige and vogue increase even if the 20,000 agents now on the firing line have to go back to the farm. Once there, however, they will have the consolation of knowing that they can take out a policy by mail and save money.

Among life insurance men the Postal Life is not spoken of as a "company"; it is referred to as an "Experiment." As to the progress it has made, it all depends upon one's viewpoint, but to any man of intelligence the following figures should suggest certain peripatetic characteristics of the crab. According to a contemporary, figures for the year 1913 show total income for the year $2,217,204, a drop of $305,000, or 14 per cent., from the previous year. New premiums less than 25 per cent. below the previous year. Insurance written about $80,000 less than in 1912. Business in force dropped off two and three-quarter millions. The excess of mortality over expected was approximately $63,262.

From the above it is evident that in his endeavor to make a strong argument, R. S. S. could not have selected an illustration less capable of supporting his contentions. In his feeble vaporings he has unconsciously endeavored to put The Fourth Estate, issued every Saturday, in the tri-weekly class.

The National Association does not dispute the value of advertising. In fact, it has devoted the best part of two years to convincing its members and the companies represented by its members of the absolute necessity of a campaign of non-partisan advertising. Therefore, it seems particularly ungracious for The Fourth Estate to lend its columns to a communication of the character quoted. We can see where nothing has been gained by the advertising fraternity, and we are hoping against hope that a false impression in the minds of the editors and advertising men of the country has not been created by the irresponsible dribblings of one who proves the truth of the maxim that "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing."

If you should see a teamster driving mile after mile with the brakes set on his wheels you would conclude that he was either a dense fool or a very careless fellow. And, perhaps, you are displaying no more sense. What about those bad business habits that you persist in through ignorance or negligence? Do you realize how much harder they make your work and how greatly they curtail your production? Look through your register and note the policies returned for cancellation. In every case where you failed to place business written you were at fault in some respect. If the same fault operated several times it must be somewhat of a habit. Kill it without respect for age or condition. The commonest and worst of the whole brood is the habit of not getting a settlement with the application.

There need be no difficulty in securing payment at the time of closing nearly every case. Make it a habit.—Pointers.

College Men and Life Insurance from a Practical Viewpoint.

Once in a while we meet a man who looks with contempt upon money. In the majority of instances he is a member of a school of transcendental theory which seeks to prove the incompatibility of the modern idea of service and the remuneration which accrues from service well rendered. Any attempt to separate the two fails, for both are interdependent. But there are occasions when traditional dignity forbids reference to a thing so base as the common medium of commercial exchange; and, while its existence is not denied, the part it plays and the purpose it serves is, by tacit agreement, left unspoken.

National President Ernest J. Clark recently delivered an address before the University of Cincinnati, in which he emphasized the opportunities which existed for college men in life insurance. Mr. Clark dwelt particularly upon the idea of Service, assuming, as was proper that he should do under the circumstances, that an intelligent audience would take into consideration the fact that for service rendered a price is always paid.

In connection with this we quote an article from The Insurance Post, which gives an interesting compilation of statistics showing the incomes of graduates who engaged in the solicitation of life insurance, as compared with the incomes of graduates adopting other lines of business and professional activity:

The college commencement season is at hand, and thousands of bright young men are facing the world with a diploma in their hand and a determination to show that their four years of college life have not been wasted. The argument of those who favor a college education as against the school of practical experience is that the college-trained man, although he starts in the race under the handicap of less practical experience, has a better equipped mind, and is able to make more rapid progress than the man who lacks scholastic advantages. In this connection a table has been prepared showing the average incomes for five years of Yale graduates of the class of 1906, divided according to occupations. The interesting feature of this is the fact that the young men who became insurance agents made by far the best record of all the graduates during their first year out of college, and had the best average for the first five, although advertisers and publishers caught up with them after the first few years. The table is interesting, however, as showing the opportunities life insurance work offers to a presentable young man who can think and talk in the way of prompt income and possibilities of advancement.

Commissioner Done Issues Ruling on Dividend Comparisons.

When Insurance Commissioner Willard Done of Utah promulgates a ruling it is well worthy of careful perusal. The conclusions reached by Mr. Done are invariably impartial and equitable. He has recently issued an opinion as to the use of dividend estimates in participating and non-participating companies, and has pointed out how various misrepresentations may do lasting injury to both. The ruling, which follows, should be of interest to all solicitors:

A complaint against a life insurance agent accused of over-estimating dividends has given rise to considerable thought as to what may and may not be permitted in the way of dividend illustration. A few preliminary observations should be made. In the first place, both participating and non-participating insurance must be protected. Misrepresentation will do lasting injury to both. It is evident that it would be unfair and in every way undesirable to prohibit dividend illustrations, as that would result in the practical elimination of participating insurance in future writings. But it is clear that the abuse of the privilege of illustration must ultimately result in the entire prohibition of any dividend estimates or statements whatsoever. This prohibition if not reached by departmental ruling, as it has been in some States, would surely be reached by legislation, as it has been in others. Hence the only way to protect and perpetuate participating insurance is to prevent abuse of this privilege.

All estimates of dividends to escape the charge of misrepresentation must be based on the experience either of the company making them or of some similar company. In line with this idea, I have issued a ruling that annual dividend companies may use their present current schedules or recent policies of exactly the same kind as those now issued. Companies writing deferred dividend insurance may base their estimates on policies matured by themselves or similar companies, making due allowance for non-forfeiture features, interest earnings, expense ratio and other elements that necessarily enter.

The abuse of the annual dividend estimate is in the attempt to carry it over too long a period. Since no company has been writing its present form of contract for very many years, it is difficult to understand how a company can legitimately use illustrations extending further into the future than past experience indicates. And yet instances are known where dividends are directly or tacitly estimated for 20, 25, 30 or 35 years with improvement at compound interest. Some companies, I find, are issuing booklets and illustration blanks covering long future periods.

Abuse is so inevitable where such blanks are placed indiscriminately in the hands of agents that the only way to prevent it is to prohibit their use. Companies using them are hereby notified that they must be withdrawn from this State. In the case in point the illustration was carried out by the agent or by the applicant for a period of 35 years, and I rule that no company is justified in estimating its dividends that far in advance. There is no past experience on which any such estimates can be justly based. This prohibition is issued in all friendliness and with the positive knowledge that if abuses continue the use of dividend estimates will be absolutely prohibited in the future as it has been in some States already.

The deferred dividend confined as it is to a very few companies, is being gradually abandoned by the companies now using it. Greater abuse can arise in estimating this form of dividend than the annual, and for that and other reasons the companies themselves are voluntarily abandoning this form of policy. I now ask all companies placing deferred dividend contracts in this State to furnish me with their literature and instructions to agents as to dividend estimates. This action was taken some three years ago and some abuses were found which I believe have been partly removed. These companies must furnish their literature again and it will be closely scrutinized and objectionable features removed as far as possible.

Companies that make a strong feature of dividend estimates are always prone to issue comparative literature with this feature emphasized. I have already prohibited the use of such literature where the names of other companies are mentioned. If any such literature is being issued, it must also be abandoned unless this ruling is contested in the proper way.

Companies issuing pamphlets containing annual dividend illustrations are hereby requested to furnish this office with copies of such pamphlets. Each company will be judged by the pamphlet or pamphlets it issues and will be informed whether these are objectionable. I ask that they be handed to me immediately for examination.

Companies and agents writing non-participating business are also admonished that it will be construed as misrepresentation for them to ignore the dividend element when making comparative statements with participating insurance. It has come to the notice of this department that some agents in making oral and written comparisons entirely ignore the dividend feature of participating insurance and make comparisons of their gross rates with the gross rates of the participating companies. Whenever non-participating insurance competes with participating, the regular dividend scales of the participating companies must be taken into account in all comparisons made.

THE ONE-EYED MAN.

How Success Follows the Efforts of the Person with One Purpose in View.

The following article was written by Clinton Davidson, who represents the Mutual Benefit at Louisville, Ky. Mr. Davidson loses no time in getting down to "brass tacks" and his story, straight from the firing line, is full of good advice and valuable suggestions.—Editor's Note.

The one-eyed man is the man with a single view—the man with a single purpose in life. We may liken him to a man aiming a rifle who closes one eye so as to exclude everything from view except the sight and the object he is aiming at. The one-eyed man always has some definite object in view, and everything that he does, and even every thought that he thinks, points forward toward and has some definite bearing upon the one great purpose of his life.

Suppose a young man, after leaving school, starts out upon the farm. His father is a well-to-do and successful farmer and he intends to become the same. He works steadily for about two years on the road to success, when he decides that his opportunities are too limited, that there isn't much chance for a young fellow of to-day upon the farm, anyhow. He wants to see the world and so he decides to try the railroad business where there will be no limit to his advancement.

Starting in Life.

He starts his career with the railroad as a freight brakeman. After working there for about two years he finds that advancement was not as rapid as he had thought. He has been in one or two bad wrecks, and so he goes home to his father, tells him of his experience and says, "The trouble with me is I haven't the education; that's what it takes to get along to-day." He persuades his father to send him to a medical college that he may become a famous and wealthy doctor. This takes about two years' preparatory work and four years of medical training before he graduates and is allowed to practice.

Twelve Years Lost.

He finds that it takes an awfully long time to build up a practice; that he has to wait for the people to come to him, and he sees all around him physicians who have spent a lifetime in the service and are barely making a living, so he comes back to his father again and says, "Father, I have made a mistake; there isn't anything in this doctor business. The men who make the money to-day are those who buy things cheap and sell them high." And so he persuades his father to set him up in their home town as a merchant. Haven't you seen hundreds of young men like this? I have. Thousands of dollars have been spent, 12 years have passed, and yet the young man is where we first found him—making a start in life.

What is the trouble with farming? Many men have become wealthy and successful farmers, but not like this young man. It was only by making farming their one aim in life.

Many men have been successful in the railroad world. One of the most successful, James J. Hill, started as a brakeman, but the goal he kept constantly before his eyes was that of a master railroader. Everyone of these lines lead to success—for the one-eyed man. Success which could be spelled this way ($ucce$$), but the young man spelled it (?ucce??).

All great men have been one-eyed men—Rockefeller, for example. It has been said that his one aim in life was to accumulate wealth. And he has done it. Harriman and Morgan were also, but I believe their aim was to acquire power and secure control, rather than simply to accumulate wealth.

The one-eyed man plans for the future—some people you know plan for a year at a time. You know of some agencies working for these "fly-by-night" companies, and they tell you they are guaranteed a large salary for a year. When asked about next year they say let next year take care of itself. The one-eyed man realizes that everything that he does and every thought he thinks has some definite bearing upon his one great purpose in life, and he acts accordingly.

The one-eyed man is well paid. He is not a one-eyed man because he is well paid, but he is well paid because he IS a one-eyed man. He is like a great surgeon—he loves his work. He does not stop and think about how much money he will get out of each case, but, like a great surgeon, he also is well paid.

Never Discouraged.

The one-eyed man never gets discouraged. He does not cry over spilt milk, but goes to the pasture and milks another cow. If the home office declines one application, he goes out and writes five more. He is an optimist, and when he sees the wolf at the door, says: "Well, here is where I get my winter furs." He realizes that troubles are like babies—the more you nurse them the bigger they grow.

The one-eyed man is enthusiastic; he uses concentration, he inspires confidence, gives service and employs system; but these are the effect and not the cause; they all spring from his deep love for his work, from the all-consuming purpose of his life. He tries to practice that old admonition, "Know all about your own business and something about every other business," and he is awake to every opportunity. Opportunity you know, knocks once at every man's door, but the one-eyed man does not expect the panels to be kicked in. He does not waste much time criticizing. Anyone can do that. I have never laid an egg in my life, but I am a better judge of an omelette than any hen that ever lived.

Men have tried to show us the thousand roads to success, and in trying to follow the money details we have often lost sight of the goal; but I contend that if we will make this work of protecting the widows and orphans our main effort in life the thousands of details will come to us naturally.

Just One Purpose.

All of us are not one-eyed insurance men, but every one of us has all the qualities necessary for a great success in this business if we make it the one purpose of our business in life. If we picture before us the success we want to attain and then let everything we do and every thought we think have some definite bearing upon it we are bound to reach it.

The life insurance business is worthy of the best that I have. I don't have a Sunday suit of clothes. The best clothes I have are not too good for life insurance work. The life insurance business is worthy of the best thoughts of our brains and purest impulses of our hearts.

"There are loyal hearts, there are spirits brave,
There are souls that are pure and true;
Then give to your work the best that you have,
And the best will come back to you.

"Give love, and love to your heart will flow,
A strength in your utmost need;
Have faith and a score of hearts will show
Their faith in your word and deed.

"For life is the mirror of king and slave—
'Tis just what you are and do—
Then give to your work the best that you have,
And the best will come back to you."

Gentlemen, the one-eyed man holds the secret of success. Let's all be one-eyed men.

What the Local Associations Are Doing

Life Association News has no paid correspondents. We depend entirely upon the secretaries of local associations to send us stories of all meetings of their respective associations. If an account of the last meeting of your association does not appear in this department, ask the secretary of your organization why he did not send us the particulars.

Immediately after each meeting, on the same day if possible, secretaries of local bodies should send us a full account of the business transacted, including copies of all speeches, or extracts from the most important of them.

Akron.

The May meeting of the Akron association was held at the Portage Hotel, with thirty members present. Mulford Wade, a member of the National Executive Committee, reported in detail as to the mid-year meeting of that committee in New York. The plans for the institutional advertising campaign were explained by Mr. Wade, and the subject will be discussed and acted upon at the June meeting.

Battle Creek.

Under the direction of National Treasurer H. Wibirt Spence, 14 life insurance agents of Battle Creek, Mich., formally organized the Battle Creek Life Underwriters' Association on May 26. Officers elected were as follows: President, Guy A. Ramsdell, Mutual of New York; vice-president, Roy Walt, Michigan Mutual; second vice-president, R. W. Scott, Metropolitan; secretary, F. W. Calvert, New England Mutual; treasurer, Lee Dudley, Northwestern. Executive committee—Howard H. Truitt, Mutual of New York; L. A. Dudley, Northwestern, and A. W. Shafer, Sun Life. The meeting was held in the Chamber of Commerce rooms and was characterized by genuine enthusiasm. This now gives the State of Michigan five associations. The Battle Creek body decided to join the National Association and sent in its application with that object in view. The Kalamazoo association sent an invitation to the new organization to participate in a joint meeting and outing at Gull Lake on June 22 and the invitation was accepted. Insurance Commissioner Winship will address the gathering on "Laws of the State of Michigan."

Boston.

The June meeting of the Boston association was held at the Napoli Inn, Nantasket Beach, on the 10th inst. The meeting was the fourth annual outing of the association, and the afternoon was spent in games and outdoor sports, such as baseball and quoits. Dinner was served at 6.30, there being about forty members present. There was a cabaret show and plenty of good music. No formal business was transacted and the speeches were impromptu.

Capital District

Twenty-five members and guests were present at the last meeting of the Capital District association, held on the evening of June 2, in the Chamber of Commerce rooms. Ten five-minute talks on practical topics were given by members of the association, as follows:

1. "Our Duty to Our Company," A. B. Mallory, Connecticut Mutual.
2. "Our Duty to Our Agency," P. W. Abbott, Northwestern.
3. "Our Duty to Our Client," W. J. Powers, John Hancock.
4. "Fitting the Policy to the Man," Jesse Barnet, Mutual Life.
5. "Conversion of Term Policies," D. A. Ter Bush, Travelers.
6. "Securing Leads," W. A. G. Linn, Fidelity Mutual.
7. "Does a Straight Canvass Bring Results," G. L. Buck, Provident.
8. "Getting Settlement with Applications," L. C. Van Derhyden, Penn Mutual.
9. "How to Increase Amount of Applications," J. F. O'Marah, Massachusetts Mutual.
10. "Suggestions for Annual Outing," E. F. Foley, Metropolitan.

Chairman C. C. DeRouville, of the executive committee, made a motion, which was duly seconded and carried, that a vote of thanks be extended to the Chamber of Commerce expressing the association's appreciation of the courtesy extended to them for the use of the room and the assurance of the association's support.

On the recommendation of the executive committee, it was unanimously moved and carried that Hon. Frank Hasbrouck, Superintendent of Insurance, and Harry D. Appleton, First Deputy Superintendent of Insurance, be elected as honorary members of the association.

The next meeting of the association will be an outdoor affair, and will probably be held at Parr's Island some time next month.

Chattanooga.

The regular monthly meeting of the Chattanooga association was held on the 5th inst. at the Hotel Patten and was devoted to the education and conservation movement. An amendment was made to the constitution providing that on account of the importance of the work of the chairman of the publicity committee that this office should be made an elective one. Samuel R. Connolly, of the Prudential, was elected to membership.

Chicago.

There was a lively discussion at the April meeting of the Chicago association as to question No. 10 of the recent questions promulgated by President Ferguson regarding the future policy of the association. This question brought up the point as to whether or not the association should attempt to prevent the placing of life insurance policies by anyone who is not a member of the life underwriters' association. Sixteen members of the association spoke five minutes each on this question and many interesting points were brought out. J. F. Oates, general agent of the Northwestern Mutual, closed the discussion by the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

"Be it resolved, That a representative committee of 15 members of this association be appointed by the president:

"First—To devise ways and means by which the will of the association as expressed in the recent replies to the president's circular may be carried out.

"Second—To devise plans for bringing into the membership of this association all of the life insurance men (and women) of Chicago.

"Third—To initiate efforts the purpose of which shall be to limit the payment of commissions on life insurance to life insurance men only."

The committee called for in this resolution was appointed by President Ferguson and is at work on plans at the present time, to be reported at the next meeting of the association, which will be held in June.

The committee also offered resolutions on the death of the late Hervey S. Dale, who was treasurer of our association for the last 20 years and treasurer of the National Association during the past year.

The last meeting of the season will be held at the Auditorium Hotel on the 30th inst., and the principal feature will be a report from this committee.

Cincinnati.

The Cincinnati association at its May meeting elected the following officers for the ensuing year: President, John L. Shuff, Union Central; vice-president, S. P. Ellis, Providence Life and Trust; treasurer, Franklin J. White, Berkshire. Executive committee—J. W. Kirgan, Fidelity Mutual; I. Rauh, Equitable; Visitor Trounstone, Northwestern Mutual; W. N. Dunbar, New England Mutual, and W. G. Oehmig, Mutual Benefit.

National President Ernest J. Clark was a guest of honor and discussed "The Value of the Life Underwriters' Association." "The association," said Mr. Clark, "is not a society of mutual congratulation as some people have been so unkind as to say. It is a hard working organization which is making more gentlemen and greater improvements in life insurance than the work of all other bodies and forces combined. Ten years ago there was a membership of 1,500; last year at Atlantic City this had grown to 3,614, with 86 local associations; in March of 1914 there were 5,120 members and 86 associations; since then at least 350 new members have been added—an increase in the past year of over 40 per cent. If the present ratio is kept up the membership will have been doubled by the time of the annual convention this fall."

Mr. Clark then spoke briefly on the four important problems of the National Association: the education and conservation movement, taxation, legislation and membership extension. He made reference to the text book which is being prepared by the National Association, with Dr. S. S. Huebner, of the University of Pennsylvania, as editor.

Colorado.

Seventy-five members and guests of the Colorado association attended a meeting of that body on May 26 at Denver. Among the guests of honor were President William W. McClench, of the Massachusetts Mutual; P. H. Showalter; Secretary Reich, of the local association; Commissioner Epsteen, of Colorado; Commissioner W. H. Done, of Utah; Commissioner Van Valkenburg, of Idaho; Assistant Attorney General Wendell Stephens; President Thomas F. Daly, of the Capitol Life; and Governor Ammons, who is president of the Farmers' Life. Delegates were appointed to the National convention to be held in Cincinnati in September.

Governor Ammons said in part: "I like the spirit of the organization, and especially in these modern times; I like the spirit of the addresses you have given, of co-operation and of assisting each other, and I wish that it would extend not only to the insurance business, but throughout all other relations of life. I have learned enough in this last winter, if I never realized it before, to be opposed constitutionally to brushwhacking. I am in favor of a different way of accomplishing things; I like to see two fellows go out and have a horse race, for instance, just so long as it is fair, and even the fellow who gets left is always satisfied. There is field enough for all of those engaged, and work enough for all those engaged in the insurance business. There is nothing, as was very well suggested a moment ago, in unfair methods, because those can never be covered up, and the man who practises them will, in the end, just as certainly lose, as he engages in the practise."

Columbus.

The regular monthly meeting of the Columbus association was held at the Athletic Club on May 14. National President Ernest J. Clark was the guest of honor and delivered an interesting address, which was enthusiastically received by the forty-nine members present. Mr. Clark started his insurance career in Columbus with the John Hancock. Plans were completed for the local association to send a large delegation to the Cincinnati convention, about fifteen members having joined the Cincinnati Convention Club.

It is almost assured that the Columbus association will join the National Association in its institutional advertising campaign. President H. H. Steiner appointed a special committee to work out the details of the movement, naming Fritz Lichtenberg as chairman. The invitation of J. C. Campbell, State agent of the John Hancock, to be his guests at an outing in June at his country home, was accepted.

Connecticut.

The May meeting of the Connecticut association was held at Bridgeport and was devoted principally to a discussion of the education and conservation movement. Dwight G. Holbrook, as chairman of the publicity committee, presented a report, which was adopted by the unanimous vote of 25 members present. Mr. Holbrook declared that the plans had met with the approval of two of the large Hartford companies, which companies have practically decided to subscribe their share of expenses on business paid for in 1913.

Delaware.

A regular meeting of the Delaware association was held on May 25 at Hanna's Restaurant in Wilmington. President Price reported that he had been unable to make any final arrangements with Professor Berlin, of the high school, with regard to a course of lectures on life insurance, but that he had advised Frank Sheppard, of the Provident Life and Trust, to prepare an address on "The Fundamentals of Life Insurance" to be delivered at the high school if arrangements should be made. Jeremiah McDonagh, of the Equitable of Washington, made a brief but effective address on "Life Insurance Agency Organization." He said, in part:

"Harmonizing of several minds for one purpose, that which is to secure good honest men to serve the public in such a manner as to explain and enlighten one of the most important, but least thought of problems in life.

"To secure an organization you must first devise some means of securing the necessary material. My practise has been to find out by advertisement without explaining the nature of the business, and having the applicant reply by letter, giving his name, address, age and experience, and then before approaching the applicant, finding out as to his character and habits. This is done to save waste of time in unnecessary interviews at the office.

"In my opinion in the handling of new applicants, a man should be possessed with both character and courage, and not hesitate in explaining to the applicant the contract under which he is employed, nor should he hesitate in demanding from the applicant a fair trial of his ability. The majority of applicants who apply for positions in our business want to know what they can get out of it, instead of what they can put into it, and usually they don't measure up to their specification.

"The failures in our organization are principally caused by ignorance of the applicant. The employer, either for lack of time or selfishness, does not instruct the applicant properly before starting him in the profession, expecting his men to do electric work with a tallow candle. Whereas, if reasonable time was devoted in selecting the applicant, and after selecting, instructing him, thus avoiding changes, and thus proving the old proverb, 'that if a man is not true to himself, it is preposterous to presume that he will be true to anything or anyone."

"Give the square deal, 'live and let live,' efficiency reward plan in place of the old scheme of personal exploitation."

"I assumed in Wilmington in January, 1912, an organization of fourteen men, and at the close of December, 1913, the organization had increased to thirty-two. We also accumulated an organization of policyholders of 11,701."

Detroit.

Two prominent members of the Detroit association have recently passed away—John J. Oliver, secretary of the Michigan State Life, and Jay Bassett, of Bassett & Reese, general agents of the Provident Life & Trust. The following resolution was passed by the association on the death of Mr. Oliver:

On the fourth day of May, nineteen hundred and fourteen, John J. Oliver, secretary of the Michigan State Life Insurance Company and an active member of the Detroit Life Underwriters' Association, departed this life.

The passing of John J. Oliver brought sincere regret to every man engaged in the life insurance business; to his older associates and friends it was a personal sorrow; the Detroit Life Underwriters' Association loses one of its most valuable and most lovable members.

John J. Oliver's genial disposition made him popular among his associates; in business life he gained the esteem of all by his upright character and his stand for fair dealing and honorable methods.

The Detroit Life Underwriters' Association hereby records its appreciation of his services in the cause of life insurance and the building up of this association, and its sense of the serious loss which his death has brought upon the life insurance business in our State and more particularly upon this association in the fulfilment of its mission.

To the members of the family of our deceased brother the members of this association tender their heartfelt sympathy and hope that the esteem in which he was so generally held by his friends and associates may be a consolation to them in their time of sorrow.

Respectfully submitted,

WILL A. WAITE,
H. WILBERT SPENCE,
DONALD CLARK.

Mr. Bassett died at Bay City, Mich., on May 30. He was born on a farm at Novi, Mich., and after graduating from the State Normal, taught for two years, when he took up the study of law. He was admitted to the Bar and practised in Detroit until 1885, when he entered the life insurance business. He became a member of the Detroit association early in its history and has always been prominently identified with its work. The following resolution was adopted by the association:

In the death of Jay Bassett, general agent of the Provident Life & Trust, life insurance has lost a true advocate, and the Detroit Life Underwriters' Association an efficient and valued member.

Mr. Bassett was rigidly honest and straightforward in all of his dealings and detested misrepresentations of all kinds. These characteristics he carried into his life insurance work, and they won for him the respect and confidence of all competitors. Of a genial and lovable nature, he made many friends and his death comes as a personal loss to his associates in the field who also feel that the life insurance business has lost a most valuable exponent.

As an active member of the association almost from its beginning and at various times an officer, he contributed much to its success. The association hereby puts on record its appreciation of Mr. Bassett's contributions to its success, and of his unceasing loyalty to its interests. It owes him a debt of gratitude which, while it cannot be repaid, is gratefully acknowledged in this manner.

The association tenders to Mrs. Bassett and other relatives its heartfelt sympathy in this their hour of grief, in the hope that this expression of esteem and appreciation may in some measure assuage the poignancy of their sorrow.

CHARLES S. WHITE,
GEORGE L. BAHL,
WILLIAM H. BURR, Committee.

Erie.

Eighteen members of the Erie association on the evening of June 2 heard National Vice-President Edward A. Woods deliver an address upon life insurance taxation. Mr. Woods' address was the principal event of the meeting, which was held at the Lawrence Hotel. V. W. Doolittle presided over the business session and William H. Riley introduced the speakers at the banquet, the guests of honor being Mr. Woods, Judge Walling and Judge Benson. Mr. Woods recited the startling array of facts with regard to the taxation of life insurance funds and exhorted the members present to use their influence in urging their legislative representatives to assist in enacting laws which would remove the tax.

Florida.

With D. B. McKay, Mayor of Tampa, as guest of honor, the Florida association gathered at noon on May 30 at Manuel Garcia's restaurant and held its quarterly banquet and business session. Mayor McKay spoke in commendation of the theory of life insurance and of the duty of heads of families to protect their loved ones. He regarded life insurance as the surest and safest means of creating an estate. The Mayor expressed the opinion that the great insurance corporations of the country had come to recognize the advantage of State and national supervision of the safeguarding of widows' and orphans' funds which they controlled. Following the banquet there was a business session and a number of new members were admitted.

Georgia.

Hugh M. Willet, chairman of the National Executive Committee and a prominent member of the Georgia association, at a meeting of the latter body held on June 2 at the Hotel Ansley in Georgia, told of the modified plans of the education and conservation committee. Twenty-six members were present, which makes the largest attendance for quite some time. It was decided to hold a State conference of life underwriters early in September. It was originally planned to hold this meeting in July; but, owing to the fact that many of the general agents desired to institute a contest between their agents, giving as a prize a free trip to Atlanta to the State convention, and also because many of the agents are on their vacations during July, the change in the time was thought necessary.

Northern Indiana.

Delegates and alternates to the Cincinnati convention were elected at a meeting of the Northern Indiana association held on the 9th inst. at the Commercial Club in Fort Wayne. The usual dinner was served in connection with the meeting. W. P. Hart delivered a short address on "The Use of Dividends as Applied to Policies."

Iowa.

Fifty members of the Iowa association held a business and social meeting on the 6th inst. at the Hotel Calfax in Des Moines. James C. Clapp spoke of the work being done for education and conservation. Clinton R. Dorn, an attorney, made the principal speech of the evening, his subject being "Better Service of To-day of the Life Insurance Salesman." Will D. Bowles advocated the elimination of the part-time man. President George W. Hughes was authorized to appoint delegates and alternates to the Cincinnati convention.

Kansas City.

H. G. Everett, secretary of the Central Life of Iowa, was the principal speaker at the May meeting of the Kansas City association. There was a discussion as to the proposed campaign of institutional advertising, and it was resolved to take action on the matter at the June meeting of the association.

Knoxville.

The May meeting of the Knoxville association was held on May 30 at noon in the Hall of the Board of Commerce, with the institutional advertising campaign as the general theme for discussion. H. A. Rouser, business manager of the Knoxville Sentinel, and T. S. McKinney, national executive committeeman, spoke on the non-partisan advertising propaganda.

A committee was appointed to boost the Cincinnati Convention Club. Another committee was appointed to interview business men for articles on life insurance, and a third committee was appointed to arrange a program for the monthly meeting, to be held on June 27, at which time the general subject will be education and conservation. The topics to be discussed at this meeting are as follows:

1. Education and conservation. Institutional advertising incumbent upon agents and organization essential to success.
2. The association as a potential factor in the minds of the insuring public, and membership therein a badge of honor.
3. Duties and difficulties of the life insurance examiner. His relation to the client and the company.
4. Life insurance and religion.
 - (a) The salesman.
 - (b) The prospect.

Lansing.

The principal feature of the May meeting of the Lansing association was an address by Hon. H. R. Pattengill on "Life Insurance a Factor in Social Progress." Dr. C. E. Weightman, actuary of Detroit Life, discussed the matter of "heavy-weights" as poor risks. A resolution was passed in connection with the Mexican situation commending the work of the administration in endeavoring to adjust matters.

Lima.

The Lima association held a special meeting on the evening of the 1st inst. at the Lima Club. Charles Weinfeld, of the Northwestern Mutual at Wausau, Wis., was the principal speaker. Mr. Weinfeld delivered a stirring and inspiring address. Short talks were made by a number of members and a vote of thanks was extended to Mr. Weinfeld.

Los Angeles.

One hundred members and guests of the Los Angeles association participated in the annual spring picnic of that association on May 16. The festivities were held at Verdugo Park, where there were foot races, baseball games, impromptu speeches and everything else which goes to make up a successful outing.

Luncheon was followed with a speech by Frank E. McMullen, general agent of the Massachusetts Mutual and a former president of the National Association. The speaker dwelt particularly upon the institutional advertising campaign and urged the members of the Los Angeles association to become identified with the propaganda. He called the attention of his audience to the fact that in California there were 90,000 orphans under 14 years of age whose mothers are widows. At the close of Mr. McMullen's remarks 20 new members were admitted.

Louisville.

There was an unusually large attendance at the May meeting of the Louisville association, which was held at the Seelbach Hotel. Jesse R. Clark, president of the Union Central, was the principal speaker, and another prominent speaker was James V. Barry, assistant secretary of the Metropolitan, who delighted the members present with some of his inimitable stories. While not down on the program as a speaker, C. B. Taylor, general agent of the Northwestern at Wheeling, W. Va., interested the members with brief references to conditions in the field. W. W. Dennis, general agent of the Mutual Benefit, presided as toastmaster.

Mr. Clark dwelt particularly upon policy loans. "Policy loans," said he, "from the standpoint of safe investment for the life insurance company issuing the policy, cannot be excelled. Is it possible that the company has accumulated this superb asset at the disadvantage of any of its members? As a conservator of insurance, paying current premiums when other resources of the policyholder have failed, it is a good thing for the insured, the agent and the company.

"One other point. The rapid increase in the rate at which reserve is being withdrawn justifies the thought that the duration of life policies may be shortened. Companies may realize that they are no longer selling life but only three-year term contracts. As soon as this is finally demonstrated companies will cease to pay high commissions to the soliciting agent and large dividends to policyholders. In conclusion, it seems to me that the policy loan for any purpose other than the payment of premium is a menace to the business and ought to be discouraged."

Central Massachusetts.

The May meeting of the Central Massachusetts association was held at Worcester. The matter of the proposed campaign of institutional advertising was referred to the committee on education and publicity, consisting of E. A. Robertson, Henry A. Macgowan and Otis D. Arnold. It was resolved to have an outing in July, and arrangements for it were left to the executive committee.

Western Massachusetts.

"A Trade or a Profession" was the subject of an excellent address delivered by Franklin W. Ganse, manager of the home office agency of the Columbian National at Boston, before the Western Massachusetts association at its May meeting. Regular routine business was transacted.

Memphis.

Memphis association has sent resolutions of sympathy to Mrs. Charles G. Carothers, whose husband was a prominent member of that association and who recently passed away as the result of falling from the window of his office.

Minneapolis.

The regular meeting of the Minneapolis association was held May 23 at the West Hotel. The topic for discussion was "What Restrictions With Regard to the Employment of Part Time Men Should Be Favored by This Association." The following members spoke: Lorin Hord, Orrin L. Edwards, J. W. Oliver, R. G. Butts, F. C. Butts, Ralph Burges, J. E. Meyers, G. J. Carlson and State Insurance Commissioner J. A. O. Preus. Mr. Preus said that the life insurance company is a trustee of the people's funds, and the life insurance agent is a servant of the public, working for the State. In his opinion, the State has a right to say whether or not the agent is capable of serving it. He also said that he was not concerned with what would be best for the agent but was interested in the agent only in so far as the service the agent rendered to the policyholder was concerned. He suggested that everyone who proposed to sell insurance should first be examined by the State to see if they were properly qualified before being given a license. This, in his opinion, would give the full time agents the protection which they much desire.

New England Women's

Mrs. Florence E. Shaal, president of the New England Women's Association, at the regular June meeting of the body referred to the necessity of the prompt remittance of annual dues, and called attention to the fact that every member in good standing was entitled to a subscription to LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS. Mrs. Shaal urged the necessity of increasing the membership, especially at the present time, when many women are taking up field work. The speaker also said, in substance, that every woman taking up insurance work owed a debt of gratitude to the New England Women's Association for its pioneer work and unselfishness in association activities for the past 16 years. Every member of the association was urged to attend the annual convention at Cincinnati in September.

New York.

An interesting innovation in regular meetings was the May gathering of the New York association, which was a "Solicitor's Meeting." The meeting was held on the evening of May 26 at the Hotel Astor, the speakers being Robert R. Reid, general agent of the Northwestern Mutual, and Alexander Saunders, general agent of the same company. Perez F. Huff, assistant manager of the Union Central, was scheduled to deliver an address on "A Practical Way to Sell and Buy Life Insurance," but Mr. Huff found that the condition of his health necessitated a trip to Europe and was compelled to sail that morning on the Vaterland.

Mr. Reid discussed "Commercial Life Insurance." In his preliminary remarks he said that he believed that the life insurance business was still in its infancy. He traced the development of the subject of commercial life insurance from the early days of history up to the present time. His one fundamental law for commercial life insurance was to find the asset which was in jeopardy and then to suggest the necessary remedy. He illustrated the various points he made by concrete instances, and told of one case involving corporation insurance where the man interviewed had a 40 per cent. interest in a close corporation. The president had built up the business to a $2,000,000 capital, but realizing that when he died other interests might control the business, he took out corporation insurance so that his estate might have the privilege of either buying or selling.

Alexander Saunders had as the subject of his remarks, "The Ledger Statement for Business Insurance and How to Suggest It." Mr. Saunders went back to his first case and said in part:

"I selected for my first interview a little retail grocer in Atlanta, Ga. I quoted a premium of $36, and, of course, he could not see why he should pay out this enormous sum as he only owned a very small store. During my argument a little negro girl came in and had two dimes' worth of something. The proprietor, no doubt, having been made somewhat nervous by my description of the terrors of widowhood, dropped one of the dimes behind the counter on the way to the cash register. He picked up the dime in due course and deposited it in its proper resting place. This little incident, however, gave me my cue, and I told him, 'I admit $36 is a very large sum of money, but supposing that every day of your business year you dropped a dime and it disappeared for good into one of the cracks of your rather poor floor. These dimes are sufficient to pay your premium for $1,000. Do you think that the amount of this enormous wealth would put you into bankruptcy?' He did not think it would and I got his signature on the celebrated dotted line.

"Now, my general idea in soliciting is to try and bring your business down to the plane of your prospective's business. Talk to him of his own interests or something in connection with it. When it comes to premium for the business insurance that you propose, give him an idea how to pay this in about the following manner:

"I ask him to put on a piece of paper the last year's gross amount of sales and then figure out the percentage to it of the premium just quoted. Let me illustrate from an actual happening: The gross sales amount to about $750,000 per annum and the premium of the proposed insurance to about $3,000. That means that it requires $3 of premium for every $750 worth of merchandise sold, which is equal to four-tenths of 1 per cent. Point out to him that all he has to do in order to entirely recover the outlay of his premium is to inject into his selling price four-tenths of 1 per cent. Articles that sell for $100 would have to be sold for $100.40, and if he is a manufacturer, I should think it would be easy to convince him that his manufactured goods could stand this little extra pressure.

"We are having this meeting at the Hotel Astor, and, no doubt, you all have heard of the Hotel Astor Coffee, same as sold to the consumer generally in one-pound cans, and let me illustrate on this particular article: The purveyor of this aforesaid article when he makes up his selling price has on his ledger cost of the green coffee, an account for the roasting expense, at the same time taking into consideration the shrinkage, the cost of screening the coffee, and again the loss in weight, the cost of the tins, the labels, the labor of putting the coffee into the tins, the packing of the tins in wooden boxes, and, finally, the cost of selling this completed product, the cost of management of his entire business, the cost of sundry expenses, such as fire insurance, liability insurance, loss on credits. We will call the green article A and the different additions to it to arrive at the selling cost, B, C, D, etc. Now, ask your merchant to add to these different items of B, C and D, etc., an item for this proposed business insurance. Tell him it will approximate about 4/10 per cent, as a gross expenditure, for which his customers pay just the same as they pay for B, C, D, etc. There is, however, this difference, that your business policy has an ever growing cash value and will, therefore, some day not be only an imaginary but a very substantial surplus which may be drawn upon at a moment's notice.

"If a partnership lasts for, say, 15 years, you can almost guarantee your client that by that time all his possible disbursements for premiums in the past 15 years are available by way of the then offered cash value."

Lawrence Priddy spoke of some difficult cases which had come under his personal observation. President Myrick announced that Mr. Reid and Mr. Saunders would be glad to answer any questions, and several of the members took advantage of the opportunity presented. Before adjourning Mr. Myrick gave a bit of his personal experience with regard to blood pressure tests, showing how the smoking of a heavy cigar or the eating of a meal would increase pressure.

The June meeting of the association will be an outing to be held at the Crescent Athletic Club, Bay Ridge, on the afternoon of June 30. Boats will leave Battery Pier at 3.30, 4.30 and 5.30. There will be a baseball game between the uniformed clubs of the home offices of the Equitable and Mutual.

Oregon.

Seldom has there been a more enthusiastic meeting of the Oregon association than the one held on May 18, with fifty members present. Charles F. Swigert, president of the Pacific Bridge Company, delivered a stirring address, which was received with prolonged applause. President Herrin referred to the efforts of Secretary Gray to make the meetings of the association of interest, and that Mr. Gray's efforts were appreciated was evidenced by the volley of cheers given at the suggestion of Harry Richey. S. P. Lockwood, vice-president and general manager of the Columbia Life & Trust Company, discussed "Agency Organization." Dr. A. J. Giesy, medical director of the Oregon Life, spoke on "The Relation of the Agent to the Medical Examiner." T. W. Blackburn, secretary of the American Life Convention, was a guest of honor and delivered a few brief remarks. The June meeting will be devoted to the education and conservation movement.

Philadelphia.

The May meeting of the Philadelphia association was held at the Adelphia Hotel. While the attendance was not as large as usual, there was no diminution of association spirit and enthusiasm. A business meeting preceded the dinner, at which there was an informal discussion on the action of the dinner committee increasing the cost of guest tickets from $1 to $2.50. A resolution was also presented providing for a change in the election of members of the executive committee. It is necessary under the present constitution to elect all executive committeemen for a term of one year. Under the plan proposed executive committee members are to be divided into groups and elected for the terms of one, two and three years. This matter was referred to the executive committee. Several new members were admitted. The song hit of the evening was made by W. C. Bradley, of the Northwestern Mutual.

The program was as follows:

"The Good the Association Is Doing the Individual," discussed by E. P. Langley, F. D. Buser and C. M. Hunsicker; "Honest Rivalry Versus Unfair Competition," by W. A. Smalley and J. W. Clegg; "The Solicitor Moulds Public Opinion of Insurance Companies," by T. I. Fansler, G. F. Schilling and W. W. Long.

Puget Sound.

Over 100 members and guests attended the regular May meeting of the Puget Sound association, which was the first under the administration of the newly elected president, W. D. Mead. The institutional advertising was the principal subject of discussion. Malcolm Hughes, manager of the Travelers, told of his trip to the fiftieth anniversary agency convention of his company at Hartford. "Conservation of Trust Funds in Relation to Insurance" was the subject of an address by Ernest C. Everett. A. W. Phillips spoke on "The Relation of Banking to Insurance." DeWitt Clark, State manager of the National Life, spoke briefly on several topics of interest to his audience.

Pittsburgh.

National President Ernest J. Clark was the guest of honor of the Pittsburgh association at its regular May meeting, which was held at the Hotel Schenley on May 12. At the business meeting of the association, preceding the dinner, an amendment to Section IV., Article IV., of the constitution was voted upon favorably. The new section, which refers to non-resident membership, is as follows:

"Non-resident membership shall include those not living within the radius of thirty-five miles of Pittsburgh. They shall have the same rights and privileges as active members except when a company vote is called for, though anyone desiring to qualify as an active member or an associate member may do so by the payment of the proper fee."

Article V., Section III., was also amended to fix the annual dues of non-resident members at $1.50. Several new members were admitted. Charles W. Scovel made a brief talk on the Cincinnati convention, urging everyone to make plans to attend the gathering. W. S. Stimmel then introduced Mr. Clark, who spoke on "The Field and the Agent," sub-dividing the subject in "Possibilities of the Field," "Increasing Responsibility of the Agent," and "Demand for College Men." His talk was the regular lecture which he delivered at the University of Pittsburgh, and which was published in the May number of the News. At the conclusion of Mr. Clark's address, Professor Flocken, of the university, made a short talk, thanking the association for all that had been done in promoting the interests of the insurance course at the university.

A feature of the meeting was the election of C. A. Foehl, formerly president of the local association and now Philadelphia manager for the Prudential, to honorary membership.

A luncheon was tendered at noon to President Clark by the general agents who are members of the association. William M. Furey presided and addresses were made by Charles W. Scovel, Edward A. Woods and Mr. Clark. Mr. Scovel dwelt upon the great value of the campaign of institutional advertising and the results that would accrue from inculcating in the minds of the American people more ideas of thrift.

Mr. Woods claimed that it was only through the members of the Life Underwriters' Association that life insurance could talk to the public. He made reference to the enormous losses resulting from lapses, to the evils of borrowing and to the great burden of unjust taxation.

Mr. Clark spoke upon the work of the National Association in relation to education and publicity.

Rhode Island.

John I. D. Bristol, New York manager of the Northwestern Mutual, and Edgar C. Fowler, superintendent of agents for the State Mutual Life, were the guests of honor at the May meeting of the Rhode Island association. Following the dinner, Mr. Bristol and Mr. Fowler addressed the association, after which there was a general discussion on the subject of "Part-Time and Brokerage Business." It was decided to hold an athletic field meet in June.

In the course of his remarks Mr. Bristol said, in part:

"Why do we have trouble in getting new agents and in making men stick? Because life insurance men do not get life insurance commissions. The business of life insurance will never be at its best until life insurance commissions are paid to life insurance men only. The promising new agent is rare. He must have a moral nature with a strong love of truth; he must have energy, executive qualities and a great capacity to absorb knowledge.

"Life insurance is a business and not a profession. Many men possessing these qualities are discouraged and cease the business because it tolerates and even goes so far as to encourage the evil practices of part-timeism and brokerage business. One good new agent is worth more than all the helpers in the United States. The present practise of writing insurance tends to sift out the honest and retain the undesirable class of solicitors. We must combat the system of appointing agents for a day. As long as we have part-time men and helpers there will be rebating, because the way is opened by which the transaction may be covered. Many men would not think of rebating if there were no competition with part-time and helperism. The system is vicious; in fact, it enables an inefficient life insurance man to make a good, though absolutely fictitious, record in producing new business. My agency will accept applications from men who are giving their whole time to the Northwestern only and are licensed agents of the company. Last year one of them averaged eight calls a day and earned a little over $5 per call. The part-time man and the broker make no calls. What he gets in commissions really comes out of the bona-fide agent who calls.

"All real agents are striving to become experts in life insurance, but what is the use of experts if part-time men get the business? Policies are kept in force by the regular agents. They are generally paid renewals primarily to keep the policy in force. One other than the regular agent has no particular interest in keeping the policy in force—in fact, does not know how.

"The general agent of to-day should have capital, so as to be able to develop men in the small town and country as well as in the city. There is enough business in the small town and country to keep a whole-time man busy, if he is properly trained and assisted by the general agent. Agency protection has always built up the business and made it profitable for the regular agents as well as the general agent. Part-time brokerage business always means a one-man agency, because the whole-time agent cannot make a living under the system.

"New York, Michigan, Illinois, Maryland and Connecticut have enacted a law voiding any contract taken with a rebate. This is a real step toward protection, but we do not want, or need, governmental control of life insurance in this country. All general agents should stand together and make public the fact that no business will be accepted from part-time men. The sales in every line of business except life insurance are protected. We should clothe the life insurance man with a mantle of protection at least as secure as that borne by the agent for a certain brand of whiskey."

Mr. Fowler discussed a number of subjects, but dwelt particularly on the institutional advertising campaign. He claimed there are legitimate part-time agents, and stated that in his opinion any movement to escape the income tax would increase the possibilities of the movement for government control of insurance. "Institutional advertising," said Mr. Fowler, "should be paid for by the underwriters' associations, by the agents themselves, and not by the companies. If the advertising is going to do any good it will greatly benefit the agent in increasing his sales. The companies are doing all they can to lower the cost of insurance to their policyholders and we should not load them with an additional expense.

"I thoroughly agree with Mr. Bristol's arguments as applied to the helper and the broker, but there is a legitimate part-time man. Mr. Bristol's idea may mean success with one man and utter failure in the hands of another. The general agent of moderate means necessarily is handicapped in securing agents. Many of our most successful managers and agents began their careers as part-time men, and there is no reason why the same result should not be obtained over and over again. Take, for example, the bank clerk soliciting insurance during the late afternoon and evening; gradually he becomes proficient and after a time is willing to devote his whole time to writing life insurance, and the business as a whole gains direct."

THE IDEAL OFFICE ASSISTANT

An employer hires a bookkeeper, stenographer or clerk to relieve him of—not to add to his cares.

He asks the same thing of his writing machine.

He wants it to "stand up," to do its work, to be reliable, quick to respond, ready for emergency or long continued work.

These qualities make the L. C. Smith & Bros. typewriter prominent in the typewriter world.

The ball bearings at all frictional points place it in a class by itself from a mechanical standpoint.

Viewed from the HUMAN angle, the operators of this typewriter do more work and are less tired at the close of the day. If you look into the matter closely, you can't reach any other conclusion. Send for free book.

"Do not dodge the income tax. A great mass of people, I believe, do not know how much many life insurance men make. If they find out that you are evading this tax, which is a fair and just one, it will surely tend toward governmental control of insurance. The life insurance man must always stand in the community as a model of honesty and truthfulness."

"Get every man with a rate-book into the underwriters' association; it is bound to make a better man of him, and—even go so far as to pay his dues, if he cannot. The association stands for high ideals and every man with a rate-book should give it his hearty support."

Richmond.

At a meeting of the Richmond association, held on the 1st inst., plans were discussed for holding a State conference of life underwriters at Richmond in September. It seemed to be the consensus of opinion that a gathering of this character would impress upon the members of the various State associations the desirability of attending the annual convention in Cincinnati. A committee consisting of A. O. Swink, chairman; Neil D. Sills and W. D. Allen, was named to confer with committees from other associations in the State, relative to the project. As to whether or not the Richmond association is to make an effort to secure the 1916 convention of the National Association was left to the executive committee. T. A. Cary, representing the Richmond association on the National Executive Committee, reported upon the plans of the Committee on Education and Conservation as outlined at the mid-year meeting of the Executive Committee.

Rochester.

A movement for the continuance of the health classes for women, which were undertaken last winter by the Rochester Board of Education, at the suggestion of the Women's Educational and Industrial Union, was endorsed in resolutions that were sent to the Mayor and the Board of Education by the Rochester Life Underwriters' Association. This action was taken at the May meeting of that body.

A. V. Smith, chairman of the Committee on Advertising, delivered a report and urged the association to heartily support the institutional advertising campaign of the National Association. Herbert R. Lewis, a member of the National Executive Committee, fully explained the plans for raising the proposed fund.

Miss M. E. Bingeman, a representative of the Women's Educational and Industrial Union, urged the support of the association in popularizing the health education for adults movement, which is being carried on in Rochester.

St. Louis.

Money talks—and the St. Louis Life Underwriters' Association are certainly showing themselves capable of saying a good deal on the question of education and conservation by proposing not only to agree to the proposition of the National Association of Life Underwriters that they subscribe five cents per $1,000 of paid-for business, but that they raise this fund to one based on 25 cents per $1,000 of paid-for business.

Six thousand five hundred dollars is the sum that competent advertising authorities thought necessary to properly cover the St. Louis territory for year's campaign, and did St. Louis balk—did they say "It can't be done"? They did not. Down in Missouri the new spirit is "We'll show you" instead of "Show me." And so one of the members of the committee on education and conservation, William King, a great believer personally in publicity to "sell the goods," went to work and pledged five of the leading agencies in one day's canvass to subscribe over $2,300 of the necessary $6,500.

This was reported at the meeting of the association, and that night five more agencies came in, or at least promised to come in. Then the committee on education and conservation got together and put in a day's campaign which resulted in several more agencies coming into line.

To date, there has practically been but one agency which does not contemplate being in this movement, and out of the members already seen, which comprise about one-third of the total agencies represented in the association, 14 agencies have subscribed about $4,200 of the $6,500 proposed; so it can well be seen that this campaign is a certainty and St. Louis will certainly be right on the map where everybody will see it, from an insurance standpoint. There is another big thing which is going on down in Missouri, too, and that is the fact that even though the general agencies are responding nobly to this co-operative movement, the special agents want to be in on the good work, too, and so arrangements are being made which will not interfere with the big idea

At the last meeting of the St. Louis Association President DeBoer of the National Life of Vermont was the principal speaker, and dealt particularly with the improvements in life insurance contracts and the history of life insurance.

It is significant at this time to call attention to the fact that the St. Louis association is now near the 200 mark in membership and under the aggressive leadership of F. B. Patton is doing noble work.

The education and conservation committee consists of W. H. Bloomer, William King, W. H. Herrick, R. L. Morton and John R. Baird, and from the fact that the St. Louis association has from one to three columns of live insurance matter in the reading columns of the St. Louis Republic and Globe-Democrat every Sunday it can well be assumed that this committee is showing what can be done in the education and conservation field by being on the job.

"The greatest thing in the world!" will, under the leadership of such associations as are at St. Louis, be a household word in the near future, beyond a doubt.

San Francisco.

The regular May meeting of the San Francisco association was held at the Hotel Stewart with more than thirty members and guests in attendance. President W. H. Matson was confined to his home by illness and W. L. Hathaway, manager of the Mutual Life, presided during the session. Four new members were admitted. It was decided to postpone until the next meeting the amendment to the by-laws reducing the membership dues from $12 to $6 per year. It is proposed to offset the reduction of dues by the members paying for their dinners individually when attending the meetings, instead of defraying the expenses from the association's treasury.

F. W. Kellogg, of the San Francisco Call and Post, in a brief address, told his audience of the life insurance publicity campaign which his paper is now conducting. This plan was unanimously endorsed in a resolution adopted at the meeting. There was also a discussion on a proposed insurance club to entertain insurance visitors during 1915.

Syracuse.

At the regular May meeting of the Syracuse association Henry Phillips, member of the national executive committee, gave a report of the mid-year meeting of that committee. Following Mr. Phillips' report there was a general discussion on the institutional advertising campaign. Enthusiastic interest was shown in the proposition, and after the plan was thoroughly understood the association went on record as approving it, and immediately placed the entire matter in the hands of the regular committee on education and publicity, of which K. A. Luther is chairman. The following new members were admitted: B. G. Britcher, Prudential; T. J. Scannell, John Hancock; C. E. De Long, Mutual Benefit; B. H. Elwood, Germania.

The dues of the associate members were reduced from $3 to $2 and the date of the annual meeting of the association was changed to January instead of November.

Tacoma.

The monthly meeting of the Tacoma association was held Monday evening, May 25, at the Commercial Club rooms. Several months ago the association instituted the plan of having the different companies' representatives arrange the programs. This meeting was held under the auspices of the Northwestern Mutual, and Wm. Peterson, president of the association, presided.

In point of attendance and enthusiasm this was one of the most successful meetings ever held by the Tacoma association. A number of very able speakers were on the program and gave brilliant and entertaining addresses. W. D. Mead, president of the Puget Sound association, made a short talk, and explained the work the Seattle association is doing along the lines of newspaper publicity.

C. L. Palmer, of Seattle, an old experienced insurance man and journalist, gave an interesting talk on the ethics of the insurance profession, and he was followed by Mr. Burt, of Seattle, who told of the fine work the association was doing in Seattle. He pointed out in a convincing way that the methods of soliciting had been greatly improved; that there was harmony and good fellowship prevailing among the agents, and that the general public had a much higher regard for the insurance men since the organization of the Puget Sound association.

Thos. A. Garrigues, general agent for the Northwestern Mutual, gave a very interesting and highly instructive address. His plea was for upholding the dignity of the insurance profession and for presenting the proposition in a terse, lucid and business-like way to the prospect. He cautioned the younger men against talking "over the heads" of the prospects, and using terms that would not be understood readily. He interposed his remarks by personal reminiscences, and possessing a remarkable memory, he was able to illustrate his points by giving experiences of his own when starting in the insurance business.

K. N. Aldredge, of the Reliance Life, was elected to membership in the association.

Texas.

At the regular annual meeting of the Texas association, held at Dallas on May 30, the old officers were re-elected to serve for another year. However, A. C. Bigger, secretary and treasurer, was compelled to ask the association to relieve him from serving in that capacity for another year. Mr. Bigger's resignation was accepted with regret, as he has been one of the most aggressive spirits of the association movement in Texas. Henry Camp Harris, northern Texas manager of the Reliance Life, was elected to succeed him. The secretary's report showed an active and associate membership of 203, with six additional members elected at the meeting, and a number of applications were in the hands of the membership committee.

The association has started off its second year's work under most favorable conditions. President Orville Thorp, in reviewing the work accomplished during the past year, stated, in part:

"Our association has done some great work during the past year, and no doubt its work for the coming year will be marked by even greater progress than in the past. It was started under most adverse conditions. Irregularities of many forms were being practised all over the State most freely. The rebater, the twister, the embezzler and the all-around crook were operating more or less through nearly every life insurance agency in Texas. The laws of our State relative to rebating, misrepresenting or twisting business, or embezzling company's funds, when enforced, are most complete. Unfortunately for the life insurance fraternity, in the minds of most people these laws were more or less dead letters. The fact that the laws had not been stringently enforced led agents to disregard them. Almost immediately after our association was organized the officers and executive committee set about to correct, if possible, these destructive evils, knowing that by so doing they would render a great service to the life insurance fraternity and a greater service to the insuring public. It was, therefore, proposed to raise a fund by assessing the various general agents and companies that were members of the association and use this fund to assist, especially, the county attorneys throughout Texas in vigorously prosecuting those who violate the life insurance laws of our State.

"We have 18 home companies and 20 foreign companies which are now identified with the association. Out of the 38 companies that are represented in the association 24 contributed to the fund. Five cases of embezzlement have been run down and the agents indicted. One of them has been tried and sentenced and is behind the bars. The others are in jail or out on bond pending their trials. Three or four different cases of rebating have been unearthed and the agents indicted. Other cases are still being considered. The insurance press has given a great deal of publicity to the work of our association, and most favorable comments have been made on the aggressive and determined policy which our association adopted in its efforts to clear away the driftwood and eliminate from the insurance fraternity those disturbing and demoralizing factors with which we have all had to contend.

"As a result of the vigorous campaign which our association has waged, in its efforts to control and exterminate the evils above referred to, the life insurance fraternity of Texas has been greatly benefited. Agents now understand that it is against the law to rebate premiums, and that it is against the law to solicit insurance without license. Agents now have a most wholesome respect for the insurance laws of Texas, and anyone who contemplates violating any phase of the law would better get a through ticket to another State before he commits the act.

"The campaign which our association has been compelled to wage during its first year's work has been most unpleasant, however, it seemed that this work had to be done in order to lay the foundation for a greater work for our association in the future. The association has a great work to perform, and in the fulfilling of its mission, it benefits the agents in the field, the general agents, the companies, and last but not least, the insuring public."

Topeka.

The regular meeting of the Topeka association was held on May 18. Resolutions of condolence were adopted on the death of the late E. W. Thompson, who until his death, was a prominent member of the association.

West Virginia.

The regular May meeting of the West Virginia association was held at Wheeling, on the 16th of that month. Paul M. Smith, representing the Northwestern, at Parkersburg, and Herbert L. Smith, representing the same company at the same place, were admitted to membership. The meeting was given over entirely to a discussion of the institutional advertising campaign, but action was deferred until the meeting to be held this month. A special committee will make report upon a definite program, with regard to local as well as to the national campaign.

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION TO BE OBSERVED SEPTEMBER 15, 16 AND 17 AT CINCINNATI.

POSSIBLE FOR A LARGER NUMBER OF DELEGATES TO ATTEND A CONVENTION IN THAT CITY IN LESS TIME AND AT LESS AVERAGE EXPENSE THAN ANY OTHER CITY IN THE UNITED STATES.

Favorable Location and Two Big Problems—Taxation and the Education and Conservation Propaganda Assure Large Attendance—Plans for Social Features and Outline of Salient Features of Program.

The Convention Committee of the Cincinnati association is beginning to realize that the Twenty-fifth Annual Convention, which will be held in that city under the auspices of the local association on September 15, 16 and 17, will be a bigger proposition than they at first anticipated. Regardless of the fact that it is the twenty-fifth anniversary of the National Association, Cincinnati is most favorably located. In fact, it is possible for a larger number of convention delegates to attend a meeting in Cincinnati at less time and less average expense than any other city in the United States. Cincinnati is located about 100 miles from the center of population and within a night's ride of all the principal cities in the Central States, as well as many Southern and Eastern cities. Within twenty hours, all the Atlantic seaboard and Western prairies can be reached. Within twenty-four hours live 65,000,000 people and Cincinnati is the terminal point of 200,000 miles of first-class railroads.

Two Big Problems.

The attendance at the national conventions has been steadily increasing from year to year and it is more than probable that the Cincinnati gathering will eclipse the attendance at Atlantic City, which convention, in this particular, surpassed all previous records. It is not due entirely to Cincinnati's favorable location; the two big problems before the National Association, Taxation and the Education and the Conservation Campaign of Institutional Advertising are in themselves sufficient to guarantee a representative body of underwriters from all parts of the country.

The executive committee will hold a meeting on the afternoon of September 14 at the Hotel Gibson, which hotel will be the official headquarters of that committee. Arrangements have also been completed whereby all the regular sessions of the committee will be held in the convention hall of the Gibson. The two principal hotels are the Hotel Gibson and the Hotel Sinton and the rates are the same at both hotels—room with bath or shower, one to a room, $2.50 per day and upwards, two to a room, twin beds, $2 each per day and upwards. The Sinton Hotel is located within 100 feet of the Hotel Gibson. The Hotel Metropole is located one block from the Hotel Gibson and rooms can be had for $1 per day upwards. There are other hotels located in the vicinity at the same rate.

Delegates and alternates should see to it that the secretaries or proper officers of their respective associations supply them with credentials. Blanks for this purpose have been furnished the secretary of all local associations. Delegates and alternates, upon arriving at Cincinnati, should present these credentials at the registration booth, which will be found on the mezzanine floor of the Hotel Gibson.

As in previous years, it is the desire of the officers of the National Association and the officers of the Cincinnati association that no private luncheons or entertainments be planned or attended by association men which will, in any way, interfere with the sessions of the convention. It is particularly desired that there shall be no company meetings during the convention sessions, as Friday, September 18, has been reserved for such meetings.

The topic for the prize essay contest is "Women's Interest and Influence in Life Insurance." The rules for the contest may be obtained from secretaries of local associations or they may be found in the June number of LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS.

The Entertainment Committee of the Cincinnati association has made ample provision for social features. On the afternoon of September 15 there will be a luncheon to all visiting ladies, either at the Zoological Garden or Country Club. In the evening of that day there will be a reception and dance either at the Hotel Gibson or the Hotel Sinton. Immediately following the afternoon session on the 16th, there will be a boat ride on the Ohio River and supper will be served on board. The annual banquet will be held at the Hotel Gibson in the evening of the 17th, and every delegate and alternate and every visiting guest should plan to attend this closing feature. As usual, the ladies will be admitted and made welcome.

An Ideal Convention City.

With the warm hospitality of the South, to which it is a natural gateway, combining all the facilities of a modern municipality with the charm of an old world city, picturesque, progressive and interesting always—Cincinnati approaches the ideal as a convention city. Indeed, in the past few years it has steadily increased in importance as a convention center. Within one year 100,000 convention visitors have passed through Cincinnati's gates, and it is the proud boast of the city that all of these went away happy and pleased with the treatment they received.

With its own railroad, the Cincinnati Southern, operated by the Queen and Crescent in connection with the Southern Railroad, the Louisville & Nashville and the Illinois Central, Cincinnati is connected with nearly every town and city in the South. To the east there are six trunk lines—Big Four Division of the New York Central, connecting New York and Boston, the Erie and Pennsylvania from New York, Baltimore & Ohio from New York and Baltimore, Chesapeake & Ohio from New York and Newport News, and the Norfolk & Western from Norfolk, Va. From the west come the trunk lines of the Big Four and Baltimore & Ohio, with connections with other lines. Cincinnati is connected with Chicago and the Northwest by the Big Four, Pennsylvania, Chesapeake & Ohio, and C., H. & D. roads. Other lines reach Cleveland, Detroit, Toledo and other points in the region of the Great Lakes.

The annual convention of the National Association has grown to be the most important event of the life insurance world. At the foundation of all its proceedings is the twentieth century idea of service. Service implies knowledge, efficiency, inspiration, enthusiasm and power. The program is purposeful and dynamic and has been arranged with the special intention of developing these qualities. To attend the annual convention is the best means to be abreast with the present day life insurance.

Service sometimes demands a temporary sacrifice of time and money; both, however, following an immutable law of nature in any good cause, multiply in direct proportion as they are unselfishly spent. To be something you must give something. Difficult problems are diagnosed and dissected by acknowledged experts in the greatest clinic of the present day; in the lexicon of the convention, there is no word spelt s-e-c-r-e-t. It is well worth while to join in The Big Brother Movement in Life Insurance.

One important point that should not be overlooked by those who expect to attend the gathering is the matter of hotel reservations. Applications should be made at once and should be addressed to Millard W. Mack, Traction Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The Psychological Moment.

A successful life insurance solicitor once said this to us: "More salesmen fail because they talk too much than because they talk too little. They often have their 'prospect' sold, if they only knew it, and then they go ahead and talk to him until he decides not to buy."

Salesmen often ask how they are to know the psychological moment when it comes. There is no hard-and-fast rule, but the best "closers" we know are those who work most on the prospect's side of the fence—who keep in closest touch and sympathy with the prospect—who make the most thorough study of human nature—who have the benefit of the prospect more vividly before their eyes than their own profit. Such salesmen are so harmoniously in tune with their prospects that they read quickly and accurately every shade of expression in the face, every little inflection of the voice, every unconscious movement of the hands or shoulders. They even seem to know intuitively what thoughts and feelings are in their prospects' minds and hearts. A smile, a nod, a restless movement of the hands or a change of position, a fleeting expression in the eyes, a faltering hesitation in the voice, even when the words are negative, may be a signal that the psychological moment has come.

At this time a direct, positive suggestion will oftentimes bring a favorable decision when the sale is hanging in the balance. The successful salesman works from the prospect's side of the fence. The keynote of successful salesmanship is co-operation with the prospect. Finally—and again—remember that true salesmanship is not conquest, but co-operation.—Prudential Record.

BUSINESS INSURANCE—A SINKING FUND CREATED TO COVER THE LOSS OF BRAIN POWER.

The Great Problem in Commercial Life Confronting Every Business Is How to Conserve the Value and Profit-Producing Power of Brains.

By WILLIAM KING, Special Agent, Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, St. Louis, Mo.

Business Insurance is developing into a paramount consideration of all progressive commercial enterprises. Brain power was never more in demand, never more highly valued, and when lost, never more greatly missed. Business is a battle of brain against brain, and the concern which is in the best position to withstand the struggle is the concern which protects itself with Business Insurance. Mr. King tells you this most convincingly.—Editor's Note.

In opening a discussion of such a proposition, I have always thought it best to offer a few definitions in order that we might have a firm grasp of our fundamentals, and therefore, very properly, I start with a definition of my subject.

Business is the pursuit of any legitimate object for profit. Insurance is a scientific method of distributing risks.

Business insurance is therefore a scientific method of distributing risks involved in the pursuit of any legitimate object for profit.

Notice, gentlemen, the definition of the word "business" introduces the word "pursuit"—it presupposes "action."

What is your conception of business? Is it factories, offices, buildings, machines—or men?

I tell you and you know it is live—red-blooded—fore-handed men—men who do things.

Notice next, gentlemen, the definition of "business" introduces "profit." Would we have business without profits? Perhaps some of us have had such experiences to our sorrow, but dealing with the subject from the broad standpoint—would there be business if it were not for profits? No—undoubtedly no.

What are men?

From the standpoint of your business—men are the producers of profits.

Your offices, your factories, your machines, will earn no profits by themselves—they are the mere means to an end—they are the means by which men make profits.

What Are Profits?

What are profits?

You tell me at once, the difference between cost and selling price. And right here I want to make my first point—what is cost?

You tell me it includes price of raw materials—manufacturing cost—selling expense—overhead charges—and depreciation.

Good—depreciation of what? Buildings, machines, wastes, etc.

Fine—but what of that greatest of all energizers—man?

Is he not from a business standpoint a machine—a machine of brain power? Will he not wear out? Is his life not a store of energy upon which he is daily drawing drafts cashable in profits? Surely.

Then from the standpoint of profits, the great essence of business, should there not be a sinking fund created to cover the loss of brain power—man?

And how better created than by a fund which will immediately produce in profits the loss suffered by the breakage or wearing out—death or retirement—of man?

So much for profits—now let's examine our trial balance. Assets on one side, liabilities on the other—equal to each other?

But are they? Yes—provided man makes them.

Sold for money—will the assets suffer a depreciation?

Undoubtedly yes. But—with man, the directing and driving force—they will not only pay out dollar for dollar, but show profits.

Gentlemen, why is it that so many business houses fail with the death of the controlling brain power? Is it not that the products were sold for less than cost—that no proper depreciation for the brain power was allowed? Why is it that so many so-called successful business men's estates are found bankrupt at death? Is it not that the greatest asset of all—brain power—was not protected for the business?

The great problem then to-day confronting every business is how to conserve the value and profit-producing power of brains.

Brains the Chief Asset.

A few years ago money got scarce up in the camp of the Roycrofters and Elbert Hubbard consulted a New York financier, who agreed to take a bond issue of $100,000 on the Roycroft plant at par, provided he held a life insurance policy on Mr. Hubbard's life for a like amount. Naturally Mr. Hubbard demanded, "Why the life insurance?" This, according to the "Fra," was the answer: "Your brains are the chief asset in this business. Your mind is a think factory. Your output is ideas. Your initiative evolved the business, and you know the work in every part. The buildings were built and the machinery installed with your mental raw stock in mind. With you there, the value of the plant is reasonably assured. With you gone—it is a conjecture. My people would not consider a loan for an instant without the insurance on your life."

In a few words—this concrete case, gentlemen, you have the whole proposition of business insurance.

The twentieth century is an age of specialized ability. Every business has in its employ men upon whose ability along special lines depends to a large degree the success of the business. Many businesses are organized around one man whose special technical knowledge or business experience makes the stock of a concern a good investment while he lives, but a doubtful one in case of his death. It is due the stockholders that they be protected against this contingency.

Every business has four separate and distinct departments—executive, financial, manufacturing and distributing.

In the smaller business all of these departments may be combined in one man, but in the larger businesses they are generally represented by separate and distinct personalities. Each one of these departments is interdependent of the other. The success or failure of any one of them means the corresponding success or failure of the business as a whole. Therefore it becomes the part of the prudent business man, first of all, to perfect his business organization, and then to protect that organization against destruction or dissolution by the untimely death of any one of the members upon whom the success of the business depends.

A Wise Precaution.

Partners in business should realize that business insurance for the benefit of the firm on the lives of themselves is a wise and reasonable precaution. One partner may possess the technical knowledge upon which the success of the firm depends, while the credit which is enjoyed and is so necessary may be extended because of the financial standing of another party. The death of either would seriously cripple the business, but this would be avoided if the deceased partner left an adequate amount of life insurance payable to the firm. The surviving partner's share of this money could then be used by them to purchase the interest of the deceased partner. These additional funds, too, would insure the credit needed for the further conduct of the business.

Witness the case of George D. Barnard & Company, of St. Louis. Back in 1870 three young salesmen for another house gave up their jobs and opened up for themselves. The firm was called Van Beck, Barnard & Tinsley. To be as safe as possible, each partner was insured by the firm.

In scarcely five years John Tinsley died, but the insurance enabled his partners to buy out his interest from the heirs and to continue.

Shortly after this George Van Beck died, and after the surviving partner, George D. Barnard, had taken care of Van Beck's interest the new firm of George D. Barnard & Company was formed, and its growth attests to the wisdom of these three young salesmen in providing against the loss of brain power.

Time and again the interests of large businesses have suffered severely because of the death of a partner. Capital without brains will not bring success. At the head of every successful business there is a man or there are men whose brains have made and are making that business what it is. Their ability is generally equal to the value of the company's capital. Business success is the result of a proper combination of capital and brains. The lives of such men are an asset to the company, and as such should be adequately insured.

Business Never Independent of Personality.

No business—be it individual, partnership or corporation—is independent of the personality of the man or men who manage and direct it. How can the business or corporation be safeguarded against the untimely death of this man or these men who manage and direct it?

By business insurance.

Business insurance is life insurance applied to the needs of modern businesses.

We are generally prone to consider business insurance with relation to corporations or partnerships, but, gentlemen, business insurance can and does play an increasingly important part in any business.

Consider business insurance carried by a business—be it a corporation, partnership or individual—as a credit factor.

In event there is a bonded debt or other obligation which must be paid in a specified number of years, business insurance may be used as the method for the creation of a sinking fund, and also for the protection to the business of the credit of the member upon whose life the credit of the firm largely depends.

Strengthens Credit.

The president of the Bradstreet Company has said that it is practically beyond doubt that the "taking out of business insurance strengthens the credit of the firm adopting it, and the increased confidence it establishes is recognized and reflected through our reports." Here with me is a statement of a prominent Eastern house made to a commercial paper firm, and in turn furnished by the commercial paper firm to its customers when they purchase the paper of this house. It shows assets of over $2,000,000—profit and loss of over $650,000, and then in addition there is this statement: "As a further resource, we hold policies on the life of J. J. Albright amounting to $375,000, payable to the company."

Most commercial paper reports to-day carry similar statements. Is there need for more evidence?

It is a well-known fact that when loans are made on real estate it is required that proper fire insurance be carried on all the buildings. This is a precautionary step, not so much so because the land itself is not worth the loan, but because those lending want to do business with men of good credit, and fire insurance is directly a protection to the credit of the man as well as extra security.

Why should not bankers, who are lending constantly to individuals, be interested in the added security that would come to borrowers if they carried, in addition to the security they offer, life insurance, the same as fire insurance is added credit and larger protection on real estate loans? It is a question of direct interest to bankers.

Most men will pay their obligations if they live—but suppose they die?

Men do die. Their estates are sometimes settled promptly—sometimes not. A man's credit may fall to a low ebb if he is suddenly taken off and has no added means of protection for his loans, more than those he had in active life. There are hundreds of loans made in which the activity and earning power of the man instinctively figure in the amount of credit extended to him. J. P. Morgan said on the stand, "Credit is largely a matter of personality—of character. I have loaned millions to men who hadn't a dollar behind them." When this element of credit with him is lost through his death, how profitable it would be to the banker who may be carrying him for a considerable sum if his estate was enriched by a substantial amount of life insurance that would be cash at death.

I believe it is a safe statement to make that some day bankers everywhere will look at this question in a practical way. The extent of a borrower's credit will be measured by the banker according to the extent in which he has life insurance for the protection of his estate beyond ordinary commercial assets.

Value as Credit Factor Inestimable.

And how important is this same thought to you—men who advance large credits, some of them over long periods—are they not based on the personal equation largely? Gentlemen, the value of business insurance as a direct credit factor is almost inestimable.

And again, such insurance also forms a readily convertible cash asset for use in times of financial depression or other emergency. The cash loan values of such contracts are of the greatest importance, since they are available at a time when other facilities for credit may be strained. In 1907 a very prominent St. Louis house which was running close to the wind was strained to a breaking point—they could not raise money to meet their payroll—but business insurance showed the way out. This is an actual case, but the name is withheld for obvious reasons. That firm is still in business to-day.

No one will deny the need of fire insurance to protect the intrinsic assets of any business against the ravages of fire, yet how many men can appreciate and do appreciate the value of the personality which cannot be replaced like the building can which has been burned down.

When San Francisco burned, one of the largest fire insurance companies in Chicago, was forced into the hands of a receiver. The announcement was made late Saturday afternoon, and as a result fire insurance offices in Chicago and other parts of the country were compelled to keep open on Sunday in order to accommodate men who couldn't wait until Monday to reinsure their buildings, which through the suspension of this company were left partially or wholly unprotected.

Fire Improbable—Death Certain.

Isn't it strange that some of these men who were frightened by the thought that a blaze might destroy their uninsured property during the night, will let days, weeks and even months and years pass without covering their lives with needed policies—thus protecting their businesses from loss of brain power? Fire is improbable—death is certain.

In many cases the reason for this delay is the so-called expense. Gentlemen, do you realize that the average rate for business insurance is about $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent. of the risk carried? Do you realize that this outlay is not expense? It is an investment. You are certain of a return. The premiums paid out are charged to the firm or business, and correspondingly the cash values created are carried as assets. As a rule, the cash values will ultimately equal the entire outlay—there is no expense any more than there is to depositing money in a bank.

Some men object to such insurance on the ground that the younger man is paying the premium for older men's insurance. He may be, but the risk is greater, and correspondingly the younger man's chances for reaping the benefit of the protection in future years is greater. When the death of the older, experienced heads of business occurs it is fraught with the gravest danger, especially should that death occur during an extension of business, a period of long lease or increase of credit or building operations, or fulfillment of large contracts, or during a period of financial stress.

As a matter of fact, the need for business protection of the older heads is greater than on the younger, just as the need of a reserve fund for rapidly depreciating assets is greater—they will have to be replaced sooner.

It is hardly necessary to add that for the protection demanded a policy of business insurance is the very best safeguard. Nevertheless, some might think that a business should carry its own insurance either as an ordinary asset of the firm or as a bank deposit or as an investment in some form of bonds or other securities. If carried as an asset of the firm it would speedily become involved in the general assets and would not be available when required. If carried in bank there would be the continuous temptation to use it for other purposes or the bank might fail, and if carried in the form of securities the securities might not be easily realized upon when needed.

How It Is Done.

The chief objection to this, however, lies in the fact that you cannot set aside enough cash at the start to provide for ample protection. How can a reserve of from $650 to $900 a year provide $25,000 in gold coin available immediately at death? Only by means of an insurance contract. This payment of a larger sum in consideration of a small premium is the essential element of the insurance contract which gives it the advantage over all other methods for protecting business along the lines we have been considering. The inability of the average business to set aside a sufficient sum in cash all at once as a reserve against time of trouble is apparent to all. Yet the most ordinary business can pay a premium so as to have an ample fund in ready money available in case of death.

What more can be added—simply a question of how much protection is necessary.

As a general proposition the value of the executive heads of any business are equal to the total of the company's capital, and therefore they should be insured for such amount.

However, there are other elements to be considered. The actual productive ability in dollars and cents is perhaps the truest test, since a man on $100,000 of capital might produce $10,000 in one case and $25,000 in another. Certainly, therefore, the value of the men producing the $25,000 is greater than those who produce only $10,000.

Depreciation of Assets.

Not only that, but the outstanding obligations of the business must be considered. Certainly enough protection should be carried to provide adequately for the liquidation of the business without great depreciation of assets. The value of the personal equation in credits is of the greatest importance.

Business insurance is the greatest of all safeguards offered to you to-day. It distributes scientifically over a great number of individuals and over a long period of years the risk you take of losing executive, financial, productive or distributive brains—the greatest asset of all business.

It must be remembered that the need for such protection is just as great in the small business, if not greater, than in the large, and I venture the prediction that the time will come when a business without insurance on the lives of its productive heads will be as rare as the uninsured building is to-day.

The great question in front of you men individually is "Shall I wait until then to avail myself of the advantage of such protection?"

WILLS AND THEIR RELATION TO LIFE INSURANCE.Legal Points of Similarity and Dissimilarity Between Disposition of Property by Will and Its Disposition by a Life Insurance Policy.

by George H. Noyes, Counsel the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company.

Judge Noyes delivered the following address before the Cincinnati association at its March meeting, and it is a most valuable contribution to Life Insurance literature. J. J. Jackson of Cleveland said at the Atlantic City Convention, "It has been my business the last five years to make over five hundred wills. What has that got to do with Life Insurance? Everything."—Editor's Note.

Request has been made that I address you on the subject, Wills and Their Relation to Life Insurance." To do this within the time limited, it will be necessary to make general statements, omitting such explanations and qualifications as more critical discussion would require.

A will is defined as a legal disposition of property by a competent testator, in the form prescribed by law, to take effect after his death.

In the United States a will is known as a "last will and testament," a redundant combination of English and Roman law terms meaning the same thing, although at Common Law "will" related to a devise of land and "testament" referred to personalty.

Wills were not known in primitive days because rights in land did not exist and personalty was either of little value or was destroyed at the death of the owner as a mark of respect to his spirit; but when property interests became defined and rights vested, wills became necessary in order that the personal wishes of a decedent might be respected and executed.

Past and Present.

In the early days of will-making, owing to the peculiar method of taking titles, a devise of land was an intricate proceeding and a bequest of personalty was almost as hard to make, but in the process of development, statutes, rules and orders of court have so defined procedure that, broadly stated, one may dispose of his property both real and personal as he sees fit, having due regard, of course, for well-defined and recognized statutory restrictions and provisions. There are important incidents connected with the making of a will.

Foremost is that of legal capacity.

A testator must be of "sound, disposing mind and memory" under no restraint at the time of executing a will, and while this sounds simple in the statement of the fact, the law books are full of cases in which wills have been "broken," the layman expresses it, because of this lack of legal capacity due to innumerable causes either inherent in the testator or brought to bear upon him from without.

The form of a will is important.

One does not have to use necessarily the words "will" or "testament" in order to make one, but if the instrument is executed in proper form and on its face shows it is intended to be a will, it will be so construed.

The statutes of the several States prescribe the formalities of executing a will, and these must be observed to create a valid testamentary instrument.

There is a want of uniformity with respect to what laws govern, depending upon the subject matter of the will.

The general rule, however, is that a will devising real property is governed by the law of the place where the land is situated, while the rule bequeathing personal property is determined by the law of the testator's domicile at the time of his death.

The validity of a trust under a will affecting real estate is to be determined by the law of the place where the land is situated, while the validity and effect of a trust where there is a bequest of personalty primarily is to be determined by the law of the domicile of the testator and not the law of the place where the personal property is situated.

It may be considered a general rule that the meaning and effect as well as the validity of a will involve an inquiry into many questions, all of which are to be determined in accordance with the laws of the State applicable thereto and to the kind of property covered by the will; as to the capacity of the beneficiary to take the property sought to be bequeathed or devised; as to the length of time the title to the property may be suspended, and as to the validity of provisions creating trusts and the enforcement and termination of them.

An inherent and essential element of a will is that it is revocable at any time prior to death.

Revocation is accomplished:

(a) By "some specified act" showing the intention, such as burning, tearing, canceling, obliterating or destroying;

(b) By the making of a later will, codicil or other instrument;

(c) By changed conditions in the domestic relations of a testator; and

(d) By alterations in the property before the death of a testator.

It must be borne in mind also, that the purpose for which a will is made must be legal. One cannot accomplish an unlawful thing by merely making his will.

Its Meaning and Construction.

Not the least important feature of a will is its meaning and construction. This is to be sought from the language used in the instrument. Vague, uncertain diction here has no place and the books are filled with cases in which courts have been called upon to ascertain the intention of the maker in order to establish his will when expressed in ambiguous language.

The idea prevails with many that a will is a very simple instrument to prepare. On the contrary, a will may be and usually is one of the most intricate of all legal documents. This is peculiarly the case when there are gifts or bequests depending upon contingencies or when trusts are created. It was said by Lord Coke that "Wills and the construction of them do more to perplex a man than any other learning." An author of high repute has said that fully 50 per cent. of wills contain some obscurity or omission and are open to attack and a large portion of them are found fatally defective.

Disposing of the Income.

Within the limits of the rule against perpetuities, the law recognizes the right of a testator to dispose of the income of his property both real and personal, and he may give the income separate and apart from the principal so that the beneficiary may have the income while having no interest whatever in the principal from which the income is derived.

The intention to separate the income from the principal is generally manifested by the creation of an express trust or by limiting the right of the beneficiary to a life interest in the income only.

As to the time over which the payment of an income may extend by will, there is no limit except the rule against perpetuities.

So, too, a will may provide for the payment of an annuity or of a specified sum at intervals.

One of the chief points of difference between a gift of income and an annuity is that a gift of income fails if the principal of the estate is not sufficient on investment to pay the income bequeathed, while an annuity does not fail because the net income is insufficient to pay it in full, but any balance may be payable out of the principal. Where, however, the annuity is payable out of the income only of an estate, the deficiency cannot be made up out of the principal.

Bequests of both income and annuities are generally ac-completed by the creation of a testamentary trust, in which the legal title to the property devised or bequeathed passes to a trustee, while the right to an income or annuity goes to another called the cestui que trust or beneficiary.

In order to constitute a valid trust:

(a) Testator must use language showing his intention to pass the legal estate to the trustee and the equitable interest to the cestui que trust;

(b) Testator must indicate a beneficiary to whom the equitable interest is to pass, in terms definite and certain;

(c) The property conveyed must be well defined and the purposes for which the trust is created must be set forth in such clear and definite language that a court of equity can enforce the wishes of the testator;

(d) The subject matter of the trust must be separated and kept separated from all other property;

(e) There must be a trustee competent to administer the duties required by the will.

If the intention to create a trust is clear and the other elements to a valid trust concur, equity will not suffer it to fail for want of a trustee, but the court will appoint one to carry out the will of the testator.

I have thus far spoken of the character and execution of a will.

A Life Insurance Policy Defined.

A life insurance policy is an agreement by which a party, for a consideration, promises to pay a certain sum of money to the person insured or to someone designated by him, at a certain time and under conditions specified in such agreement.

It is sometimes said that an insurance policy is a contract whereby for a stipulated consideration one party undertakes to indemnify another against certain risks. This is considered correct with respect to marine and fire insurance, but as to life insurance it is to be defined simply as a contract to pay a certain sum of money upon the occurrence of an event which is sure at some time to happen, in consideration of the payment of premiums as stipulated.

In the modern form of policy contracts, options are now usually given to the insured to elect that payments be made upon maturity of the policy, by death or otherwise, in stipulated installments at various dates in the future instead of in one sum.

A policy containing such provisions is now frequently known as an "income policy."

The idea of an income policy is not new. As early as 1698, more than two hundred years ago, the Mercers' Company in London issued policies providing for the payment of annuities or an income upon the decease of the party insured instead of paying at once the full amount due under the contract.

Payments by Installment.

It is only, however, in recent years that the advantages of payments by installment, either principal or interest or both, have been brought prominently to the attention of the public, resulting in the rapid increase of income insurance both in importance and popularity.

The points of similarity between the disposition of property by will and its disposition by policy of life insurance may be noted.

Broadly speaking, death is the particular feature of each.

A will, and likewise a policy, if the right be reserved, may be revoked and the beneficiary changed at any time before death. This similarity, however, disappears where the right to change the beneficiary is not reserved in the policy. As to this further reference will be made.

Both will and policy require the same legal capacity on the part of the maker to give them force or to annul them, and each is subject to the rule that nothing illegal can be accomplished.

Above all, each must be explicit in directing how and to whom the property shall be distributed and provision must be made to cover clearly all contingencies.

A will as a general thing is drawn for each individual case and is usually prepared by a lawyer who thoroughly understands the legal meaning and the effect of the words he uses, and the same careful deliberation should be observed in preparing the forms for policies to be issued which provide for the payment of their proceeds in installments to one or more beneficiaries.

Wills and policies are more or less dissimilar in the following respects:

Dissimilarity of Wills and Policies.

(a) They are dissimilar in that a will requires certain formalities in its execution and certain proceedings in courts of probate to put it in force. Under a will an executor or trustee gives bond for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, while under a policy the guaranty of fulfillment is based upon the financial condition of the company which issues it;

(b) A will may dispose of both real estate and personal property, while a policy of life insurance disposes only of money, the proceeds being payable after the death of the insured;

(c) The construction and effect of a will bequeathing personal property are to be determined by the statutes and court decisions of the State where the testator lives, while the construction and effect of a policy of insurance are to be determined as a general rule by the law of the State where the insured resides or the policy is delivered rather than by the law of the State where the company issuing the policy is located;

(d) It is sometimes difficult to determine whether a written instrument constitutes a will or whether it is a deed or contract.

In order to constitute a will, two things are requisite:

First—There must appear in the instrument the animus testandi, that is, the intention of making a testamentary disposition of property; and Second—It must be revocable.

A will may deal with any or all of three things:

First—It may deal with the property of the testator either real or personal;

Second—It may appoint an executor to take charge of the estate of the testator and deal with it accordance to the law and the terms of the will; and Third—It may appoint a guardian for the minor children of the testator.

It is requisite that the instrument express the wishes of the decedent both in its outward form and in reality. It must, therefore, be executed in accordance with the laws of the State or country where the will is executed, or where the property, if real estate, is located, and it must by its terms clearly show that it is to go into effect only at the death of the testator.

Wills Subject to Revocation.

Furthermore, it is the essential idea of a will that it is subject to revocation. This follows from the fact that a will passes no present interest in property devised or bequeathed, the property still belonging to the original owner. He parts with no interest in it whatever by making a will. He still can sell it or exchange it, pledge it or give it away. He may revoke a will already made and make a new one, or die intestate as he pleases. If the instrument executed is such that the maker cannot revoke it, it may be a deed or a contract, but it cannot be a will. If the instrument is a will, it is subject to revocation.

As distinguished from a will, a deed or contract, including a policy contract, when duly executed, takes effect at once and upon delivery passes the title to the property named therein. The test is not the time of performance but the time at which by the terms of the instrument a property right under the instrument attaches. The test is not the time of promise but the time at which by the terms of the instrument the property right is to attach. If by the terms of the instrument no property right is to attach until the testator's death, the instrument if properly executed is a will. If the property right attaches during the testator's life, the instrument is a contract even though the time of its performance may be postponed until the death of the testator. Thus an instrument in the following language: "One day after my death, I promise to pay to the order of Nancy M. Jones, two thousand dollars, to be paid out of my estate," was held to create a present liability and hence was held to be a contract and not a will.

The same distinction is made between a will and an order, the test being the same as that between a will and a contract. If the interest created is to begin as a vested interest during the maker's life, the instrument is an order, even if the essential results of such instrument are postponed until the death of the maker. But if the interest thereby created does not take effect until the death of the maker, the instrument, if properly executed, is a will.

It has been held that a beneficiary certificate of insurance bearing an indorsement of the holder that at his death his claim should go to parties named therein or to a certain person as executrix for them, was testamentary in character but defective as lacking statutory formalities. The same rule has been held to govern in an assignment of a life insurance policy to take effect after the death of the assignor.

How Policies Differ from Wills.

A policy differs from a will in the following material respects:

There are in the law two distinctive kinds of obligation to pay money. In one the person is bound to pay the obligation out of any or all of his assets; that is the kind which a debtor owes to the creditor.

Under the other kind of obligation a party is bound to pay money only out of a particular fund or out of a particular fund held by him under a relation of trust.

In the latter case the entire property which he holds or owns is not liable to be taken to satisfy his obligation. The person to whom he is obligated must look solely to the particular portion of the property held or devoted to discharge the obligation.

This last kind of obligation creates what is known in the law as the relation of trustee and cestui que trust or beneficiary.

A distinctive feature of a trust is the setting aside of a specific fund of money or other property in the hands of a trustee who is required to separate it and keep it separated from all other assets.

Such trustee owes the duty to the beneficiary to hold such property, to invest the same and to retain active control and management of it. It is his duty to see that a certain and reasonable income is derived from this property or fund and to pay such income over to the beneficiary.

An Obligation.

Such an obligation arises out of a will creating and designating a fiduciary estate to be administered by an executor or trustee.

A trust is not created simply because the word "trust" is used in an instrument.

An instrument may be called a "trust agreement" and may designate a person as a "trustee," but if, in fact, he has only the function of an agent or debtor and none of the peculiar liabilities of a trustee, the law will hold him to accountability only as an agent or debtor and not as a trustee.

A legal trust relationship is usually created by will; in some cases by a trust agreement entered into with a trust company.

On the other hand, it has been held in numerous cases both in the State and Federal courts that the relation of an insurance company to its policyholders is not that of trustee, but a simple contract relation of debtor to creditor.

On this theory a suit in equity for an accounting will not lie in favor of a policyholder against a company under a policy contract. This has been held even in the case of a life insurance policyholder of a mutual company where the company is in possession of and administering the semi-tontine fund belonging to its policyholders.

This difference in relationship becomes important in the consideration of some questions arising under the income or installment provisions of insurance policies. For instance, in a recent publication discussing the subject, "The Income Policy," I find among others the statement that the insurance company should be made trustee inasmuch as "the insured under the monthly income policy files his will as if he were devising that his widow receive for example one thousand dollars per month." And a further statement as follows: "Like a Government pension this income cannot be commuted or lost, neither can it be assigned or encumbered." * * * However large, an estate can be lost, but a monthly income legacy cannot be lost, encumbered, converted, contested, assigned or diverted from its purpose."

The language employed in these statements does not seem to have been carefully considered. It is liable to be misunderstood and perhaps to mislead; it recognizes no qualifications or exceptions, and ignores the diversity of statutes and decisions governing the subject in the various States where the policyholders reside and under whose laws their rights are to be ascertained and determined.

Income Tax Law.

In the publication referred to there is the further statement that the "interest feature is not burdened with taxes," thus conveying the impression that the income or installment payments received by the beneficiary under the option settlements are not subject to taxation. This position evidently would convey a false impression, especially in States which now have or may hereafter have an income tax law in force. Much, of course, depends upon the wording of the statute, but there is no reason why it may be claimed that such income is not taxable in the same way and to the same extent as the income or interest derived from a note, mortgage or any other similar contract.

My attention has been called also to the following statement in another document discussing the service rendered by the options of settlement. Speaking of the two plans provided in the settlement of policies, it is stated: "Of these two fundamental plans, there are sundry varieties and combinations to fit all kinds of protective purposes in all future contingencies." * * * It really protects the family to the very end of their lives and even to a generation unborn. It does for the family of the wage-earner or salaried man what no other machinery will do at all. For the rich man's family it does the main service that he has sought through trustees or trust companies, and does it better and carries it further."

An Exception Taken.

A moment's reflection, I think, will satisfy one that the statement so made is too broad, and that it cannot be claimed that these policy provisions can be framed and used so as to fit "all kinds of protective purposes in all future contingencies," and that the services rendered by them are better and carry protection further in all cases than those which may be obtained through trust provisions inserted in a last will and testament.

I have already alluded to the fact that revocability is one of the essential tests of a will, and that this results from the fact that the will speaks from the death of the party rather than the time of the execution of the will. This is not the case with respect to a policy of life insurance.

A policy becomes effective at the date of its execution. "A policy and the money to become due under it belong to the person or persons named in it as the beneficiary or beneficiaries and there is no power in the person procuring the insurance by any act of his, by deed or by will, to transfer to any other person the interest of the person named." (Washington Central Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 195-206.)

Such a policy is an entire contract even though the premiums are payable in installments; each installment is a part of the consideration of the entire contract and the property in such policy must have an owner in whom it is vested from the very moment when it is made.

Upon the execution of the policy the beneficiary receives a vested interest which may not be diverted or lost except by the voluntary act and consent of such beneficiary. Hence it follows that the policy or its proceeds if payable to a person other than the insured or his estate may not be disposed of by the will of the insured, which takes effect only upon his death.

There is one State in which a different view prevails. In Wisconsin for many years it has been the rule of the courts that one who has procured a policy of insurance upon his own life for the benefit of another and has paid the premiums thereon as they become due, may dispose of the insurance money by will to the exclusion of the beneficiary named in the policy, except where such beneficiary is the wife of the insured.

The rule on this subject is not deemed of so much importance at the present time, as in the past, inasmuch as it is now usually optional with the insured when taking out a policy to decide whether he will create in the beneficiary a vested interest without right of recall or revocation, or whether he will reserve the right to change the beneficiary, thus retaining his control over the policy and its proceeds.

This right to change or revoke is of great importance to the insured in exercising the options given him with respect to the time and manner of payment of the proceeds of the policy upon its maturity.

Departure from First Principles.

We have departed a long way from first principles in life insurance. From a simple contract to pay a fixed sum on the death of the insured the policy has been liberalized until to-day there are hundreds of forms in use by the several standard companies, and a score or more of separate and distinct purposes for which policies may be written. The Massachusetts Commissioner of Insurance in 1906, referring to the fact that a certain Massachusetts company had over two hundred forms of policies, said: "Most of them are complicated and unusual, and were designed not to meet a demand but to create one for certain 'frills' which the persuasive agent sets before the public as the best thing yet in life insurance."

As showing the purposes for which life insurance may be used, a recent speaker outlined no less than twenty-two, among them being the following:

To provide an estate for the benefit of all creditors at the time of death;

To provide a fund for distribution by last will and testament;

To provide a fund for bequest to school, college, hospital or other eleemosynary institution;

To provide a definite income after the death of the insured to his wife as long as she lives and after her death to children of the insured;

To indemnify survivors against loss of a partner's services;

To provide liquidating assets in the event of the termination of a partnership by death;

To provide a fund payable to surviving partner to purchase the deceased partner's interest;

To safeguard credit loans for temporary business purposes which may be readily obtained if the creditor is guarded against the effect of death;

To make a satisfactory answer to the inevitable question, "What effect will A's death have on the business?"

To indemnify for loss of a valued employe whose skill, technical knowledge, etc., make him a valuable asset; and

To provide funds for the repayment of bonds, the policy taking the place of a sinking fund.

It would appear from the above list that there is ample field for the writing of life insurance in this country.

Under the laws of many, if not most, of the States, life insurance companies are obliged to submit their policy forms to the Insurance Departments for approval and are permitted to issue only such policies as shall conform to the forms so approved. It is designed that these forms shall cover the normal requirements of the insuring public. These forms contain provisions as to optional settlements, designation of beneficiaries and contingent beneficiaries, payment of income and of installments of principal, which meet all the wants and conditions of the average man desiring such periodical payments—perhaps of 90 per cent. of those desiring income insurance.

Some prospective insurers, comparatively few in number, may ask for special, unusual and peculiar provisions to be inserted in the options in policies, which provisions differ in essential respects from those prescribed and adopted by the company and approved by the Commissioners of Insurance.

It is doubtful whether the officers or agents of a company may properly insert such provisions in the options and thus change the forms so adopted and approved. It is, however, certain that to do so would violate the anti-discrimination statutes, unless these special privileges were offered and given to all other policyholders desiring them.

Such unusual or peculiar provisions, nevertheless, could be covered by a testamentary instrument.

It would be best for the company and for all parties concerned that in such special cases the policyholder be advised to take legal counsel and have his wishes embodied in a carefully prepared last will and testament.

Obscure and Insensible Words.

If, as an eminent writer says: "Grave doubts and controversies daily arise in devices made by last wills in respect of obscure and insensible words and repugnant sentences," and if, as the fact is, the validity and construction of an instrument in writing, be it a will or a policy of insurance, depend to a large extent upon the statutes and decisions of the State where the testator or policyholder resides, great care should be taken lest the intention of the maker be defeated and protection to his beneficiary or beneficiaries be lost by reason of obscure, uncertain or invalid provisions in the instrument intended for their benefit. No company wishes to issue a policy containing, nor does any policyholder wish to have indorsed on his policy, provisions which may be held illegal or void for uncertainty, especially in a case where such questions may arise after the death of the insured and where his wife and children as beneficiaries may be called upon to defend their interests without the advice and assistance of the one who undertook to provide after his death for their protection and support.

Furthermore, it is well to consider what the increase in this particular line of service means to agents as well as to the Home Office as the years go by and the beneficiaries as well as the payments, quarterly or monthly, increase, especially in complicated or long-drawn out cases.

It means a vast amount of work, expense and time; it means that agents will have to keep track of and identify these beneficiaries, and see to the proper installment payments. They will be required to do more or less clerical and even detective work, and while they may find that it is no great present disadvantage to them to do this, it is conceivable that it may become very burdensome and expensive to agents in the field as well as to the Home Office when settlements and payments, a thousand-fold larger and more numerous than now, are to be made in the future, covering perhaps a period of twenty-five, perhaps fifty years, or more.

In closing this brief consideration of an important subject, I need not add that I believe in the higher efficiency and service of life insurance: I consider the optional settlements a valuable feature of that business and that a company is clearly within its rights and duties when it offers them to the insured for the protection and service of his widow and children. However, great care should be exercised by companies and their agents not to mislead by word or deed those who wish to avail themselves of the benefits of these options, nor to extend their provisions beyond the purposes expressed or intended in the policy contract.

An income policy has abundant merit in its own right. As has been aptly said: "It has plenty of advantageous points of its own without parading in borrowed plumage."

A LARGE ACQUAINTANCE

By ROBERT J. MIX

Manager Prudential Insurance Company, New York City

Question No. 1.—What is the most valuable asset that a LIVE Life Insurance Agent can have?

Answer.—“A LARGE ACQUAINTANCE!”

Question No. 2.—Is it within the power of EVERY Live Agent to have a large acquaintance?

Answer.—YES!

Question No. 3.—How hard are YOU trying to make new acquaintances EVERY DAY?

Answer.—I don't know the answer to that question—but YOU do, and EVERYTHING HINGES on the kind of a reply that you can truthfully make!

HY, gentlemen, I'm almost prepared to say that I believe the majority of those who read this article don't make a conscientious effort to make EVEN ONE new acquaintance EVERY DAY! How COMPLETELY that explains the failure of many Agents to do a larger business! It seems to me that every Agent ought to try to make at least FIVE new acquaintances EVERY DAY! Suppose, for instance, that you go to a man you know very well, or even slightly, and, after a little friendly chat, say to him: "Look here, John (or 'Mr. Brown,' if you don't know him well enough to call him 'John'), I want to ask you to do something for me—give me the name of some one man who you think will grant me a courteous interview. If you object to my talking Life Insurance to him, I'll agree not to do it unless he opens the subject himself. My stock in trade is my acquaintance—the more people I know, the more business I can do!"

Now, I'll venture to say that pretty nearly every man you know will give you the names of a few friends if you'll agree to use them in the way I've described. In lots of cases you can secure a card of introduction. Don't you see—that gives you a chance to approach these new people IN A PLEASANT WAY—you don't jump on them at once with the request for an application—your man's mind hasn't yet had a chance to close up—he hasn't had an opportunity to say "No"—and, ten to one, if you're agreeable and smiling and show an interest in HIS business, before you get through your interview he'll want to know what YOU'RE doing for a living! Thus, the subject of "Life Insurance" will come up in an entirely natural way, and your man will be ten times as likely to do business with you as he would have been if you had gone right plumb at him (without an introduction) with a request for his application. YOU'VE GAINED A GOOD HEARING, AND THAT'S THE MOST DIFFICULT THING IN LIFE INSURANCE FIELD WORK.

I fear that most Agents try to DRIVE men into taking out a policy—instead of LEADING them to it! There comes a time when you HAVE to get into first speed and bring pressure to bear, but you can lead up to that point gradually, gracefully and in such a manner that you haven't provoked the abrupt "No," which is so hard to overcome after it has once been uttered.

I would say that the securing of FIVE new acquaintances is not only a very important but a very ESSENTIAL part of what might be called "a good day's work." I'm supposing that the Agent has brains enough, and tact enough, to make a good impression upon every person he thus meets, for, of course, if he hasn't, there's no place for him in the Life Insurance business, anyhow—it's a business that DEMANDS brains and common sense!

Oh, there's no doubt about it, my friends—every man who is selling Life Insurance to-day ought to make a SPECIAL EFFORT—ought to make it a PART OF EACH DAY'S PROGRAM to make from one to several NEW ACQUAINTANCES! HOW I WISH YOU WOULD ACT UPON THIS!

THE CINCINNATI CONVENTION

Elsewhere in this number will be found an account of the plans which have been made for the Cincinnati Convention—the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the birth of The National Association of Life Underwriters. An outline of the program is also given. The program is the result of a year's careful study by the officers of the National Association as to the needs of the great army of field representatives of life insurance.

Representing, as it does, the instrumentalities through which it is proposed to solve the two present-day problems—the apathy of the public and the monstrous burden of taxation—it behooves every man in the field to give thoughtful consideration to these subjects, and to ask himself, "Wherein do these matters affect me?"

To assume an attitude of cynical indifference will but furnish the gas to inflate the balloons of pompous conceit. And even casual observation convinces one that there are far too many, shall we say—gas bags—visible in the life insurance firmament. When Emerson told us to "hitch your wagon to a star" aviation was a dream of a rattle-brained inventor, and the idea he probably desired to convey was to point to the necessity of high ideals in contradistinction to the heights attained by means of the propelling power of the ferment of fatuous self-sufficiency. We sometimes speak of a person as being "hoist on his own petard," and this expresses the same idea through the medium of a different figure.

The balloon type of life insurance agent is seldom found in the ranks of local associations. He flies banners and streamers bearing words similar to these: "I'm from Missouri," "You can't tell me," "Tell it to Sweeney." While branded with slang, for that very reason he appeals to the crowd. Every flight is preceded by a band concert, and the piece de resistance in the program is "Every Little Bit Added to Whatcha Got Makes a Little Bit More." The unfortunate part of the matter is that this type of agent, for a time at least, exerts considerable influence. His operations are spectacular, and as his own press agent he is without a peer. He fascinates the new agent by his reckless indifference to established procedure and his dare-devil independence.

The balloon solicitor eventually collapses, but before this happens he has poisoned the minds of many with whom he came into contact, and never has he intentionally lent his hand to constructive field ethics through the means of the life underwriters' association in his community.

Therefore it can easily be seen that the solicitor possessing these characteristics has convinced himself that the annual conventions of The National Association are amusing to children in the business, but as for him it would simply be a foolish waste of time to say nothing of an unmitigated bore. But he forgets that the most dominant figures in the life underwriting world are members of local associations, and that such men have in former years regarded their own attendance at a national convention as an investment the value of which did not permit of computation in dollars and cents.

Indeed, the time has passed when the men most prominent in The National Association attempt to find in their personal production or in their agency production results which are directly traceable to the annual conventions. The benefits which have accrued have been so apparent that this particular phase of the convention is now taken for granted. Since The National Association has taken the public into its confidence, attendance at its conventions becomes not only a duty to the solicitor, not only a duty to Life Insurance as an institution, but above all it has become a duty to Society.

Perhaps it should be said that the love of life insurance commissions is at the root of all evils of the business. The agent with his nose so close to the trail that he can see nothing but commissions is not a credit to any local association. We know, of course, that we may hold a penny so close to the eye that we will be unable to see the sun. We also know that we may stand so close to one tree that it will shut out a view of the forest. These are both self-evident truths, but the same principle is applicable to the national conventions. Commissions are necessary, and it cannot be denied that life underwriters find them quite useful; but commissions at too close range utterly eclipse Life Insurance as it should be viewed, and Life Insurance as it should be viewed is Life Insurance as you find it at a national convention.

It is a matter of great difficulty for the man who "knows it all" to see things from this viewpoint. He has touched humanity at one point only—a hard and cold exchange of contract for coin. To him this transaction is all there is to Life Insurance. He is mentally isolated in a circumscribed mercenary cell of his own selection, and his spirit has never felt the electrifying touch of service.

This is where the annual convention plays its most important part, for to enter into the spirit of the convention means the metamorphosis of the weakling, obsessed with his own importance and blind to everything except commissions, to a broad-gauged, liberal-minded counselor in the safest and surest institution of modern civilization. The annual conventions do not neglect the matter of commissions, for at no other meeting of life insurance men is there such a profusion of practical addresses and short talks as to the technique of the fountain pen in its relation to the dotted line. But the conventions place commissions in their proper niche, as but a necessary part of a transaction which for the solicitor never ends.

Cincinnati is easily accessible from every city and town in the United States and Canada, and the convention will be held at a time of the year when it is convenient for the great majority of life insurance men to attend. The table is spread and you are invited to the feast. Will you be one of the many present, or will you be one of the few who stay at home? Turn to Act I, Scene II, of The Tragedy of Julius Caesar, and ponder over the mighty truth in this:

"Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world
Life a Colossus, and we petty men
Walk under his huge legs and peep about
To find ourselves dishonorable graves.
Men at some times are masters of their fates:
The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
But in ourselves, that we are underlings."

Federal Supervision.

We hear much nowadays about Federal Supervision. But the agitation for Federal Supervision is by no means of recent birth; rather should it be regarded as the outcome of an idea which has existed since life insurance was still in its swaddling clothes. As to the truth of this statement we have but to refer to the tenth report of the Massachusetts Insurance Department, by Elizur Wright, in 1865, in which that famous actuary said in part:

We see how rapidly the business of life insurance is developing itself in the United States by that portion of it which comes within the narrow scope of our office (referring to the Massachusetts department). Supervision is but the exercise of a State right of self-defense. Yet if the legislation of Massachusetts were copied in every State life insurance companies would either be confined to too narrow limits or would be embarrassed with a vast amount of needless labor and expense. Inasmuch as insurance is a general interest, and every insurance institution should be secured as much as possible against the operation of local causes, it is difficult for us to perceive why the supervision of all insurance companies of every sort intended to operate beyond the limits of State lines should not be a function of the general government. Simplicity and economy alone seem to require it, and since the citizens of every State do, as a matter of fact, largely avail themselves of their Constitutional right to the privileges of citizens of other States, it may well be questioned whether in regard to life insurance, especially, any State can protect itself so well as it might be protected by the general government.

The gradual growth of the movement, according to Hon. Burton Mansfield, Insurance Commissioner of Connecticut, who discussed this subject at the seventh annual meeting of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, was as follows:

Attempts by legislation to procure this result have been numerous. In June, 1866, a bill was introduced into Congress by Mr. Lawrence, of Pennsylvania, calling for Federal control of insurance companies. According to Mr. Dryden, this was the first bill of its kind to be thus presented. Up to 1905, when Mr. Dryden's own bill was presented, twelve similar bills had already been introduced at various sessions. Most of these, after reference to their proper committee, were never heard of again; some were adversely reported; but none, so far as I can learn, received favorable consideration. In 1905, also, President Roosevelt suggested an inquiry into the Constitutional right of Congress to regulate the matter. The time was especially propitious for such a suggestion, and a decidedly new impetus was given to the whole subject, the American Bar Association and sundry organizations of trade pronouncing themselves strongly in favor of the measure and calling for definite action. Many commissioners have also favored it. The commissioner of Wisconsin, for instance, in 1905 expressed himself as a firm believer in national supervision, and outlined the scope of such a plan very carefully. * * *

Some of the other commissioners who have from time to time advocated Federal supervision have been Mr. McCall, of New York; Mr. Durkee, of Illinois; Mr. Fricke, of Wisconsin, and Mr. Vorys, of Ohio.

Darwin P. Kingsley, president of the New York Life, is the acknowledged champion of the cause. He is to a great measure responsible for the effort now being made to arouse life insurance men and the public at large to the evils which have followed in the wake of 48 varieties of State supervision. Edward A. Woods, in the Taxation booklet recently compiled by him as vice-president of the National Association, asks these questions:

Why should life insurance with its nation-wide operations be the one business subjected to examinations, supervision and different rates and kinds of taxation by 48 different States, at the policyholders' own expense? What other business could stand it? Would national banks stand 48 different systems of costly supervision?

So far as our knowledge extends, Mr. Woods has made no public utterance in support of Federal Supervision, and simply because there seems to be a ready and sufficient answer to his queries does not commit Mr. Woods nor the National Association to the advocacy of Federal Supervision. Mr. Woods is interested in eliminating, or at least reducing, life insurance taxation; but by inference we may assume that if this great burden would yield to nothing but Federal Supervision then Mr. Woods would lend his voice in a plea for it.

However, there is an impression, which is steadily gaining ground, that "America's Great Burden on Thrift and Providence" can never be removed or adjusted to a fair basis unless there be one general system of supervision.

Undoubtedly the most conclusive argument for Federal supervision which has recently appeared is Mr. Kingsley's open letter to Commissioner William L. Hathaway, of the World's Insurance Congress. While it is intended to suggest a topic for discussion and action at the Congress, it is a document of distinct value to life underwriters who desire to be abreast with the times. Whether or not one believes in Federal Supervision, let us be informed as to what it is supposed it could accomplish. Mr. Kingsley's letter follows: Mr. W. L. Hathaway, Commissioner World's Insurance Congress, San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Sir: San Francisco is one of the necessary cities of the world, but that the Panama-Pacific Exposition of 1915 is to be held within her gates is attributable in very large measure to insurance and its singular service.

I do not say that San Francisco would not have been rebuilt in any event, but the difference between San Francisco as it is and San Francisco as it would have been if insurance had not almost immediately provided its stricken people with $190,000,000 after calamity fell, is something so considerable that, while we may not exactly measure it, everybody must recognize it. Of this $190,000,000 nearly $60,000,000 came from across the Atlantic. In other words, the foundations of insurance were wider than the nation, wider than the continent, and the means thus provided for reconstruction of San Francisco were adequate because of a substantially unrestricted operation of the insurance idea.

No idea, therefore, of the many which will be discussed and advanced during this Exposition will so well harmonize with its environment as insurance.

A great fact with which the coming World's Insurance Congress will be faced—indeed the greatest fact—is that insurance of all types in the United States is seriously menaced at the present time by conflicting and hostile governmental regulations which threaten—indeed have already begun—to impair its usefulness.

We all know that the Constitution of the United States was the outgrowth of commercial necessity. The original colonies did not form the Union because they wanted to. In commercial matters they hated each other cordially. After they had won independence they indulged in acts of commercial reprisal which seem to us at this distance almost unbelievable. In order to vent their spleen, some of the colonies discriminated in favor of European nations as against their sister colonies. The menace of outside interference finally became so real and the danger so imminent that the colonies were compelled to put aside some of their animosities in order to get together for the common defense. The Constitution of the United States adopted in 1788 was the result of this movement. If at that time the people of the various colonies had understood how flexible the instrument was, how nationality would spring up under it, how the central government would gradually develop a real sovereignty in place of the spurious sovereignty with which they deluded themselves—they would not have adopted it.

The notion that the colonies were severally sovereign—which was never true—survived the birth of the new nation and has plagued it ever since. Nationality has slowly but surely evolved in the intervening years, but the old prejudices and the old animosities have steadily fought that development.

Chief Justice Marshall had a clear vision of nationality and in some of his great decisions did as much to give the Constitution its present meaning as the men who fashioned it in that immortal convention in Philadelphia. Marshall's definition of the relation between the general government and the States was substantially this:

The action of the general government should be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally; while to the States is reserved the control of those matters which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of government.

If the Supreme Court had adhered to that doctrine, the conditions which threaten the usefulness and efficiency of all kinds of insurance would not to-day exist, but unfortunately in 1868 the court fell into a great economic error in declaring that insurance was not commerce. It repeated the error, as courts are all prone to do, from time to time; but as the question in its modern relations had never been fully presented to the court, it was hoped when a fresh case, involving no other issue, was presented, the court might—as it has done many times in other matters—reverse its earlier decisions and declare, as the interests of the public clearly demand, that insurance is commerce. Those who hoped for that result perhaps overlooked the force of inertia. They did not properly appreciate the restraining power of established practices and accumulated precedents. If insurance were declared to be commerce, down would go the whole fabric of State supervision, and away would go something like $17,000,000 or $18,000,000 taken annually by politics from the prudent people who through insurance protect their business and their families. Supervision by 48 separate States involves political patronage and great political power. To annihilate by a single decree a system so entrenched required courage of the highest order. Two of the court faced the facts and stood for the doctrine (N. Y. Life Ins. Co. vs. Deer Lodge County, Montana) that insurance is commerce; but the majority adhered to the precedents and by so doing shut the door to any relief under the commerce clause of the Constitution as it now stands.

This was a heavy blow to insurance, and served to emphasize an increasing peril. To be supervised by 48 separate masters, each of whom claims substantial control over all transactions wherever had, means, for that business, a recurrence of the hostilities, the animosities and the commercial impotence which menaced the colonies prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

Under such conditions it is rather remarkable that companies were able, up to within a few years, to comply with the conflicting requirements of all these masters and do business in all the States. Some seven years ago substantially all the life companies were driven out of Texas because of drastic local legislation. Since that time fire companies have had serious troubles in Missouri and are now having great difficulties in Kentucky.

With our highest court explicitly denying to the Federal Government any jurisdiction whatever over insurance, the notable thing is not that we are now having trouble, but that we did not have it earlier.

Insurance long ago began an agitation looking toward an amendment to the Constitution—an amendment which would clearly place amongst the enumerated powers of Congress the authority to control insurance within the States, Territories and possessions of the United States. Since the Supreme Court has again and finally declared that insurance is not commerce, the agitation has been renewed.

The agitation has taken on new life because of a decision by the Supreme Court, handed down recently, in which a statute of Kansas is upheld which gives the Superintendent of Insurance of that State authority to fix fire insurance rates. Of course if the Legislature of Kansas can fix fire insurance rates, it can fix life insurance rates, and the rates for every type of insurance. Indeed, one of the Justices, in dissenting, said of the opinion, that it * * * is not a mere entering wedge, but reaches the end from the beginning and announces a principle which points inevitably to the conclusion that the price of every article sold and the price of every service offered can be regulated by statute.

Insurance, therefore, finds itself in this position:

It seeks to do business in all the States; indeed it must if it works efficiently and successfully.

The basis of the structure must be broad—broader, much broader than any State, broader than any half dozen States; indeed added strength comes if the basis is broader than any nation.

But it is told by the Supreme Court, first, that it can operate in the various States only by their permission, and on such terms as they severally establish; and, second, that, operating in that fashion, it is subject not merely to regulation in the ordinary meaning of that word, but to the exercise of an authority which may fix the price at which it shall sell its wares—in other words, to the same authority under which a person's property may be taken for the public good.

To the doctrine that States may fix insurance rates two Justices dissented strongly, and as evidence that the insurance contract had always been considered a private contract and not impressed with any public necessity, they cited the fact that no State had earlier attempted to exercise such authority. The distinguished dissenters overlooked the fact that the State of Wisconsin some years ago fixed a maximum basis for the premiums of life insurance, not only for that State but incidentally and necessarily for all the States. For a life insurance company to charge a different rate in different States would be so impracticable that business would be impossible. The dissenting Justices overlooked this precedent because it has not since happened that any other State has been moved to do a similar thing, and no test of the validity of the statute has been made. But since the Wisconsin statute was passed life insurance has been keenly alive to what would happen if other States should take like action. Our highest court now says that all the States have authority so to act.

In these circumstances insurance is as certainly menaced by the animosities inevitably and always provoked by the doctrine of States' rights as the commerce of the colonies was before the birth of the nation. Relief must be had. The great problem before all insurance is:

Along what lines shall relief be sought?

Encouraged by the dissent in the Deer Lodge case, many strong men believe that if Congress could be induced to pass a statute taking charge of insurance when it involves the citizens of more than one State, the Supreme Court—notwithstanding its earlier decisions—would sustain such a statute. In other words, it is one thing for the court to pass on an abstraction and another to pass upon a Federal statute. Two of the court in passing on an abstraction said that insurance is commerce. It is altogether probable that others hesitated, and that hesitation would have been resolved in favor of the co-ordinate branch of government if that co-ordinate branch, in the exercise of its discretion, had declared for Federal control of insurance.

But upon the whole, and in order to reach a conclusion that will be unequivocal, insurance opinion rather leans toward an effort to secure an amendment to the Federal Constitution which will specifically put all insurance done in an interstate way under the control of Congress.

In justifying the court's action in upholding the validity of the Kansas statute, Justice McKenna draws a striking picture of the character and usefulness of fire insurance, seeking to drive home its great importance and enforce its public relations. His word painting may or may not justify the doctrine that a State may fix rates, but it clearly proves that if any power is to fix rates in this country, it must be the Federal power and not the power of the separate States. He says:

The effect of insurance—indeed, it has been said its fundamental object—is to distribute the loss over as wide an area as possible. In other words, the loss is spread over the country, the disaster to an individual is shared by many, the disaster to a community is shared by other communities; great catastrophes are thereby lessened, and, it may be, repaired. In assimilation of insurance to a tax, the companies have been said to be the mere machinery by which the inevitable losses by fire are distributed so as to fall as lightly as possible on the public at large, the body of the insured, not the companies, paying the tax. Their efficiency, therefore, and solvency are of great concern. In other objects, direct and indirect, of insurance we need not mention. Indeed, it may be enough to say, without stating other effects of insurance, that a large part of the country's wealth, subject to uncertainty of loss through fire, is protected by insurance. This demonstrates the interest of the public in it and we need not dispute with the economists that this is the result of the "substitution of certain for uncertain loss" or the diffusion of positive loss over a large group of persons, as we have already said to be certainly one of its effects. We can see, therefore, how it has come to be considered a matter of public concern to regulate it, and governmental insurance has its advocates and even examples. Contracts of insurance, therefore, have greater public consequence than contracts between individuals to do or not to do a particular thing whose effect stops with the individuals.

The distinguished Justice, in this impressive description of the service to business and society rendered by fire insurance, described at the same time the service and the nature of every conceivable kind of insurance; but he apparently did not perceive that what he described existed and was being justified only because the State powers, which the court then confirmed, had not hitherto been exercised. The Justice, in other words, based his decree on the existence of a service and a relation which will hereafter be gravely limited and embarrassed, if not largely destroyed, by that self-same decree. If the States had from the beginning exercised the rate-making power, in addition to current regulations, we should now have in this country no great fire insurance companies, no great life insurance companies, no great fidelity or surety companies—just as we should now not be a nation if the Confederation had not been abandoned and the Union created.

Where the exercise of a named authority will certainly diminish, if not substantially destroy, the matter on which it operates, either the thing to be so governed is not entirely useful or the authority to be so exercised is not entirely wholesome. For our highest court to find in the wide usefulness of an idea warrant for the confirmation of an authority which will destroy that usefulness is a curious judicial development. The majority opinion leaves no doubt as to the entire usefulness of insurance, while the strong minority opinion leaves no doubt as to the unwholesome character of an authority which will establish 48 separate rate-making powers.

What other thing, therefore, so distinctive, what other topic so vital, what other matter so certainly related to the future of business can your coming Congress so well deal with?

Merely to meet and discuss old topics—such as management and taxation—will have a limited interest. To seize boldly on this situation, to speak in no uncertain tones with regard to it, to pledge, so far as you properly can, all the powers of insurance in its various forms and through all its vast organization to a campaign in favor of a Constitutional amendment of the character indicated, would be at once an act of leadership and of statesmanship.

I commend such action to your careful consideration.

Yours truly,

DARWIN P. KINGSLEY, President.

"Nor Any Other Person."

From time to time we have given considerable space to the operations of the J. F. Kight Audit & Abstract Co. The last accurate information of Kight was to the effect that he was indicted for violating Section 29, Act of June 1, 1911, of the laws of Pennsylvania. The indictment recited that Kight was found guilty of making misleading representations and incomplete comparisons of two insurance policies issued by a New York company, with the intent of inducing the policyholder to allow them to lapse.

In many States there exists a law against misrepresentation of policies, but it is so framed that a "disinterested adviser," as Kight sometimes claimed to be, need have little fear of punitive legal procedure. The loophole of escape was in the fact that this law simply prohibited companies, company officers and agents thereof from making such misrepresentations. As Kight claimed that he was not a representative of any company, he could not be indicted. The New York law, however, goes one important step further. It has this phrase in addition to the above, "nor any other person." The New York law, embracing this important phrase, was re-enacted in Pennsylvania, consequently the action as noted above was taken.

The Life Insurance Independent in its June number calls attention to this matter and says, in part: "We have repeatedly urged the life insurance men of the country, more particularly the life underwriters' associations, to secure the re-enactment of the New York law in their respective States regarding misrepresentation of legal reserve policies."

It is a good idea, and so we are passing it along in the hope that the point will not be missed by the legislative committees of the various local associations.

The comment in The Life Insurance Independent was supported by an account of some of the literature being issued by the "National Association of Life Insurance Policyholders," with headquarters in Chicago. Whatever this concern may be, its methods are practically identical with those of the notorious Kight, for this is a sample of one of its announcements:

There are gross injustices and unwarranted discriminations being practised by Legal Reserve Life Insurance Companies; for example, why should one policyholder be required to contribute one-third more for managing expenses than another on the same form of policy where the same benefits are to be derived? Why should a policyholder be induced to pay in advance for his insurance to age 96, when there are only three chances out of 100,000 for him to live to that age? Why should one policyholder be required to pay $104 for the same identical benefit that another can purchase at the same age for $12.25? Why should the insured pay premiums on a policy when it is impossible for him to receive the benefits for which he is paying? These are only some of the many injustices being practised. * * *

There are very few policyholders who understand even the first principles of LIFE INSURANCE, and there are very few of them who have the time to devote to the study of the same (which will enable them to gain a comprehensive understanding of their policies). * * *

Some companies charge $38.30 per thousand for a 20-year payment life policy, while the same form of policy, giving the same benefits, can be purchased for the average premium of $36.25 in a company just as secure and perhaps under more favorable policy conditions. While the difference in premiums of $2.05 per thousand each year seems very small, yet were the insured to purchase a $10,000 policy, the difference in premiums would amount to a large sum at the end of 20 years.

Following is a paragraph taken from the certificate of membership, and therein is revealed the entire scheme.

To furnish an abstract showing the future results to be obtained, on any sample policy of insurance to be purchased and also an abstract giving specific information regarding policies of insurance, or settlements to be made thereon, for which the following fees will be charged: Sample policies, $2; policies of insurance where a saving can be made for the insured, $3 per thousand for first $25,000 or any part thereof, $2 per thousand for the next $25,000 or any part thereof, $1 per thousand for all additional amounts. Should any member desire to make any change in his insurance or to purchase new insurance through this association or its duly authorized representative, the above fee will be waived on all insurance so exchanged or purchased.

INSURANCE CONGRESS OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

Meeting Held in Los Angeles, and Four Hundred Insurance Men Take Action on Publicity, Legislation and Other Important Matters.

Four hundred insurance men, pledged to co-operate to advance the vital interests of their business, organized the Insurance Congress of Southern California on June 25 at the Hotel Alexandria in Los Angeles. While a permanent organization was not effected, Arthur P. Chipron, president of the Los Angeles association, stated at the close of the banquet that similar meetings would be held when occasion arose upon call of the various organizations.

Resolutions reported by a committee composed of Bertram P. Rouse, chairman; I. O. Levy and D. W. Pierce, and unanimously adopted, declared the need in California of corrective legislation to safeguard the public and the interests of the public; pledged support to the World's Insurance Congress; appealed to Governor Johnson to name as Commissioner of Insurance a man thoroughly familiar with insurance, and thanked the press for its co-operation.

Plans for a campaign of publicity were featured at the afternoon session, while the speeches at the banquet were principally on the subject of adequate regulation for the business. At the close of the afternoon session of the congress Frank E. McMullen, former president of the National Association, took up the proposed publicity campaign and under his direction subscription blanks were distributed and a large number of pledges to the advertising fund were made.

"You people stand for the biggest thing in the world," said Mr. McMullen. "Nothing else approaches it in beneficence. The spirit of co-operation is strong here; we shall want to act together to get a little legislation, not much, but a little. We want to make it certain that every man and every woman will get a dollar's worth for every dollar of insurance premium, we want to get rid of the parasite, we want the business to be represented by clean men. We want no legislation that is not in the interests of the people of California, and it is up to us to let the people know what we want and why, and to do that we must educate them through the press."

W. L. Hathaway, commissioner of the World's Insurance Congress of the Panama-Pacific Exposition, was received with much enthusiasm. He said he had been working for co-operation among all lines of insurance for three and a half years, and he urged that a Southern California permanent organization be perfected.

Short talks were also delivered by J. E. Phelps, secretary of the Fire Board; President Cole, of the Chamber of Commerce; Vice-President Baker, of the Pacific Mutual; J. C. Piver, publisher of the Underwriters' Report, and E. R. Misener, of the Occidental Life.

At the banquet George A. Rathbun, former president of the Los Angeles association and member of the executive committee of the National Association, was toastmaster. Among the other speakers were Mr. Hathaway, Julian Son-tag, vice-president of the West Coast Life; Seward A. Simmons, Willis H. Booth and J. L. Van Norman, who read an address written by Willard Done, formerly Insurance Commissioner of Utah.

GRATIFYING PROGRESS BEING MADE IN RAISING FUNDS FOR THE INSTITUTIONAL ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN.

Many Local Associations Devoted June Meetings to Discussion of Subject and Securing Pledges of Contributions—Chairman Warren M. Horner Issues Circular Letter Calling Attention to Important Details.

Following the announcement in the May number of this journal, in which National President Clark and Warren M. Horner, Chairman of the Committee on Education and Conservation, requested that the June meetings of local associations be devoted to the discussion of and the raising of funds for the Education and Conservation movement, many of the local bodies set aside their June meetings for this special purpose. Actual and tangible results were secured in all sections of the country, some associations even agreeing to raise a larger fund than would necessarily accrue under the basis of contributions as outlined by the National Committee. A notable instance was the St. Louis association, which not only agreed to the proposition of the National Committee, but decided to raise this fund to one based on 25 cents per $1,000 of paid-for business.

Naturally, life underwriters throughout the country, as well as home office officials, are beginning to realize that the Institutional Advertising Campaign is now taking definite form. Results are being tabulated and a full report will be made at the Cincinnati Convention. In the meantime, however, Mr. Horner, with the approval of National President Clark, has issued the following bulletin:

"It is very gratifying to the committee that the majority of local associations have voted to adopt the present plan of the Education and Conservation movement, and most of the remainder have signified their intention of following the same course at an early date.

Actual Contributions.

"The committee is very anxious, however, that the action of all associations be reduced to a final basis of contributions actually signed, sealed and delivered, so that such a report can be made to the Cincinnati Convention as will make the work at Cincinnati wholly constructive and along lines of perfecting ways and means for a better carrying out of plans already well under way.

"It will be necessary for each association to appoint a large committee to solicit contributions among the members of the association and those other accredited representatives of Legal Reserve companies who are not members of any local associations.

"A great many association members do not seem to understand that where a general agent gives upon the basis of the entire production his special agents are expected to contribute where they feel willing so to do. This duplication is advisable that the fund may be large enough for each local association, and the grand total for the national body sufficient to carry out the course of educational work and the writing of copy for local and national use. Everyone engaged permanently in the life insurance business can well afford to give upon the basis of his production as outlined.

"A number of associations are already crying for copy, and while the committee has thirty short advertisements written for publication by local associations in their daily papers and such mediums as they see fit, we cannot give out this copy to a few associations until a complete report is received from at least a majority of the total membership of the national body. It is absolutely necessary that the officers of local associations take such action as will permit a complete report to be in the hands of the committee by the end of July.

"It is only right that the statement should be made now that we are no longer working in the dark, but toward a definite goal, and most assuredly everyone should bend his shoulder to the wheel in assisting the committee to arrive at a reasonably intelligent understanding of just what each association is going to do."

GETTING THE BEST OF THE BLUES.

Although Character of Solicitor's Work Is Conducive to Periods of Depression, It Affords Many Opportunities for a Sanguine Outlook.

By Forbes Lindsay, Associate Manager of the Home Office Agency, Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, Los Angeles, Cal.

This morning I am going to talk to you about devils—the violent sort that took possession of the Gaderene swine and hustled them into the sea—but the bacterial kind, the little insidious germs that get into our system unawares, sapping our will, our nerves and our energy and setting up the condition which we call "the blues."

The progress of normal health is not over a horizontal plane, but along a success of undulations. We are seldom at par, but generally either above or below it. If we might have an instrument like the steam gauge to register the physical and mental fluctuations of a day, we should find the indicator constantly moving up and down. In varying degrees we are all subject to these fluctuations, although we may be conscious only of the occasional tidal waves of periods of excessive ebb.

In the very nature of things the mental life of a salesman is marked by pronounced curves. His is almost invariably of the mercurial temperament, readily elated or cast down. If a phlegmatic man succeeds in our business, it is by dint of hard work and dogged persistence, overcoming inadaptability.

The salesman is called upon for the exercise of a great amount of nervous energy. Most of the time he is on high tension and, like a steel spring on a strain, must experience a corresponding relaxation. He can never enjoy the equanimity of a salaried employe, any more than a salaried employe can experience the pleasures and triumphs of the salesman. The work of the latter is irregular and punctuated by deep disappointments, as well as sudden successes. Like that of the elevator boy, it is a life of ups and downs.

The Threshold of Depression.

Anxiety keeps the life insurance agent ever on the threshold of depression. If an unusually long interval occurs between applications, anxiety develops into worry, and this in turn grows into despondency.

Beginners in the business, lacking the fortitude derived from tested ability and recollection of past successes, are particularly prone to depression. Their minds are centered upon securing applications to the exclusion of all other considerations. They do not appreciate the value of work which is not immediately productive and have no conception of the benefit of adverse experience. They gauge their progress and accomplishment by their cash account. On the other hand, if the beginner, by good fortune closes a large case, he becomes over-sanguine, thereby sowing the seeds of disappointment.

The experienced agent, too, is apt to suffer a reaction of energy when an unusually long time elapses without a sale. Therefore, it is a good plan for the man who specializes in big business to fill in with small cases, and so maintain the satisfaction of constant achievement.

Now I am not going to advise you never to get "blue." The see-saw nature of your business makes it inevitable that you should do so at times. I will urge upon you, however, not to allow an attack of depression to develop, and above all, never to nurse it. I will suggest a few methods of warding off this condition and dispelling it.

Don't be anxious about your business. Take success for granted, and, like Sempronius, deserve it. If a disappointment befalls, put it behind you at once. Bury your failure as the doctors do. Never take the count. After a knock down get on your feet instantly and go at it again, before the blue devil germ can find lodgment in your system. Four or five hours of straight canvassing with fierce energy will take the sting out of the worst defeat and perhaps yield compensation for it.

Don't worry. It is the most harmful and the most useless of all emotions. Yesterday is a closed book. To-morrow may never be. Live in To-day and make the most of it. We know from experience that very few of the ills we dread come to pass and those few are seldom as bad as we had pictured them.

Don't brood or recite the tale of your woes. The fact that you are infected by the blue bug is not justification for exposing your associates.

Above all, never sink to that lowest stage of degradation—self-pity. The man who gets into that mental morass is lost. At the first approach of such a feeling go out and hire a strong man to kick you.

We must all expect to experience depression on occasions. We cannot avoid the attacks, but we may reduce their effects to a minimum, and the best way of doing this is to nip them in the bud.

Seek the Cause.

At the first sign of depression seek the cause and apply a sensible remedy. Maybe you have had a rejection. What of it? It is only part of the average which you must expect and the best remedy is to put in another application. You have not written a case in a fortnight. That fact increases the probability of your landing one to-day and, in any case, you will not improve the prospect by moping.

Perhaps you are stale as a consequence of overwork. In that case a brief rest is indicated. Make it a complete one. Close your desk and go off to the seashore or spend the day hill-climbing. Go away from the office and forget your work.

Although the character of a life insurance salesman's work is exceptionally conducive to periods of depression, it affords unusual ground for a sanguine outlook. The field man, like the actuary, may be sure of his averages. After his first six months a salesman can depend upon a certain aggregate production in the year as a result of a certain number of hours' labor. He has the assurance that an additional investment of time will yield proportional profits. Then again, he has the stimulating knowledge that while he is on the street and under the tree, so to speak, a plum may drop at his feet any moment.

Something to Ponder Over.

Did you ever notice people rushing about a railway station? Did it ever occur to you why they rush? These people are in no particular hurry, but promptly, at a certain time, the train will leave, and if they are not on board they will get left.

A lesson can be drawn from this that will apply in business. The prompt man is the best American business man. If he is prompt at his occupation he will be in funds. His bills will be paid promptly. He can always get credit. He has an abundance of self-confidence. He is a good man, a good buyer, a good payer. It is a pleasure to do business with him. He is always on time, and never disappoints.

That man is an ideal life insurance solicitor. He gets out of bed in the morning and is on his job on time just as regularly as though he were to take a train at that hour. He allows his determination to dictate his action. He is careful to put in a good day every day, and when he needs a rest, he takes it, but never mixes his work with his rest, for they mix only to a great disadvantage. Promptness is his keynote. It's the quarter-hours that make your day valuable. It has been said: "You can never find time for anything; if you want time, you must make it." Time accepts no sacrifice, it admits of neither redemption nor atonement. It is a true avenger.

Your competitor may divide the business with you, or your company may reconsider a rejected applicant. You may even write an application on a man who told you he positively would not buy a policy. But time that is lost is gone forever. TIME IS INEXORABLE AND HAS NO MERCY.—Barrett & Snow's Marksman.

What the Local Associations Are Doing

Life Association News has no paid correspondents. We depend entirely upon the secretaries of local associations to send us stories of all meetings of their respective associations. If an account of the last meeting of your association does not appear in this department, ask the secretary of your organization why he did not send us the particulars.

Immediately after each meeting, on the same day if possible, secretaries of local bodies should send us a full account of the business transacted, including copies of all speeches, or extracts from the most important of them.

Akron.

The Akron association held its regular June meeting at the Hotel Portage. Chas. W. Scovel of Pittsburgh, former president of the National Association, was the speaker.

Mr. Scovel told of the benefit the association had been to the life insurance business in 1905, at the time of the Armstrong investigation. The National Executive Committee was frequently in consultation with the Armstrong committee, in reference to some of the radical changes which it was proposed to bring about by enactment of laws in the New York Legislature. Several conferences were held during the year, and it was very largely due to the efforts of Mr. Scovel and his associates that drastic and impracticable laws were not put upon the statute books. It might have been a very serious handicap for the life insurance business in general, had the Armstrong committee proceeded to recommend for passage certain bills without first consulting those who had the best interests of life insurance at heart.

Mr. Scovel devoted the latter part of his talk to the benefits of the monthly income policy.

Baltimore.

As guests of the Maryland Naval Militia on board the United States steamship Montgomery, the Baltimore association made an excursion down the bay June 11. Frederick A. Savage is president of the underwriters and executive officer of the naval militia.

After a run of a couple of hours, the Montgomery was brought to anchor and dinner was served. Target practice was then indulged in by the militiamen. On the way back to Baltimore a meeting of the association was held. A committee was appointed to frame a resolution of esteem and sympathy to be sent to the family of the late Colonel Markoe, and the following was presented and unanimously adopted:

Whereas, Our friend and fellow member, Col. Frank Markoe, has by the loving voice of his Heavenly Father been called from us; and

Whereas, Our deceased friend had been one of the organizers and the first president of a life underwriters' association in Baltimore, and a loyal and faithful member of this association; be it

RESOLVED, By the Baltimore Life Underwriters' Association in meeting assembled, that in the death of Col. Frank Markoe we lose one of our oldest and most faithful members and a valued and faithful friend; be it further

RESOLVED, That we do here record our high appreciation of the sterling character and worth of our deceased friend, and the high esteem and affection in which he was held by us and by all who knew him, and that the sympathy of the members of this association be extended to the members of the bereaved family who have suffered the loss of a kind and indulgent father; be it further

RESOLVED, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this association, and a copy sent to the family.

(Signed)

MARCELLUS H. GOODRICH,

E. W. HEISSE, Committee.

Battle Creek.

At a noon-day meeting of the Battle Creek Life Underwriters' Association held at the Chamber of Commerce, representative life insurance men sat down to luncheon, which was followed by short speeches by nearly all present. Prominent among the speakers were Drs. Shipp and Gorsline, L. A. Dudley, N. E. Retallick, Guy A. Ramsdel, all setting forth the value of organization as a means of raising the plane of the business and educating the public to the value of providing for the future welfare of dependent wives and children.

An important point brought out by Mr. Dudley in the course of his remarks was that while the cost of living in general has materially advanced in the last ten years, the cost of all old line insurance has decreased, and that it would still further decrease when the public is awakened to the fact that taxation on premiums added 2 per cent. to the cost. This, reduced to dollars, means that the $13,000,000 of taxes would furnish $1,000 insurance to 550,000 more persons.

The matter of delegates to the national convention at Cincinnati, Sept. 15, was deferred until the regular meeting after the summer recess.

Five new members were admitted as follows: F. E. Shaw, Samuel Taub, Floyd E. Jones, Charles E. Rickabaugh and N. E. Retallick. The young association is assured of a solid foundation, and the value to the public welfare will soon become apparent.

Buffalo.

Eleven new members were admitted to the Buffalo association at its June meeting. There was discussion of the institutional advertising campaign as recommended by the National Association, and this matter will be taken up vigorously with the resumption of regular meetings in the fall.

Cleveland.

Members of the Cleveland association have chosen A. D. Hatfield, of Hatfield, Murry & Walker, president of the association for the ensuing year. They have elected the following other officers:

E. B. Hamlin, of George H. Olmstead & Co., first vice-president; W. H. Whitney, of the Phoenix Life, second vice-president; O. M. Olmstead, of George H. Olmstead & Co., re-elected treasurer; S. R. Johnson, of the Pacific Mutual Life, secretary.

At the recent annual meeting in Hotel Statler on the evening of June 26, Herman Fellingner, of the Pacific Mutual Life, long active in the affairs of the association, finished his term as president and declined re-election. Mr. Hatfield moved up from the first vice-presidency, but Hoyt W. Gale, of the Home Life, and second vice-president, also insisted that some other member take the honor of the office. T. M. Norris, with the Union Central Life, declined re-election as secretary.

Mr. Norris has been a member of the organization for fifteen of the twenty years of its existence, and has served nine consecutive years as secretary.

All of the retiring officers will continue their active interest in the association's affairs. The organization recently took in a host of new members and plans for a busy fall and winter are being made.

After the business meeting Governor James M. Cox was introduced by Mr. Fellingner.

In his address the Governor spoke of the work being accomplished by life insurance companies through their agents reverting to the compulsory workmen's compensation bill passed a year ago last winter.

"So far as I am personally concerned, I haven't the least disposition to place the Commonwealth in competition either with life or fire insurance business," the Governor said.

"In my opinion no government, municipal, State or national, should engage in any utility business unless it is definitely proved that private control and management is a complete failure or grossly unfair to the public.

"You will admit," continued the Governor, "there has been nothing alike in the conduct of the liability insurance business as compared with the conduct of the life and fire insurance business.

"Prompt settlements are alike the pride and aim of life insurance and fire insurance agents. I need not remind you that prompt settlement has not been the policy of liability insurance companies in past years."

Chicago.

Nearly 200 members were present at the last meeting of the season of the Chicago association, which was held on the evening of June 30 at the Auditorium Hotel. The two important matters which were discussed and upon which action was taken were plans to eliminate the rebate evil and the approval of the institutional advertising campaign as recommended by the National Association. Chairman George M. Herrick, of the special committee of fifteen, appointed some time ago to consider various phases of field ethics, delivered his report, which was in three parts, one in relation to rebating, another had to do with membership and the third took up the question of publicity.

As to rebating, the report of the committee was as follows:

"First, that a committee on rules, consisting of seven members, be appointed by the chair to determine whether or not evidence of rebating, in any given case, be sufficient to warrant prosecution by law or expulsion from the association.

"Second, that the affirmative votes of at least four members of this committee shall be required in any given case.

"Third, that this committee is instructed to raise, by subscription from the members, a fund of at least $1,000 to be used in suppressing rebating.

"Fourth, that this committee is further empowered to select a successful firm of lawyers and also the services of a reliable detective agency for the securing of evidence.

"Fifth, that no one be prosecuted under this resolution for any case of rebating prior to June 30, 1914.

"Sixth, that the Legislative Committee of this association be hereby instructed to make efforts to secure such change in the present rebate law of this State that both the recipient of the case and the rebator be found guilty, and that the one who furnishes evidence of such rebating be given immunity.

"Seventh, the committee further announces that arrangements have been made with the State's attorney to prosecute any cases of rebating in which the evidence is furnished for him by the association and provided the informer's fee is waived."

Although there was some objection to the immunity clause, the entire series of recommendations was unanimously adopted.

With regard to increasing the membership of the association, it was decided to choose two teams of ten members each and begin a sixty-day campaign; each active member secured to count two points, and each associate member one point, to the team securing him. The losing team will give a dinner to the winning team.

Jules Girardin, member of the National Committee on Education and Conservation, elucidated the plan of that committee and introduced John H. Mitchell, of the Mitchell Advertising Agency of Minneapolis, who further explained the propaganda, dwelling largely upon the benefits which would accrue to the agents throughout the country. John R. McFee, of the Massachusetts Mutual, objected to the copy which had been prepared by the Mitchell agency, and seemed to be of the opinion that not enough funds would be raised to carry out the intended campaign. The committee of fifteen recommended the approval of the National Committee's plan, and when the matter was put to a vote, the committee's recommendations were carried, practically unanimously.

Several new members were admitted, and it was resolved that Byron C. Howes, manager of the Union Mutual of Chicago, who has acted as treasurer since the death of Hervey S. Dale, be continued in that capacity until the next annual meeting of the association.

The committee appointed by President Ferguson to raise funds for education and conservation follows: J. D. Janney, E. E. Jones, J. H. Stevens, F. Wymán, H. C. Hintzpeter, H. C. Caster, D. G. Drake, B. J. Sinai, H. D. Wright, Max Lindauer, E. H. Carmack, C. F. Axelmann, C. B. Stumer, C. F. Bullen, J. B. Thorsen, W. E. Nichols, M. Ullman, H. Kremer, J. R. Norris and L. H. Whiting.

Colorado.

The regular monthly meeting of the Colorado association was held on the 1st inst. at the Hotel Albany in Denver. The principal speaker was Wendell Stephens, assistant attorney-general, his subject being, "The Law and Its Relation to Life Insurance." Mr. Stephens advocated the abolishment of the 2 per cent. tax on premiums and made several suggestions for improvements in Colorado's insurance laws. Other speakers were Superintendent of Agencies Johnson, of the Prudential at San Francisco, and President J. C. Burger, of the German-American Life of Denver.

There was a discussion of the institutional advertising campaign of the National Association, and the matter was referred to the Executive Committee for action. It was also decided that a life insurance congress should be held at Denver some time in the fall. Edward A. Woods, vice-president of the National Association, will be the principal speaker. The matter is the hands of Secretary C. M. Reich.

Columbus.

Members of the Columbus association, on June 20, were entertained by J. C. Campbell, manager of the Ohio and West Virginia agency of the John Hancock Mutual, at his country home, "Bryn Mawr." The inevitable baseball game was played and, although it has been difficult to decide the score, still, according to the latest report, it stood 36 to 19 at the end of the fifth inning, the winning team being captained by C. K. Siebert, while E. B. Gerlach headed the losing aggregation.

Detroit.

Following the recent example of Winslow Russell, superintendent of agencies of the Phoenix Mutual, President M. H. Zacharias, of the Detroit association, recently sent out a circular letter to the leading business and professional men in Michigan asking for replies to certain questions in relation to the field ethics of life insurance. A copy of the letter follows:

"The Detroit Life Underwriters' Association is making a strenuous effort to improve conditions in life insurance salesmanship.

"I am enclosing you herewith a list of questions, together with a self-addressed stamped envelope, for its return. May I ask your consideration to the questions asked so that we may intelligently arrive at the viewpoint of the average business man on this very important subject?

"I think I am safe in saying that life insurance has returned a greater percentage, compared with the amount of money invested in it, than any other fiducial institution in the history of the world. In spite of this fact the average business man is not easily approached on the subject. If we as salesmen are at fault, we want to know it, and ask your co-operation to this end.

"You may rest assured that your reply will be treated strictly confidential. Your name will not be given out in connection with your answers either before the association or otherwise.

"Thanking you in advance for your prompt reply, I remain,

"Very truly yours,

"M. H. ZACHARIAS, President."

The questions to which replies were asked were as follows:

1. Do you carry life insurance? (We will be glad to have you state amount if you desire.)
2. Have you found your policies to be exactly as represented by the agent?
3. Does the average agent undertake to analyze your case and try to sell you the kind of policy you should buy?
4. Is the average life insurance man who calls on you a competent salesman in his line?
5. Is the average life insurance agent as welcome to your office as is the average salesman in any other line in which you are interested?
6. If not, why?
7. What percentage of the agents who call on you adversely criticize the insurance that you already have in other companies?
8. What percentage of the agents who call on you openly attack other companies?
9. Do you understand that all old line life insurance policies, outside of term policies, have a value to the insured as well as to his estate?
10. What suggestions can you make toward the improvement of conditions in life insurance salesmanship?

According to the Indicator "there were 47 replies received, or about 20 per cent. Of these it appears that 35 carry life insurance, five do not, and from nine no reply was made to this question. The second question was answered in the affirmative by 34, in the negative by four, and nine made no answer. In regard to the third question 22 replied yes, 12 no, while 12 did not answer the question. Twenty-nine were of the opinion that the average life insurance man is a competent salesman, while eight thought differently, and 10 made no reply to the question. There were 23 who said that the average agent is as welcome at their offices as is the average salesman in any other line of business, 14 replied that he was not. Those who said that they were not gave the following reasons: 'Bores,' 'too tenacious,' 'too busy,' 'loaded.' In reply to the question what percentage of the agents adversely criticize the insurance already carried in other companies, 17 replied none, 11 'a small percentage,' five 'all,' and 14 did not reply. In reply to question 8, 22 said that none openly attack other companies, 11 said that a small percentage do, 16 making no reply. As to question 9, 34 replied in the affirmative, two in the negative, and 11 made no answer. In response to the last question there were a number of suggestions made as to things which might be done to improve conditions in life insurance salesmanship. Among these were 'intelligent agents,' 'married agents,' 'agents in middle life,' 'an efficiency standard,' 'criticism of past, not present,' 'make it a matter of business, not friendship,' 'a definite knowledge of the prospect,' 'talking to men when they are not busy,' 'more experienced agents,' 'definite appointments,' 'a mail order campaign.' One man made these suggestions: 'That after the agent has received an answer he should accept it and not make a nuisance of himself; that he should regard a busy man's time as valuable and give him a little credit for knowing what he wants; and that he does not try to force a person to take a much larger policy than he has ordered.' Banking Commissioner E. H. Doyle said: 'I think it is mighty well looked after, and the young man who takes out assessment insurance as against old line fools no one but himself and ought to have a guardian.'

The annual meeting of the association was held at Bois Blanc Park on the 16th of last month—the trip being made by steamer. During the business session held on the boat, George L. Bahl, general agent of the Penn Mutual, was elected a member of the National Executive Committee. Delegates were also elected to the Cincinnati convention.

There was the usual ball game, and W. D. Clizbe and Col. Will Waite had been appointed captains of the two teams.

AN ACCIDENT OR ILLNESS

is unfortunately apt, sooner or later, to overtake any man. Prudent men insure against this contingency, so as to be indemnified for income lost or earning power affected while they are disabled, and for the unusual expenses attendant upon illness or accident for medical expense, hospital charges, nurses, medicine, etc.

No Disability Policy has ever before been issued which so thoroughly protects the policyholder as our new Guaranteed Addition Policy, under which the amount of the weekly indemnity for disability by accident is automatically doubled on payment of the second premium.

but in the absence of the latter J. A. Bucknell took his place. Mr. Bucknell's team won by a score of 11 to 7. In the afternoon there was another game, the contestants being the teams of the Sun Life and Mutual Life. It was won by the Mutual by a score of 9 to 1.

District of Columbia.

The regular monthly meeting of the District of Columbia association was held on June 18. The principal feature of the meeting was the discussion of the Educational and Conservation Advertising Campaign and the advisability of employing a publicity agent rather than taking a definite space in some newspaper. There was also a discussion as to whether or not the expense of such campaign should be defrayed on the basis of business written for the preceding year or the cost shared equally by each active member of the association. The entire matter was referred back to the Committee on Education for a report at the next meeting.

Everett, Washington.

A new association has been organized at Everett, Wash., and will be known as the Life Underwriters' Association of Snohomish County. The association has eighteen charter members and the officers are as follows: President, H. A. Sharpe, Penn Mutual Life; vice-president, J. B. Scanlon; secretary, O. C. Freese, Pacific Mutual Life, and treasurer, Jos. P. Torrey, Travelers.

Indiana.

At the June meeting of the Indiana association, Dr. Felix G. Cross, president of the Columbia Life, delivered a twenty-minute address on "The Company of To-day." Vice-president Flickinger officiated in the absence of President Wilson. The following new members were added to the roll; Charles F. Coffin, vice-president, State Life of Indiana; Lynn B. Whitaker, Massachusetts Mutual; Wilmer Christian, the Equitable, Iowa; and Arthur C. Wells, Travelers.

Dr. Cross said in part, as follows:

"The company of to-day is judged by the character of its executive officers and its representatives in the field. The executive officers must not be unmindful of the fact that there are many agents on the firing line who are eminently qualified to become their successors in office and that they are few executive officers who could successfully fill the places of the agent and perform the duties of the agent if they were required to exchange positions.

"The field force must always have the sympathy and cordial support of the management, and the executive officer who would not be willing to walk five miles to assist a faithful and efficient agent should be impeached or court-martialed on the charge of incompetency and mustered out of service.

"The company of to-day requires executive officers and agents of lofty ideals and they should join forces to safeguard every interest of the policyholders. The agent should be prepared to safeguard the interests of the company at the risk of losing his commissions. Such men become potent factors and as they grow old and gray in the service they should be installed as members of the 'old guard' and should be protected through their renewal commissions, and if qualified, many of them will receive remunerative positions in the offices of their respective companies when they are required to retire from the firing line.

Jacksonville.

George E. Shepherd, general agent of the Home Life of New York at Jacksonville, Florida, is interested in organizing a local association at this point and at a recent meeting of the Jacksonville association plans were discussed with that object in view. Frank P. Dearing, Tracy L. Acosta and George E. Shepherd were appointed as a committee on arrangements, while Walter P. Corbett, M. D. Johnson, W. T. Lusk and R. J. Jones were appointed a committee on constitution and by-laws. O. M. Wellslager was nominated chairman and W. T. Lusk, secretary.

Kalamazoo.

"Over-taxation of life insurance companies is a tax on thrift," declared Hon. John T. Winship, Commissioner of Insurance for Michigan, in an address before the joint meeting of the Kalamazoo and Battle Creek associations, held at Gull Lake June 22.

The taxation of insurance companies having originally been intended to defray the cost of their supervision by the States, Mr. Winship pointed out that the amount now collected in a State like Michigan, for instance, exceeds the sums necessary to maintain the Department by several hundred thousands of dollars. He declared that citizens should be aroused to the fact that those who were providing for their families by life insurance were paying money in taxes for the benefit of those who were not so provident.

Mr. Winship made the principal address at this joint meeting, which was planned as a picnic and which, it is expected, will become an annual event participated in by the insurance men of Kalamazoo and Battle Creek. His remarks were commented on by National Treasurer H. Wibirt Spence, of Detroit, Mich., who is manager for the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, who said that if reforms advocated by Mr. Winship were to be brought about, the work must not be left to a few, but the life insurance men present must themselves take part in the campaign of education now being waged. He urged the local men to attend the convention of the National Association of Underwriters, to be held in Cincinnati next September.

Mr. Winship and Mr. Spence, who were largely instrumental in the organization of the local association in Battle Creek and Kalamazoo, were both elected to honorary membership in the two societies.

Kansas City.

A special committee on Conservation, Education and Publicity was appointed by the Kansas City association on Dec. 21, 1912. It consisted of W. B. Henderson, D. M. Skinner, L.

A. Ellis and C. L. Barbee. At the June meeting of the association this committee presented its report and after a discussion it was decided to lay the report on the table. The report embraced the following recommendations; that the plans of the National Committee on Education and Conservation be adopted, with the exception that agents should not be required to pay any assessment and that all voluntary contributions to the fund should be sent to the National Committee.

There was a considerable difference of opinion in the latter recommendation, several of the members advancing the idea that the general agents should be in a position to get some direct benefit from the advertising done. Ira B. Mapes, representing the Phoenix Mutual, and a former president of the local association, was elected a member of the National Executive Committee, to succeed C. C. Courtney. Delegates and alternates to the Cincinnati convention were elected.

Knoxville.

The question of perfecting a State organization of life underwriters was one of the features of the monthly meeting of the Knoxville association at a luncheon held on June 27 in the Board of Commerce rooms. It was addressed by C. C. Dabney, of Nashville; Gen. James A. Fowler, O. P. Sterling and Dr. C. P. McNabb.

Mr. Dabney reviewed the local work of life underwriters, stating that the first company was organized in 1835. He told how it had become an important factor in business. He urged the organization of underwriters for the education of the people along insurance lines. He pointed out how other bodies and professions had accomplished much by such an effort, and said this tended to build up the business of parties insured.

Mr. Dabney said he believed that should State organization be effected like the bar and medical association that life insurance and the conservation of mankind would be taught in the public schools. He asserted that it is not a question of the number of policies one can write, but the kind of risk and the aid one gives those who carry the policies.

Dr. C. P. McNabb spoke from the standpoint of a medical examiner and the relation of the examiner and the underwriter.

Gen. James A. Fowler stated that insurance is not commerce and the courts had so held. He stated that while attorney-general in the anti-trust business he had more letters about the so-called fire insurance trust than anything else, but as it is not commerce he could not bring suit.

O. P. Sterling spoke on "Insurance and Religion." He spoke of the insurance man going into the home and providing for the widow and orphans, which he said is Christian work. While writing policies and issuing checks, he said underwriters should speak to men and women about their soul's salvation.

Lansing.

The Lansing association held its June meeting at Pine Lake, where a luncheon was served at the Nemoka Hotel. Following the business meeting there was an address by Dr. Julius A. Post, who has the reputation of having made more examinations for level premium insurance companies than any physician in central Michigan. It is also reported that Dr. Post has never made an examination for an assessment or fraternal company or association.

Los Angeles.

There is a movement on foot by the legislative committee of the Los Angeles association to interview Governor Johnson to ascertain his attitude toward certain legislation desired by life insurance men. It has been decided to introduce in the next Legislature a bill against rebating. Such a measure was passed by the last Legislature, but was never signed by the Governor.

Louisville.

The June meeting of the Louisville association was held at the Patterson Hotel, the principal features of the meeting being the appointment of delegates and alternates to the Cincinnati convention and action on the education and conservation propaganda. A resolution was adopted approving of the plan as recommended by the National Committee on Education and Conservation. The following agencies sign pledges: George D. McDonald, Phoenix Mutual; W. V. Dennis & Co., Mutual Benefit; W. B. Pace & Son, Manhattan; W. H. Harrison, Fidelity Mutual; Finley-Gunther Co., Phoenix Mutual; Henry J. Powell, Equitable; Housseau & Hubbard, Union Central; Burbank & Burbank, Aetna; J. E. Williams, Mutual Life of New York, and A. L. Noe, State Mutual.

The following committee has been appointed for the purpose of securing pledges from agencies which have not as yet agreed to contribute to the fund: Henry J. Powell, of the Equitable; H. D. Rodman, of the Northwestern Mutual; George L. McDonald, of the Phoenix Mutual, and W. V. Harrison, of the Fidelity Mutual.

Lynchburg.

At the June meeting of the Lynchburg association it was decided to raise $150 for advertising purposes, as outlined by the National Committee on Education and Conservation. A standing card will be published in a Lynchburg paper containing the roster of agents who are members of the association. Should the annual cost of advertising exceed the amount derived from the assessments, the members pledge themselves to make up the difference.

Minneapolis.

The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the Minneapolis association, held on June 27: "That we endorse the advertising proposition made by the Education and Conservation Committee of the National Association, and that a committee of five be appointed by the president, two of whom are to be general agents and three special agents, to complete plans for putting same in force in Minneapolis and the territory contributory thereto and to put same into effect." A report of the committee is to be made at the next regular meeting of the association in September. The following new members were admitted: Moritz Mechelsen, special agent, Manhattan Life, and M. A. Compton, special agent, German Life.

Mississippi.

Officers for the ensuing year were elected by the Mississippi association at a recent meeting. The new officers are as follows:

President, A. C. Crowder, who succeeds E. L. Ragland; vice-president, I. E. Gunter, who succeeds A. C. Crowder in that position; secretary, Warren Pullen, who succeeds his father, W. H. Pullen, Sr.

The meeting was attended by a number of out-of-town insurance men, and a great deal of interest was manifested in the discussions of subjects that came up for consideration.

It is the intention of the officers to make the next twelve months the most successful period in the history of the association, if possible. Already plans to this end are being formulated. The association meets in Jackson once a month, and is rapidly increasing in membership.

Nebraska.

The principal subject of discussion at the June meeting of the Nebraska association was "Conserving Old Business." W. G. Preston, of the Bankers' Reserve Life, was the principal speaker. He explained that his company approved the plan of preserving reticence to policyholders concerning the thirty days' grace clause, in order to insure more prompt payment of premiums. While acknowledging there were good arguments against this plan, it was defended on the ground that thirty days' grace is a courtesy and not a privilege to be abused. It was the consensus of opinion that when policyholders fail to meet their premium payments, the best plan was to advise them that as a matter of courtesy and fair dealing they would be taken care of for a period of thirty days.

New Jersey.

Officers of the Prudential were the hosts of the New Jersey association at a meeting held on June 15 in the Prudential assembly rooms at its home office building. President Theodore F. Keer officiated and there were about fifty members present, including agents from Newark, Paterson, Passaic, Orange, Harrison, Elizabeth and other neighboring cities. An address of welcome was made by Forrest F. Dryden, president of the Prudential. Mr. Dryden was supported by Secretary Willard I. Hamilton, assistant secretaries Frederick A. C. Baker and George B. Speer, Supervisor Fred W. Tasney and managers of the Atlantic and Pacific divisions of ordinary agencies, Edward S. Andrews and Cyrus H. Lang. Among the subjects discussed were the necessity of life insurance education and insurance on the monthly income plan.

Mr. Dryden emphasized the necessity of honest methods in competition, while Secretary Hamilton, in a few brief remarks, told how life insurance was only in its infancy.

John C. Eisele, representing the Equitable, dwelt upon the monthly income policy. J. Scott Anderson, representing the Union Central of Cincinnati, expressed the appreciation of the association for the Prudential's hospitality.

Supervisor Fred W. Tansey made a plea for an increase in membership.

New York.

A cool ride down the bay, a delightful country club, tennis, baseball, bowling-on-the-green for the sedate ones, fizzes on the piazza for the hot ones, and a good dinner for everyone. Such was the announcement of the June Frolic of the New York association, and the gathering passed off with all the scheduled attractions at the Crescent Athletic Club at Bay Ridge, on the afternoon of June 30. There was an alleged game of baseball between a New England Mutual team, captained by General Agent Edward W. Allen, and a team of Provident Life & Trust men under the leadership of General Agent John S. Tunmore. Although no accurate information could be obtained, it was said that the game was in progress for seven innings and the New England Mutual team won by a score of 7 to 9. This score was naturally vigorously disputed. Following this there was a game between the uniformed teams of the home office of the Equitable and the Mutual Life. Lindeman, pitcher for the Equitable, and Pierce, pitcher for the Mutual, have an enviable reputation in this particular sphere. The Equitable team won by a score of 6 to 2. John S. Tunmore attempted to umpire the game, but relinquished the honor to Edward W. Allen. Numerous decisions of this gentleman were disputed, but in spite of the guying from the bleachers he preserved a calm demeanor. There seemed to be a general impression in some quarters that Mr. Allen's rulings on all classes of balls, except high-balls, were more or less erroneous. One admirer ventured the opinion that if all fouls were chickens, Allen's decision was good enough for him.

Dinner was held in the club dining-room at about 6:45, and R. M. Simons, second vice-president, presided in the absence of President Julian S. Myrick and First Vice-President William H. Ryan. Song sheets were distributed and popular songs were sung, the music being led by the University Glee Club, which club also sang a number of quartets. W. T. Wetmore, of the John Hancock, recited several selections in a manner which smacked of the professional, and Charles F.

Donnelly, of the Massachusetts Mutual, performed a cabaret singing stunt which brought forth much applause. John C. Dempsey, New York's well-known professional baritone, favored the gathering, and was compelled to respond to several encores. James V. Barry, assistant secretary of the Metropolitan, was called upon, and delivered a series of side-splitting jokes.

North Dakota.

Education of the public and a higher standard of field ethics was the message that Warren M. Horner, chairman of the National Education and Conservation Committee, delivered to the members of the North Dakota association on the evening of June 27. J. F. Treat acted as toastmaster in his usual capable and pleasing manner, and there were short talks by William L. Stevens, auditor of the Mutual Life, and by Eugene Fritz, president of the association. The talk of the evening, however, was by Mr. Horner, and it was a stirring and inspiring address relative to the education and conservation movement. The meeting was by far the best that the association has ever held. Officers elected were as follows: Eugene Fretz, Northwest Mutual Life Insurance Co., Grand Forks, president; F. W. Thomas, Phoe-

Editor Wilde, of the Fargo Forum, of North Dakota, was present, and gave a short and appreciative talk on the education and conservation propaganda.

Nashville.

The Nashville association held its annual election of officers last month. H. B. Alexander of the Aetna Life was re-elected president; C. C. Dabney was re-elected vice-president and R. C. Webster of the Prudential Life was elected secretary. Reau E. Folk spoke enthusiastically of the benefits accruing from the National convention and urging all members present to make plans to attend the annual convention, to be held in Cincinnati the coming September.

Central Pennsylvania.

Three new members were admitted to the Central Pennsylvania Association at its June meeting: Stanley R. Still, Jr., George M. Leicey, Walter G. Bahn. Resolutions were passed unanimously endorsing the education and conservation movement, and subscriptions were pledged by every member present on the basis as recommended by the National Committee.

Philadelphia.

The Philadelphia association expects to respond liberally to the call of the National Committee on Conservation and Education, and the publicity committee has recently sent out the following letter:

"After two years of most careful thought and preparation, boiled down—the concrete proposition now is as follows:

"Five cents per thousand on the basis of paid-for business in 1913 is asked of each agent, special agent, manager or general agent. Seventy-five per cent. of the sum contributed is to be retained by the local association for publicity purposes in our own field; twenty-five per cent. to be remitted to the National Association.

"The sum paid to the National Association is not to be considered in any sense a gratuity. The National Committee on Education and Conservation will furnish copy for uniform institutional advertisements and human interest stories, which have been approved by the executive council. This insures the same character of publicity throughout the entire country and as rapidly as the funds warrant it advertisements and stories of a national character will appear in such publications as the Saturday Evening Post, etc.

"Every live insurance man selling life insurance in this field who neglects to give his mite is going to be placed in the unfavorable position of obtaining something for nothing.

"By contributing the small sum of 5 cents per thousand on the basis of his paid-for business in 1913, he will get the most he has ever received in his life as a business investment, besides helping the service to be rendered the insuring public and their dependents by this national and local campaign of education and conservation.

"Remember, all that is asked for is 5 cents per thousand on your paid-for business of 1913, and this means that general agents should contribute on the basis of their total production and that salaried managers contribute on the basis of their personal production and in the latter instance we anticipate that every salaried manager will see that each one of his agents under contract will make his contribution.

"The fund thus contributed will be kept separate and distinct from the other funds of the association and from it payments will be made only for the specific purpose of covering the cost of this campaign.

"Other cities throughout the country have already raised sums ranging from $2,000 to $12,000. Philadelphia in all the movements for the betterment of life underwriting conditions has always been at the front. We must not now fall behind.

"We hope to get this campaign under way without any loss of time and therefore request your immediate attention and favorable action.

Yours very truly,

Portland.

The regular monthly meeting of the Oregon association was held Monday evening, June 15, at the Commercial Club, Portland, Ore. Twenty-five members were present, and D. C. Herrin presided. Herbert H. Ward was chairman of the evening.

This meeting was devoted entirely to a discussion of education and conservation campaign.

Mr. Ward gave a very clear and concise statement of the purpose of this campaign, and told what it was necessary for each life insurance agent to do in order to make the campaign a success. He stated that the benefit to be derived from such a campaign, in his estimation, will be manifold in comparison with the small outlay necessary from each man.

After a complete discussion of the matter by various members, a resolution was introduced by William Goldman, as follows:

"RESOLVED, That the Life Underwriters' Association of Oregon go on record as being in favor of and do hereby subscribe to the education and conservation campaign of the National Life Underwriters' Association, five cents (5c.) per thousand on paid-for business of 1913 by each agent and manager, and that a committee of two, Messrs. William Goldman and H. H. Ward be hereby appointed to act and to make collection from each agent and manager of his proportionate share and remit the proceeds in proper proportion to the National Association and to the Oregon association in accord with the program laid down by Chairman Wm. Horner."

This resolution carried unanimously.

Puget Sound.

At the June meeting of the Puget Sound association, a resolution was adopted pledging support to the Institutional Advertising Campaign of the National Association. Arrangements have been made to immediately take up the matter of securing pledges from the members. The program included an address by G. K. Betts, cashier of the American Trust and Savings Co., of Seattle, on "Principles of Commercial Credit," and a paper by Chas. C. Thompson, of the Metropolitan Life on "Monthly Income Insurance." Three new members were admitted: A. D. Walker, Massachusetts Mutual; Chas. S. Abbey and Mrs. Frances M. Keller.

The Puget Sound association has commenced a campaign of local advertising, and the first advertisement appeared in The Post-Intelligencer in its issue of June 22. The advertisement of the association will appear each Monday on a special page which the paper devotes to insurance and finance. Funds to meet the expense of the advertisements have been subscribed to by members of the association. The initial advertisement read as follows:

"LIFE INSURANCE TO THE FORE.

"This space has been engaged for each Monday's issue by the Puget Sound Life Underwriters' Association. Not by the companies themselves, but by the Seattle managers and agents banded together for service.

"Our object is simply to show what legal reserve insurance will do, and your advantage in securing more of its protection.

"The question is asked: 'Will a twenty-payment policy give my money back in twenty years?'

"See next Monday

"Puget Sound Life Underwriters' Association."

Rochester.

The June meeting of the Rochester association took the form of an outing. All members who had motor cars met in front of the Masonic Temple at 1:30 and took the other members to Newport House, on Irondequoit Bay. Naturally, it could not be a successful outing without a ball game, and it developed that Captain Nell's team outclassed Captain Weaver's. The second game was won by the team captained by President Withington. There was also a tug-of-war and other games, after which a fish and chicken dinner was served.

St. Louis.

As the time for the annual Convention of the National Association is rapidly drawing near, the St. Louis association is making plans to have a full quota of delegates at that meeting. Several months ago a Cincinnati club was formed with the idea of having a large delegation present, the general plan being to have all those members who expected to go to set aside a monthly sum to defray their expenses—in other words, the association went into the savings bank business for the purpose of securing for that city the Convention of the National Association for 1916. The members of the association want to meet on their home ground the members of the National Association, and want them to know that there are more people within a radius of 500 miles of St. Louis than of any other city in the country.

The able and hustling president of the association, J. M. Bloodworth, has appointed as delegates and alternates men who will be at Cincinnati, and these men will work for the good of the association and the hope of securing the 1916 Convention.

The members of the association have about finished securing subscriptions for the institutional advertising fund, and if advance information may be relied upon, St. Louis will contribute something like $6,500 to the local fund, which is five times more than the committee of the National Association asked for.

South Carolina.

"A pronounced success," was the verdict of all life insurance men who attended the annual banquet of the South Carolina association at the Jefferson Hotel, Columbia, June 12.

F. H. Hyatt, of Columbia, president, acted as toastmaster, and splendid speeches were heard from the following: Mayor Lewie A. Griffith, "Welcome to Columbia"; D. C. Heyward, former Governor and now Collector of Internal Revenue; F. H. McMaster, insurance commissioner; W. J. Roddey, Rock Hill, manager for the Equitable Life; M. M. Mattison, Anderson, manager for the Mutual Benefit Life; W. H. Hil-

Barron, attorney of Columbia, counsel for several life insurance companies. T. Moultrie Mordecai, of Charleston, counsel for the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, was an invited speaker, but he was detained at home on account of illness.

Forty-six members of the association gathered around the banquet board in the Rathskeller of the Jefferson Hotel, and the plans, as made by Carroll H. Jones, Columbia, chairman of the executive committee, and W. Smedes Hendley, Columbia, secretary-treasurer of the association, were carried out to the satisfaction of the entire membership.

M. M. Mattison, of Anderson, advanced the idea of the association offering a medal to the member of the senior class of each college in the State for the best article on the subject of life insurance. The plan was referred to the executive committee with power to act. The association was invited to Charleston for its next meeting.

New members elected include: F. S. Munsell, New York Life, Columbia; R. E. Arnette, Florida Life, Winnsboro; J. H. Bonnett, Florida Life, Norway; Wm. M. Carter, Germania, Columbia; Sam M. Syracuse.

The June meeting of the Syracuse association was held at the country residence of Frank H. Hale, of the Travelers. It commenced in the afternoon with a baseball game, which resulted in a final score of 48 to 16, and the members of the association are yet endeavoring to decide just where the 48 belongs and to which team the 16 should be awarded. After the ball game dinner was served, which was followed by a short business meeting at which delegates and alternates to the Cincinnati convention were elected.

The existing statutes are quoted in part, and it is thought that the latter will have a salutary effect, as the bankers are closely allied to life insurance transactions in their respective communities. Utah.

Thomas W. Sloan, secretary of the Guardian Casualty, was the principal speaker at the regular quarterly meeting of the Utah association, held at the Commercial Club, Salt Lake City on June 18. Mr. Sloan's remarks had to do with insurance in general, and his address was interspersed with interesting personal experiences.

West Virginia.

The regular meeting of the West Virginia association was held in Wheeling, W. Va., on June 20. The meeting was preceded by a luncheon at the McLure Grill.

This being the annual meeting of the association, the election of officers was held, resulting as follows:

Geo. C. Crook, president; J. E. O'Brien, first vice-president; H. A. Vidal, second vice-president; Geo. Baird, treasurer; Thos. S. Meek, secretary; executive committee: H. M. Taylor, F. E. Armbruster, H. M. Kimberland, Thos. B. Sweeney, C. A. Vaden, J. P. Hanley.

Thos. B. Sweeney was selected as a member of the national executive committee. Delegates and alternates to the Cincinnati convention were also elected.

Home Office, Newark, N. J.

Incorporated as a Stock Company by the State of New Jersey.

Six Shining Months

The representatives of this Company have thus far in 1914 written and placed more insurance than in any previous six months' period. Each of the six months shows a gain over its predecessor in 1913. This vigorous growth is not accidental. It comes from recognized worth,—perfect policies, low cost, great financial strength, efficient service. And our representatives are happy in their relations with the Home Office.

Occasionally we have a General Agency opening for a capable life underwriter.

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS

Entered as second class matter, Feb. 4, 1907, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

Vol. 8.

NEW YORK, AUGUST, 1914.

No. 12.

To Delegates and Alternates to the National Convention, and all Association Members

Baltimore, Md., Aug. 12, 1914.

Gentlemen:—The Twenty-fifth Annual Convention of the National Association of Life Underwriters, which will be held in Cincinnati on the 15th, 16th, and 17th of September, marks an event in the history of American Life Insurance which should be participated in by every Convention Delegate and Alternate in the United States.

It is also our desire to extend a most cordial invitation and hearty welcome to all Association members, as this is your Convention, and no investment of time or money during the year can bring to you such returns as those involved in your coming to Cincinnati on this occasion.

The program, as arranged, is unusually strong, constructive and designed to be helpful to all life underwriters, bearing directly on some of the most important problems now confronting the life insurance profession.

The social features of the Convention and entertainment, which have been so generously planned by the Cincinnati Association, will constitute a most enjoyable part of this Twenty-fifth Meeting of the greatest insurance organization in the world.

Very truly yours,

ERNEST J. CLARK,

President.

HEAVY HOTEL RESERVATIONS BEING MADE FOR THE CININNATI CONVENTION.

Several Local Associations Will Attend with Full Membership, While St. Louis Association Will Charter a Special Train—Recent Appointments of Delegates and Alternates.

Millard W. Mack, the national executive committeeman from the Cincinnati association, who is looking after hotel reservations of life underwriters who expect to attend the Twenty-fifth Annual Convention on Sept. 15, 16 and 17, is being swamped with applications for hotel accommodations. Reservations actually made up to date are far in excess of anticipations and the general convention committee of the Cincinnati association is now assured that the convention will be a huge success from the standpoint of attendance.

Reference has been made to the accessibility of Cincinnati, and this being the case, should the local associations in Ohio turn out in full force, the attendance from these associations alone would be 391. That such may be the case is intimated by replies received from the various associations located in that state. For instance, H. H. Steiner, president of the Columbus association, which has a roster of 61 members, has just written to the committee that he expects every member of his association to attend.

Also, from present indications, many other associations expect to make a special effort to send a large number of representatives. The St. Louis association expects to capture the 1916 convention and will be at Cincinnati in full force, arriving there on a special train. The same condition obtains on the Atlantic seaboard, where the Richmond association is equally determined to take the 1916 gathering to its home city.

The Big Problems.

From reports throughout the country there seems to be an unusual interest in the approaching gathering. Life underwriters are beginning to realize the far-reaching importance of the two principal problems now before the national body; the matter of taxation and the education and conservation propaganda. The interest in the two questions has been greatly stimulated by the booklet, "Taxation of Life Insurance Policyholders," written by National Vice-President Edward A. Woods. The booklet is now in its tenth edition and in a short time 100,000 copies will be in the hands of policyholders of this country. Many of the companies are ordering in quantities of 5,000 copies or more. Edward A. Woods, Jules Girardin and Warren M. Horner, of the Education and Conservation Committee of the National Association, recently held a conference at Mr. Girardin's office in Chicago and are confident that the pledges which will be secured prior to the convention will convince the life insurance fraternity of the practical value of the propaganda.

Other than the two big problems which will be discussed at the convention, the program as announced will undoubtedly prove to be most practical and helpful.

It has been decided to hold the reception on the evening of the 15th, at the Hotel Sinton.

John L. Shuff, of the Union Central, who was recently elected president of the Cincinnati association, desires to extend through LIFE ASSOCIATION NEWS a hearty invitation to the delegates and alternates who may be elected to attend the convention. Mr. Shuff suggests that as many as possible arrange to arrive on Sept. 14, as some extra courtesies have been planned for that evening.

He further states: "We also especially urge that the delegates and alternates bring their wives or their ladies with them, as our committee has made extra effort for their entertainment, and while we do not intend to make this convention exclusively social, we assure you that there are many interesting points in Cincinnati and surrounding country which we hope to have them enjoy. With a luncheon and entertainment for the ladies on Tuesday at noon, a reception and ball that night, a magnificent boat ride on the largest inland boat in the world, and a banquet on Thursday evening, we promise you our best."

President Jesse R. Clark, of the Union Central, has extended an invitation to the members of the Executive Committee, through Chairman Willet, for luncheon in the library of the Union Central Building on Sept. 14, and in the evening at 8 o'clock a reception will be held at the Home Office Building, to which all delegates, alternates and guests are invited.

Cincinnati has a great many points of interest to a visitor. Entitled to first mention is the Cincinnati Zoological Garden, ranking among the very best of its kind in the United States, if not in the world. On summer evenings the Cincinnati Zoo, with its beautiful clubhouse and concerts, is the mecca for thousands of Cincinnati's own people and visitors. The city has three principal amusement parks—Coney Island, situated about 10 miles up the Ohio River; Chester Park, in the north-central part of the city, and a lagoon across the river in Kentucky. Between Coney Island and the city is maintained a line of steamers operating in the summer season, which carry a tremendous traffic annually.

City Has Many Attractions.

Cincinnati abounds in other attractions. There is the famous Rookwood Pottery, located on the brow of Mount Adams, overlooking the city, and the Art Museum and Art Academy in Eden Park. The Rookwood Pottery, where the beautiful Rookwood ware is produced, is visited annually by a large number of people and is unique among industries of its kind. The Art Museum is the home of one of the best art collections to be found anywhere, and the Art Academy attracts students from all parts of the United States.

The city has a system of public parks and boulevards which cover 1,900 acres. The oldest part of the system is Eden Park, located at the crest of Mount Adams. Other beautiful parks are Burnet Woods, in which is located the University of Cincinnati; Lincoln Park and Washington Park, in all of which free band concerts are given.

In addition to the list of delegates and alternates published in the July number of the News is appended the following appointments, which have been reported to the office of the corresponding secretary since the last issue:

Akron.

LIFE INSURANCE COMMISSIONS FOR LIFE INSURANCE MEN ONLY.

Helperism and Part-Timeism Offer the Only Perfect Way by Which an Agent Can Secretly Rebate—The Man of Scattered Ability, the Jack-of-All-Trades Who Is Proficient in None.

By John I. D. Bristol, General Agent, Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., New York City.

Mr. Bristol delivered this address on July 20, before the Detroit association. Whether you agree or disagree with him, you must admit that Mr. Bristol is one of the few big men in Life Insurance. His agency averages over $1,000,000 monthly in paid-for business. These principles, he claims, are responsible for his success: NO REBATERS; NO BROKERS; NO HELPERS; NO PART-TIME MEN; NO SINGLE-APPLICATION-REBATE-SHIFTING RESPONSIBILITY CONTRACTS.—Editor's Note.

The chief obstacle in the way of the success of managers and general agents in the business of life insurance to-day is the long existent and rapidly growing difficulty in obtaining new men.

Let us assume that your new agent, instructed through the aid of your experience, encouraged by the recital of great life insurance records, and filled with enthusiasm for his new calling, is about to write his first application.

During the interim of his last soliciting calls, an incident occurs that is as destructive to the evolution of new agency work as it is universal in the business. The probable applicant has been approached by his bookkeeper, given full information as to commissions, and shown how a very large proportion of the first premium can be saved. Following this, the bookkeeper telephones to the general agent, to the effect that he is thinking of taking up the business of life insurance and has his first risk to place. The general agent telephones the best that he can do, and, shortening the story, with the last vibration of the telephonic diaphragm, all evidence of another wretched rebate crime has faded into nothingness.

The new agent, if of high organic quality, has made his last call. The business which tolerates, if it does not actually encourage, such practices, is not for that kind of a man. This tragedy is being universally enacted day by day. Every soliciting agent of experience has had his similar case.

A Strange Antithesis.

What a strange antithesis! The difficulty in obtaining agents and the work of instructing and encouraging them, coupled with the pandering to a universal system of helperism and part-timeism that drives the honest man from the business ere his first application is written, and retains as his future representatives of life insurance companies only those men who are willing to lend themselves to disgraceful methods. This is one of the most pronounced factors to-day in what is called the profession (!) of life insurance. There is no other calling in which such a state of things exists, or in which it would be tolerated.

As great life insurance men are rare, the making of a life insurance agency record is most attractive. The honest agent accomplishes this by study, application, energy, persistence and a daily work that broadens him out into a grander manhood.

But there is another way of making a record: By the aid of helpers, part-timers and agents-for-a-day; and, with every record so made, there is a long drawn out and hidden abnormality of stolen business, rebates and a belittling of manhood.

Do away with helperism and part-timeism, and in the place of fictitious records, with disastrous results, you help the makers of real records to inscribe their names upon a spotless roll of life insurance success!

I knew of an agent who had 400 helpers in one city. For several years he was the only agent of his company in that locality. Nearly every case worked up by a new agent would be caught by one of these 400 helper-spies. Every probable applicant might well have re-echoed the words of Provost, in Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure":

"Who in his office lacks a helper!"

And this agent, when his record fell low, might, with La Pucelle, in "King Henry VI.," have made this frantic appeal:

"You seedy helpers, that are substitutes, Appear and aid me!"

I knew a vice-president of a very prominent company, who became general agent for New York City. His common method of soliciting was to appoint one partner in a firm as an agent for the insuring of the other partners. No doubt all commissions in these cases were partnership profits, and any business in that house was barred to the regular agent for all the future.

This general agent had a successor who wrote beautiful letters to the lawyers of New York City, telling them that the English custom was for the legal solicitor to attend to insurance matters pertaining to the family, and that he desired to introduce the custom into this country.

Ingenious but Disreputable.

There are about 12,500 lawyers in the city of New York. Whether an agency license was obtained for each and every one of them, I do not know. I do know, however, that large insurers sometimes say to the real agent, when a new policy is tendered for collection: "I shall refer this document to my attorney for approval, and if he says it is all right, I shall send you a check." In this way there occurred opportunities for these attorneys to obtain their first life insurance cases—stealing policies from the regular agents, through a new phase of part-timeism that was as ingenious as it was disreputable.

The real agent is ambitious to become an expert, and by expert knowledge of the business he obtains his applications. Is it not strange that part-time men, with less life insurance knowledge, less life insurance education, less life insurance dignity, less life insurance integrity, less life insurance ability, and less life insurance conscience, can frequently secure business in competition with the regular agent, gifted with all of these requisites, possessing a magnificent reputation, and endowed with years of life insurance experience? There is but one explanation: Rebate! And rebating will last just so long as part-timeism and helperism continue. It will cease when life insurance commissions are paid to life insurance men only!

Self-discrimination.

The retention of business in force, the preparing of assignment papers, and advice as to plans, are all matters that pertain to the work of the regular agent and consume much of his time. His commissions are his only compensation. With all of these phases of the business, the part-timer has naught to do, yet he is paid the same commissions. Real life insurance agents who favor part-timeism are thus discriminating against themselves.

The general agent who desires a low lapse ratio should confine his business to agents devoting their entire time, talent and attention to the interests of his general agency. Part-timers would make but a sorry showing in arguments to continue business in force. Most of them would advocate the lapse, in order to obtain a new policy, on another plan and in a different company.

The general agent and manager who favors part-timeism, helperism and brokerage must reconcile the fact of the higher mortality accruing from these methods of work. Company statistics show a smaller mortality from the regular agents, a larger mortality from part-time men, and an excessive mortality from brokerage business. There is a natural mortality selection in all of this, as there is in plans of life insurance, as well as a natural moral selection in the character of agency methods.

The broker peddles his impaired risks, hiding impairment as much as possible, until some company is found to accept; the part-time agent is too little interested in the ethics of the business—unlike the real agent—to decline a risk personally; and the helper, the agent-for-a-day, is sometimes the private secretary of a wealthy degenerate. His knowledge of the physical condition and habits of his applicant is often greater than that of the family physician. This secretary knows just how to write the application in such a way that acceptance is possible.

The mortality under the larger policies is greater. The reverse should be the case, for reasons that will be apparent to the life insurance expert. The greater mortality under large policies is in perfect harmony with the abnormality of part-timeism in general; and thus, aside from the enormous loss and discouragement to the regular agents, there is the increased cost to policyholders from this excessive mortality, for which life insurance men who foster and encourage part-timeism are wholly responsible.

Always Associated with Rebating.

Part-timeism and helperism are in line with the high pressure system of obtaining business that ended with the Armstrong investigating committee. Nothing could be considered as an obstacle in the way of obtaining an application by some companies, during that disastrous period of American life insurance. Part-time interference was closely allied with all that was reprehensible in those days; and it remains the most deplorable factor in the business to-day, associated as it is—and always was—with rebate.

Helperism and part-timeism offer the only perfect way by which an agent can secretly rebate. Any penalty for rebating can be evaded, by the agent appointing a rebating part-timer to write one application. Should the rebate become known, his contract is very promptly canceled, but as the work of this agent-for-a-day has been accomplished, there is no punishment, and none was contemplated by the agent appointing him. The agent who thus evades the penalty and disgrace of rebating is then ready for the appointment of another bookkeeper, cashier, floorwalker, entry clerk, janitor, elevator man, porter, proprietor of a bootblack stand, fire insurance man, real estate agent, plate glass agent, or even a barber.

Part-timeism is a competitive factor that few real agents can withstand. An agent knowing that his manager will accept part-time business is ever at the mercy of part-timers; and men engaged in other lines of business and looking upon the one or two applications that they may be instrumental in diverting to wrong channels, will deal with the manager and the general agent, if his agents will not deal with them.

The Danger.

The secretly appointed helper and part-timer who, in his capacity of bookkeeper, floorwalker, entry clerk or elevator man, watches the approach of the real agent, interferes with his work, and reports his probable applicant to some agent or general agent with whom he has made a compensating arrangement for this spying work, is naturally of a low order of mentality, and totally unfit to be the representative of any life insurance company.

The helper-part-time-life-insurance-spy is a life insurance rebater. The two go hand in hand. Is it not plain that everything undesirable in life insurance agency work is found in part-timeism and helperism, and that all of the elevating factors, without exception, are associated with the regular agent, who devotes his whole time and attention to the business and has no other calling?

Part-timeism is the great detriment to the diffusion of life insurance knowledge, the curber of agency progress, and is eventually, if unchecked, to ruin utterly the little that now remains of the opportunity for real life insurance agency accomplishment.

Managers and general agents have said to me: "If I had a large agency, I might try this brave and independent no-part-time method of obtaining business; but I am just starting my general agency, and I must accept such applications as are tendered."

To this I reply: "Your general agency will always be 'just starting,' if you accept brokerage, helper or part-time business. Your only course is to commence with one protected agent, if you can obtain no more. Such an agent is sure to add, in time, to your agency force. Without absolute agency protection the success of a general agency is impossible, and with part-timeism and helperism, that protection is entirely without the pale of acquirement."

Figures Which Talk.

The history of the New York City General Agency of the Northwestern is complete and ample proof of these assertions. Its paid-for business, even in this year of financial uncertainties, averages over $1,000,000 a month. It has about $160,000,000 of insurance in force. It mails over 32,000 premium notices annually. The response to these is an annual premium income of nearly $5,000,000. Its average policy is nearly $6,000. In that general agency everything pertaining to rebating was killed years ago. The agency confidence, harmony and good feeling among its business representatives all writing an unusually large amount of insurance, bespeak the life insurance brotherhood of man. Of the hundreds of experiments and the millions of dollars expended in New York City, in efforts to establish general agencies, it is the one conspicuous success—and to what can all of this be attributed?

To the company it represents? Yes, in a measure; but you know, every life insurance man "has the best company." To its manager? Well, perhaps, in a little measure. But let me give you the real reason of the brilliant success of that great general agency:

AGENCY PROTECTION.

No Rebates.

No Brokers.

No Helpers.

No Part-time Men.

No Single-Application-Rebate-Shifting-Responsibility Contracts.

All Commissions of Rebating or Brokerage Agents Forfeited to the Anti-Rebate Fund of the General Agency.

There is no time like the present! What better time could there be for making Detroit the pioneer city in this grand movement? A combination of general agencies, a small advertising fund contributed in proportion to last year's business, and a brief advertising statement that on and after Sept. 1 next no application could be written except by a duly authorized life insurance agent, engaged in no other line of business, and that this was done in the interest and for the protection of policyholders, would result in an enormous increase in your business, and the bringing to Detroit of many a good life insurance agent who is now looking for fair treatment and honest methods.

Not a Profession.

With part-timeism, life insurance must ever remain outside the domain of a real business calling. With life insurance commissions paid to life insurance men only, it would become the grandest profession to which the mind of man could be applied.

I hear some part-time advocate exclaim: "With the difficulty in obtaining new men, should we not allow our newcomers to retain their positions in other callings, and do a life insurance business on the side, until they become strong enough to work life insurance alone?" These objectors tell me of Lindsay, of Buffalo, and Knight, of New York, who began in that way and now rank among the great life insurance men of the country.

Well, there are exceptions to all rules, barring one: The rule of Life Insurance Commissions for Life Insurance Men Only! Had Lindsay and Knight been kept out of the business by this rule, we would have lost Lindsay and Knight, but the bane of perhaps 100,000 helpers and part-timers would not have been ours to contend with to-day!

In this connection, we must not overlook the case of one of our leading men, who hesitated some years ago about giving up an income of $1,300 a year for the purpose of becoming a whole-timer, and whose paid-for business in our general agency has averaged for several years past about $700,000 annually. Had this man continued as a part-timer, we would never have been heard of as a conspicuously successful life insurance man; and there are hundreds of similar cases.

A Jack-of-All-Trades.

The part-time man, when gifted, is a man of scattered ability, a jack-of-all-trades, proficient in none. When not gifted, part-timeism fits him. Part-timeism, by scattering the energies and productiveness of men, is like a charge of shot compared with the one-energy, one-ambition ball that, aimed at the target of endeavor, so frequently scores in the very center of the bull's-eye of success.

And right here let it be universally admitted, that so long as part-timeism is a factor in the business as it is to-day, the general agent and manager who advises as he would wish to be advised, should be careful indeed of any admonition that would induce the giving up of a salary of consequence, earned in any other calling, for a new business whose commission compensation is so scattered about the country that it strikes every occupation, with hardly an exception.

And now, as to the frequently heard assertion that the payment of life insurance commissions to life insurance men only might do for the cities and larger towns, while part-timeism and helperism are a necessity for country districts: so far as the hamlets and little towns are concerned, we all know that there is hardly one of them that is not so far, after all, from some city of ample size to support agency work, and that the little places can be easily visited in nearly all cases from the larger places.

Some general agents have tried the experiment of no part-timeism in their city districts, but have left the outlying districts free to part-timeism; and in some of these cases we have heard of the larger risks being run to the smaller places or rebate-part-time-helperism purposes. It will not do! Part-timeism must be abolished altogether.

Then, again, in these little places the incomes run low. The minister is satisfied with a much smaller salary; the incomes of the doctor and the lawyer are not in any way large; and all of this is closely associated with the feasibility of placing some likely and ambitious young man on a partial salary and commission basis for two or three months, in order that he may devote his entire time, talent and attention to the active solicitation of applications.

A Plan Suggested.

General agents, these days, must have capital to run their business successfully. It would take but little of this, however, to obtain a complete list of every probable insurant in his young man's territory. These parties could be worked up by soliciting letters and circulars from the general agency office, with a visit now and then from an educated special, to close the business, until the new agent, having obtained his start, is upon a purely commission basis of success.

How much better in every way this plan than the rare application from some justice of the peace, real estate or fire insurance agent! The latter plan is not at all feasible, and for this reason there is but little life insurance written in the smaller places, as compared with the cities. To adopt the true and preferable plan, it would be necessary to abolish wholly all part-timeism and helperism, for even with two or three spies in every hamlet, who write no business but who are ever ready to interfere with the work of a new agent, a real cultivation of country fields is impossible.

The value of calls and interviews by the real agent is readily ascertainable. It is a matter of simple statistics. Each agent has but to divide the number of calls annually with his total realized yearly commissions, to ascertain just what each call is worth, on the average—whether or not an application is secured, or even if the party called upon is not seen.

The number of calls is thus a sure indication of the agent's income; and if, with the varying personality and mental force of the agent, his calls average $3, $4 or $5 each in first year's commissions during the year, he can readily ascertain his income-producing power. Most agents can easily increase from 50 to 100 per cent. the number of calls—which lead to interviews, interviews to applications, and applications to commissions.

The part-time man makes no stated number of calls day by day. He does not get his business that way. He does secure some business from the calls and interviews made by the real agent.

Part-timeism is, therefore, reducing the value of every call the real life insurance agent makes; is cutting down the value of every interview that the real agent secures; and, in the end, is lowering the income of every real life insurance man in this country.

The Protective Principle.

There arises from the protective principle underlying and associated with all lines of business or professional endeavor, a pronounced factor of co-operation to the one best end. Even where competition is so strongly marked that a survival of the fittest results, this feeling of co-operation rises even higher, for in the end the strongest competitor is he who is best in all things pertaining to the grander evolution of the business followed.

In accord with this great law, there are no questionable methods underlying the work of bankers or business men. In life insurance it is entirely different. We know that real agents and part-timers cannot in any sense co-operate. Their methods widely differ. They look with entirely divergent views upon the business: The real agent, as the source whence his living is derived; the part-timer, as a means of some commissions now and then.

With the payment of life insurance commissions to life insurance men only, the great principle of co-operation would evolve at its best, resulting in the sure and speedy growth of a profession to which the highest mentality of men could well be unswervingly devoted.

The present-day need of life insurance is ability. In all other lines this is abundant. The brain needs of the great banking and mercantile interests, of science and invention, of the legal and other professions, have all shown a wonderful mental development of accomplishment.

Present Restrictions.

Life insurance ability alone is retarded, hampered and restricted. It is no uncommon thing for prominent lawyers and men in other callings to be in receipt of incomes ten times greater than those of leading life insurance managers.

Whence comes these hampering restrictions? How originated the feeling among officers of companies, that agents must not be taken too seriously? Whence comes the shortsightedness of life insurance men in general? How came the saying of one of the most noted presidents of a great New York company, in reference to agents: "We use them like lemons—get what we can out of them, and throw them away!"

Why all of this? Simply for the reason that life insurance men have belittle themselves, have thrown away their dignity, and in the end have rendered themselves unrespected and powerless, by giving part-timers, helpers and brokers a controlling interest in their business! Just so long as part-timeism enrolls all comers on the life insurance scroll, just so long will there exist a bar to real life insurance evolution. The life insurance field, which should be the great school of American life insurance development, will, owing to the bar of part-timeism, present in the future but few candidates of expertness to fill actuarial and home office managing positions.

Excluding industrial business, there was issued in 1913 in the great State of New York $293,582,855 of life insurance—the work of 26,251 agents, as shown by the number of agency licenses. We are officially informed that these licenses were issued only to men engaged wholly in the business of life insurance and such part-timers as intended ultimately to engage exclusively in it.

Notwithstanding this apparent barrier to a wholesale part-timeism, the average paid-for insurance of each of the 26,251 New York State agents was but $11,184. Deducting from the total the paid-for insurance written in our own general agency and by the other agents of record throughout the State, it will readily be seen that possibly 24,000 of the remaining agents did not average $5,000 of paid-for insurance in 1913. The $85 of commissions, on the average, that each of these men received, may legally constitute an agency—but it falls far short of doing so morally, when only the best in the business is considered. Can life insurance be termed a profession, when its professors receive an income of but $85 a year?

Investigating Conditions.

It would be interesting for each of you gentlemen to investigate the record of your own company for last year. Ascertain the number of authorized agents, the total insurance paid for, the average amount for each agent, and then, deducting the amount written by the real agents, strike an average for the balance. You will find a much worse condition of things than exists in the Empire State to-day—deplorable as that is.

The power of salesmanship is innate. It is akin to greatness. Mercantile prominence all over the earth is due to it, when associated with the factor of protection. To illustrate:

An agent is introducing a new brand of whiskey. He goes to the cities, towns, villages, hamlets and the cross-roads, presents his samples, states his prices and is absolute monarch of the situation. A whiskey seller—yet he is clothed with the decency and dignity of protected salesmanship. The justice of the peace above the store, the blacksmith in the little shop across the street under the shade of the “spreading chestnut tree,” the shoemaker, the fire insurance agent, or the bookkeeper, cannot interfere with his business, undersell him, or tell him that he controls that sale; and it makes no difference whether it is a whiskey salesman who is receiving a commission of 5 per cent. or 7½ per cent., or a book agent who is receiving a commission of 60 per cent.—the same holds true. Without that agency protection there would be no whiskey salesmen or book agents. Through this wonderful power of protected salesmanship some of the greatest names in the annals of America have achieved their eminence. Mark Twain was a salesman, an agent, a book agent, when he commenced his career. Longfellow sold books by subscription, and General Grant was a salesman canvassing for Irving's Columbus. Had the justice of the peace, the real estate agent, the fire insurance agent, or the head of some large bootblack stand interfered with the development of that innate greatness, the faces of the nations of the earth might not have been wreathed in smiles by the writings of Twain; the victories of Grant might not have been won; and Longfellow might not have written his “Hymn to the Night” or “The Tales of a Wayside Inn.”

Great Salesmen.

Jay Gould starting in life was a salesman, an agent, a canvasser. James G. Blaine began his career as an agent for a “Life of Henry Clay.” Bismarck, when in Heidelberg, canvassed for one of Blumenbach's handbooks. Had all the early efforts of these great men been interrupted, had they been stopped in the path of salesmanship to greatness, would Jay Gould have become a financial power, would James G. Blaine have become the idol of a great political party, and would Bismarck have shaped the destinies of the German Empire in its greatest era of progress in the arts and sciences? Daniel Webster was a salesman, an agent. He paid his second term's tuition at Dartmouth by selling “De Tocqueville's History of America.” George Washington—

“One of the few, the immortal names,
That were not born to die—”

when a young man was a salesman, an agent, for a work entitled “Blydell's American Savage.” Napoleon, when poor lieutenant, took the agency for a work entitled “L'histoire de la Revolution,” and in the Palace of the Louvre can be seen to-day the great Emperor's canvassing outfit. Near it is the long list of subscribers he secured. Had the justice of the peace, the fire insurance agent, the real estate agent, and all the rest of the part-timers interfered with the salesmanship efforts of these men, could we have said that such and such a man is a “Napoleon of life insurance”? And is it too much of a stretch of imagination to think that if Washington had failed, the Union Jack of old England might have been over us to-day, and Joseph Rodman Drake might never have written:

“When Freedom from her mountain height,
Unfurled her standard to the air,
She tore the azure robe of night
And set the stars of glory there.”

And Daniel Webster! Had he been thwarted or hindered by these part-timers, do you suppose there would have been recorded upon the pages of American literature that wonderful, that sublime utterance, “Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable”?

A Strong Plea.

To tell the men gathered about this board of the magnitude of life insurance; of its power of accomplishment in the evolution of the race which is dependent upon education, home comforts and a general freedom from poverty; of the dignity that should clothe the life insurance expert in his calling; and of a hundred other factors that should place the business in rank above all others, and render it, indeed, a profession—all of this is not necessary with this assembly. But, knowing the business as you do, will you not use your utmost endeavors from now on to put this calling that you consider so great and esteem so highly, on a par with agency protection with the selling of whiskey, whose salesmen know no part-timers as their competitors and no help as spies upon their work?

Five years ago a vice-president of a great New York company told me that helpers were indispensable to success. To-day that company is accepting business from its own agents only, engaged in no other occupation! Here and there throughout this great country of ours, general agencies are adopting agency protection and eliminating part-timeism. We have yet to hear any expression of regret over the adoption of these purifying methods. Very frequently a letter comes to me from some progressive life insurance man with whom I am not personally acquainted, expressing hearty concurrence in the newer and purer lines of agency work that the business so much demands.

The new star of agency protection that has taken its place in the sky of agency endeavor is never to set. It has ceased to twinkle with the feebleness of novelty. It blazes out the full effulgence of an ascertained truth. It is the star of wise life insurance men to follow:

Star of the East! Thy gleaming shield,
The Helper dreads to see;
The Rebater can no weapon wield
To blur thy brilliancy.

The Expert lives no more in dread
Of spies upon his way;
Thy light insures his daily bread
From Rebate's criminal sway.

The Broker, sly, the Part-Time Spy,
The floor-walker and the clerk,
Have ceased to be the enemies
That mar the Expert's work.

All hail to thee, O gleaming star!
We greet thy peaceful rays!
A United Brotherhood we are
Who sing thy merited praise.

In Progression's skies we see thee rise,
O Star of Strength and Might!
And in thy rays our energies
Arise to Grandeur's height.

Life Insurance and Character.

To imagine a modern community without life insurance is startling as to imagine the community without bread. Life could be tolerable under such conditions, but it would not be the normal life that civilized men know. Proper insurance is an essential provision for every man, whether for the protection of the family he shall leave behind him or for the comfort of his own declining years, when earning power shall have diminished.

A life insurance company well organized and rightly administered stands really in the foremost rank of organizations for social service. For true social service aids men to make the best use of their possessions, enabling them to work more efficiently and spend more wisely. He who has made proper provision for the future of those dependent upon him for support is a far better citizen than he who neglects this obvious duty. Many employers, recognizing the stability and reliability that is evidenced by life insurance, make special efforts to see that their employes carry policies proportionate to their earnings.—Harper's Weekly.

Persistence Pays.

Stick to your policy contract. Life insurance has and is showering blessings upon thousands of people, many of whom would otherwise be left without the comforts, and some without the necessities of life. Stand by your company. When the "twisting agent," in search of a commission for himself, advises you to drop your contract and take one in his company—turn him down. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred you gain nothing and pay the cost of insuring twice. If tempted by the gossip or attacks of competitors or others to withdraw from your company, your duty to yourself and to your company demands that, before accepting the word of outsiders, you give your own officers a chance to correct any misstatements or misinformation which may have reached you.

In case of doubt, write the home office. But, above all, stand by your company and its representatives. The future comfort and welfare of thousands of women and children and aged people depend upon your loyalty and persistency of purpose.

And should you be tempted by a temporary shortage of funds to drop your contract, remember that it is easier for you to borrow money now than it will be for your wife and children to do so when you are not here.—The Human Factor.

The Value of an Idea.

Once in a while a fellow gets a brilliant idea—a novel talking point—a new form of expression—a clever illustration, and it impresses him (and perhaps a couple of prospects) as remarkably good selling talk. But does it act on the will? When the Greeks heard Socrates speak they went away exclaiming, "What a splendid orator!" When they heard Demosthenes they cried out, "Let us go and fight against Philip." The Federal-Chicago.

HOW I WROTE $600,000 DURING 1913.

The Secret of Immediate, Constant and Increasing Success Found in an Everlasting Adherence to Fundamentals—Action and a Clear Presentation of Your Proposition the Essential Elements.

By Eugene B. Stinde, Special Agent, Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., St. Louis, Mo.

Seldom indeed is it our good fortune to publish such an article as this; its value is beyond question. Mr. Stinde answers this question, "How am I to succeed in more than a mediocre way when I am neither able nor brilliant? His answer is the strongest, sanest and most practical that has ever come to our attention.—Editor's Note.

I have been asked to tell you how I wrote $600,000 during 1913. I am glad to tell you the reasons to which I attribute these results, because—

My methods are those which anyone can use.

No special genius or aptitude is required.

Were I a brilliant man, or a brainy man, or exceptionally tactful, or endowed with an intuitive gift for generalship, or with a deep knowledge of human nature, it is exceedingly doubtful, even though I discoursed to you ad infinitum and with the "tongues of men and angels," whether I could impart the secret of my methods.

For these latter qualities are either outright gifts of nature, incommunicable by rule or precept, or they are latent faculties that require years of training for their development.

Now what success I have had I attribute to using the same powers that everyone possesses in full measure—powers that need no development in order to reach their highest degree of success.

Two Great Powers.

These powers are just two in number, viz.: The power of truth and the power of action.

When I first took up the sale of life insurance six years ago I had heard much of the strategy, generalship, tact, wide acquaintance, popularity, ingenuity, finesse, scientific methods, etc., that are necessary to the successful life insurance salesman. And I said to myself: "How am I to succeed in more than a mediocre way when I am neither able nor brilliant?"

But it occurred to me that "The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong."

I was able to recall brilliant and brainy friends who had not really "made good," while, on the other hand, I knew many a plain man of ordinary personality and monosyllabic talk who succeeded in a big way.

"Why is this?" I asked myself.

Soon I came to the following conclusion, which I have since had no reason to alter. It is this: I believe that the secret of immediate, constant and increasing success in any line of salesmanship is, everlasting adherence to fundamentals. By these fundamentals I mean action, and the clear presentation of your proposition. No matter to what extent you utilize the other innumerable factors which the science of sales efficiency progressively reveals by analysis, you can merely increase the efficiency of the fundamentals, but you can never accomplish anything without these fundamentals.

Therefore I decided to see all the prospects I could and to see that they understood clearly the advantages of my proposition. I knew that if I did not see them, or, seeing them, I did not make them appreciate what it means to them to buy life insurance and, by contrast, what it means to them and theirs to be without this protection, I would not do business, no matter how much I knew nor how able I might be.

Emerson and St. John, gentlemen, were no impractical visionaries when the first said, "Pleads for itself the fact, as unrepenting Nature leaves her every act," and when the latter declared in effect that the word is power.

I am plain-spoken; I am in dead earnest; I never get away from fundamentals; I am not embarrassed by complexities; I state the undeniable, incontrovertible, self-evident facts, and rest my case on them, knowing that they will bear fruit in due season.

In this day of infinite maneuvering and jockeying, the most original method of approach in the selling of life insurance is the plain presentation of the merits of the proposition. Too many agents are apt to act on the assumption that the prospect does not want life insurance.

Now any prospect who should buy life insurance wants it; but as a rule does not know he wants it until the agents shows him.

James Campbell, of St. Louis, simplified the matter by getting right down to fundamentals when he said years ago in an article to young business men that "When a man clearly understands a good proposition he becomes anxious to invest."

So I say from my experience and observation: "Let us clearly present the superior advantages of our proposition to as many likely prospects as we can," and to do so with absolute confidence that the truth "is mighty and will surely prevail."

By action I mean not only during business hours, but on what might be called "opportune occasions." Such, for instance, as some good business that I wrote when on an outing of the Business Men's League. We had a hurry-up campaign for new members. I was assigned with two other men to go over to East St. Louis and solicit members. On the way over I wrote both of these men a policy, and on the way back I wrote the chauffeur.

A live agent can sell insurance, or pave the way, at a restaurant table, on a street car, or on any occasion where he is brought into contact with a possible prospect.

By action I mean a full day's work and then some, not calling four hours a day's work. By action I mean mental as well as physical. By action I mean utilizing any source of action, such as making one policy sell another. As, for instance, when I have written a personal policy on a man whose existence is valuable to his company or corporation, I make it a point to suggest that the latter take advantage of the examination and buy a business policy. A great deal of business insurance can be written in this way.

I also make it a point, when I write a policy, to deliver it in person. This not only shows my continued interest in the insured, but gives me the opportunity to ascertain other facts that will have a bearing upon getting more business per customer, or more customers.

I have been able to get more efficient action—mentally as well as physically—by wasting neither time nor talk in "kicking" or "bragging" either to myself or others.

One is apt to indulge in pleasant retrospection over past triumphs, but it saves time and increases results when we learn to write a man and then go after the next man without any interim of prolonged self-congratulation. While we are shaking hands with ourselves we might rather be shaking the ink down into a fountain pen preparatory to getting a new name on the dotted line.

Time and energy can also be most lavishly and completely wasted by creating mountain ranges out of mole mounds. I refer to such things as letting rejections bother you; or allowing a temporary lull in results to dampen your ardor; or fretting about any of the numerous tares that exist in perfectly good wheat and all other things mundane. Difficulties exist to be overcome; nothing here below is without its faults; but they all vanish before the magic of courageous, determined action, and by the same token, multiply only in a state of inertia.

Let me say a few words about the fruits of success that grow on the tree called "Loyalty." Loyalty is usually looked at from the viewpoint of duty—duty toward the company, its officers, policies, etc.

And so it is—a matter of high duty that we owe the company from which we derive our livelihood. But I assert that real, whole-hearted, deep-founded loyalty, is based not only upon a sense of duty, but upon a real regard—even love—for the big institution that is doing such magnificent work in the world—a loyalty founded and grounded upon a full realization of the preponderating good in our great organization. Such a loyalty becomes love, and this love is an inspiration, pride, a faith, that drives one over the little difficulties with which all paths are beset. It communicates itself to the prospective buyer and shows finally, visibly and for all time in the fruits of "business written."

Let us be loyal in the fullest, highest meaning of the word; let us talk loyalty, think loyalty, act loyalty. Let our criticism be constructive and optimistic, when we must criticize. We cannot be really successful selling a policy we do not believe in, for a company we do not like. It is the spirit that makes us alive; and the essence of spirit is whole-heartedness in your loyalty. "Let your eye be single and your body shall be full of light."

May I venture to say here that I believe spiritual qualities—moral qualities—take precedence in importance over mental and physical qualities? This can be proven in a scientific way, by eliminating or reducing them in any given case, and noting the results. When we say a man has "lost his grip," or his "nerve," we do not mean that he knows less than formerly, but that certain spiritual elements are lacking, proving that they are fundamentally essential to success, and that knowledge is not power without them. Hope, faith, love—these are surely the life and light of the world—the mainsprings of effective action. To eliminate or diminish them in the human heart shows in diminished results—and "by their fruit ye shall know them."

One thing loyalty has done for me—it has canceled the power of rejections to bother me. I have come to believe that the company knows best; that its examiners know more than I do about what constitutes a good risk; and that all of the company's rules and regulations on this score are right and for the best interests of all concerned.

I know that the company wants the business just as much as I do, if it can be obtained on a safe basis; and it would not only be disloyal, but downright dishonest for me to want to do business on any other terms.

In many cases I have been more surprised at acceptance than at rejections. I have had some pretty big applications refused, but common sense shouted that it was bad enough to lose the business without allowing it to militate against the prospects of my writing other applications. So I say to you: Dismiss rejections, objections and dejection from your mind, and "Act—act in the living present, heart within and God overhead."

I want to say that I believe in scientific salesmanship and in the splendid results often obtained by applying the principles of sales efficiency. But it is my function to exemplify and insist upon the fundamentals first and last, and the necessity of adhering to them while we are increasing our efficiency by developing the finer points.

You asked me to tell you how I wrote $600,000 in 1913, and this I have tried to do to the best of my ability, telling it in a way that may be helpful to others who have more ability than I, but less action and perhaps less confidence in the power of plain facts. For my own sake I would much rather have been asked to speak on "Why I did not write $1,000,000 in 1913."

We can all of us ask ourselves why we did not write more business in 1913, and the results of such self-examination will be helpful. I believe that in nearly all cases the most serious deficiency would show either a lack of maximum action in seeing prospects, or a lack of maximum action (mental and spiritual, as shown in the spoken word) when seeing them. In short, do we see as many prospects as we really can be plain plugging, and do we do our utmost at each and every interview? How many can measure up to this standard?

Toward the goal of our maximum capacities let us press with high determination doing the best that in us lies, learning from one another's experiences and applying what we learn.

As for the lessons of my own experience, I sum them up in the two simple words, "Act" and "Faith"—easily remembered, demonstrably resultful.

To the Members Executive Committee of the National Association, and Officers and Members of Local Associations.

August 6, 1914.

Gentlemen:—

According to direct advice received and information published in journals, a majority of the Local Associations have passed resolutions adopting the plan of the Education and Conservation movement as promulgated by the Executive Committee in New York at its Mid-Yearly Meeting in April last, and are collecting funds therefor.

It is not possible for the Education and Conservation Committee to make an intelligent report of actual conditions without each Local Association, through its National Executive Committeeman or secretary or local education and conservation committee chairman, reports officially as to its action and the amount of funds raised, and balance expected.

Will each Local Association therefore please make a definite report now if possible, otherwise immediately after its September meeting where the meeting is held in September before the Convention?

It is especially important that education and conservation committees, or other Local Association members, report all information with regard to educational work, as lectures before universities or public bodies which have been, or will be, given during the coming year.

Yours truly,

W. M. HORNER,

Chairman Committee on Education and Conservation.

E. J. Clark, President,

National Association of Life Underwriters.

SELF-INVENTORYING.

Checking Up Your Mental Stock: Disposition, Temperament, Tact, Zeal, Energy, Stick-to-Itiveness—Many Surprises in Store from an Analysis of Debits and Credits.

By C. A. Atkinson, Vice-President and General Counsel, Federal Life Insurance Company, Chicago, Ill.

While excessive introspection is generally disconcerting, one should occasionally take account of personal deficiencies, then, as Mr. Atkinson says, "Burn the rubbish, clear away the cobwebs, banish the mistakes and cast away all doubts." This is a good suggestion, but as you read the following article you will find much else that will interest, inspire and stimulate.—Editor's Note.

The world "do" move. You are a part of the world; do you move?

Have you ever taken an inventory of SELF; not of your cattle, hogs, farm implements, household goods, but of SELF? Have you ever inventoried your mentality—your disposition—temperament—tact—zeal—energy—stick-to-it-iveness?

If you have not, it might be wisdom on your part to take a stroll some day soon, get by your lonesome and do so. When you make out this inventory be fair and square with yourself—no cheating—no false valuations. You will probably find on the debit side of the account the largest item will be "mistakes." As you are a human being, of course you have made mistakes—some large—some small. No doubt you are still totting a large number of these mistakes or blunders. You are carrying them around as though they were valuable assets. Every day you take a look at them—become discouraged. They are burdens on your "gray matter"—on your energy—your cheerfulness—your effectiveness—your success. Yet—you hold on to them.

Instead of learning from your mistakes and then burying them so deep they can never be resurrected, you cling to them, allowing yourself to be cheated out of doing your best. Shakespeare said:

"To mourn a mistake that is past and gone
Is the next way to draw new mischief on."

The Debit Side.

On the debit side of the inventory is there doubt as to whether or not the policy contracts of your company are as fair and liberal as those of any other company?

On the debit side is there some question in your mind as to whether or not your company treats its policyholders as fairly and equitably as other companies?

If you have any such doubts, it is your duty at once to take steps for their elimination. No man should represent a company who does not believe firmly in the fairness and liberality of its policies—who does not have the utmost faith in its dealing justly and equitably with its policyholders and their beneficiaries—in the efficiency and honesty of its management.

Another grave mistake many times is want of confidence in self.

Grant said he was going "to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer." He had no more doubt of ultimate success than he had of his existence. Have this same sort of belief in yourself—in your ability to win—in your getting the names on the "dotted lines."

By this confidence in self is not meant a dudish egotism—vanity—smart-alexisism. There is meant a confidence based on the fact that you have some brains—some education—some energy—some tact—some knowledge of men and a fixed purpose to win out.

Another large item on the debit side is "failure to work."

When taking this inventory, figure out how many hours you have actually worked during the past thirty days. By this is not meant the time you think you were working but the hours you worked—really and truly. It is quite likely you will be surprised at the small number of hours you were engaged in actual work.

Some men work hard enough but fail of success. Their work is haphazard—"catch-as-catch-can"—no system—energy wasted—working when and where failure must result—neglecting to work when and where success must result.

Hard, systematic, intelligent work becomes a source of pleasure because it brings profit and is the doing of things worth while.

Studying the Campaign.

Successful generals win battles by studying and planning before the battle begins. The campaign is carefully thought out before it is begun. The enemy's strong and weak points are diligently considered and how to meet the strong and take advantage of the weak spots. Some details may have to be changed or modified as the campaign progresses, but ever there is the following of the intelligent, systematic and predetermined plans.

In the insurance field is the competitor to meet and overcome. The thought of how to do this and the doing it ought to stimulate all the mentality and stir the ambition. Then the objections and excuses of the prospect must be met and overcome. Here also ought to be found the revivifying of energies—the bringing into use the predetermined plan of campaign—the grit that will not admit failure—the tact that pierces the armor of opposition and the zeal that never grows tired.

Franklin said:

"Dost thou love Life? Then do not squander Time, for that is the stuff Life is made of."

Often Time is squandered.

When you have completed the inventory, burn the rubbish—clear away the cobwebs—banish forever the mistakes of all the yesterdays—cast adrift all doubts—cease altogether the using of haphazard—sort o' kerwhack—unsympathetic—unintelligent methods—get entirely away from merely thinking you are working when as a matter of fact you are not. When you have done this—really and actually—you will find that practically all, if not all, of the debit side is wiped out, leaving many and valuable assets on the credit side.

There are no birds in last year's nests.

Realize that life is to-day—not yesterday—that the building is for the future.

The Credit Side.

Thus doing, what credits can you find? Brains—energy—zeal—system—tact—resourcefulness—bulldog tenacity—enthusiasm—fixedness of purpose—cheerfulness—courage—health—friends—confidence in self—in your company, in its policy contracts, in its management, in its fairness and justice in dealing with its policyholders and their beneficiaries—inspiration to do—will and ambition to achieve things worth while—realization that there is no nobler profession on earth than yours. Are you lacking in any of these credits? If so, get them.
